The ſame day there was an eſpie taken, whom they which tooke him thought to haue been B a Turke, howbeit he was found to be one of their owne men; by whom they were better enformed of the cowardiſe of the Turks, of their purpoſe for the ſhunning of battell, and of their reſolution for the keeping of themſelues within the ſafegard of their trenches; and that they ſo did, as well for the loſſes they had before receiued, as for diuers other vnlucky accidents, which cauſed them to miſdoubt ſome euil ſucceſſe in the end and winding vp of this their expedition. Neuertheleſſe, the Chriſtians not greatly truſting to theſe reports, ſtill kept their army in readines, to giue their enemies battell vpon the leaſt occaſion offered them. Howbeit, that indeed they had no great cauſe of feare, the Turks hauing no deſire at all to come to a generall battell: ſo that in ſtead of great effects that were expected, the time paſſed by in light skirmiſhes and vaine alarmes betwixt the two armies; vntill that at length the Turks hauing by the C riuer ſufficiently ſtored the city of Buda with victuals, the great Baſſa ſecretly by night roſe with his army, and ſo retired toward Belgrade. Which ſo baſe a retreat differed not much from a cowardly flight, being with ſuch ſilence made vnder the darke couert of the night, as that the Chriſtians had thereof no perceiuing vntill that they were quite departed and gone. This victualling of Buda and of ſome other few places of the Turks in Hungary, was all that the great Baſſa did this yeare with his great army; whereas at his firſt comming it was giuen out, that he would therewith take both Strigonium and Peſth from the Chriſtians.

The great Baſſa hauing victualled Buda, ſecretly by night riſeth with his army, and ſo retireth out of Hungary.

The next day the haſty and ſudden departure of the enemy being perceiued, the Generall of the Chriſtians called together the Colonels and other great Commanders of the army, to conſult with them, what were beſt to be done in ſo vnexpected an occurrent? Of whom, ſome D were of opinion, That it was beſt forthwith in all haſte to purſue their fearfull enemies: otherſome for many reaſons diſſuading the ſame, and otherſome withall propounding ſome other notable exploits to be taken in hand. But in concluſion, the ſafeſt point was reſolued vpon, which was, not to hazard any their troups in purſuing of their flying enemies, who were hardly to be ouertaken; but now immediatly after their departure to attempt the taking in of ſome one of their ſtrong holds: where, amongſt others that were propounded, Hatwan was thought to be the moſt neceſſary place, being ſo ſeated, as that beſide the great harme it did to the Chriſtians thereabout, it much hindered both aduertiſements and victuals to be brought vnto Peſth. Which exploit reſolued vpon, they forthwith raſed the Fort of S. Andrew, and the fort by them built in the Iſle of Vicegrade, becauſe they ſhould not ſtand the Turks in any E ſtead after their departure, and ſo with all their power ſet forward toward Hatwan. This town is ſeated beyond the riuer of Danubius toward the North, about eight leagues from Buda, croſſing the way to Tranſyluania and Coſſoua, vpon a faire and euen plaine, neere vnto a great and deepe mariſh, and was ſometime defended with good and ſtrong walls, with a caſtle, and three large and deepe ditches, for a long time in the power of the Turks, and which without loſſe a great while held out againſt the valiant Baron Teuffenbach, by whom it was moſt ſtreitly in vaine beſieged: vntill that afterward it was againe beſieged by Maximilian the Archduke, the Emperours brother, then Generall of his army in Hungary in the yeare 1594, vnto whom it was by compoſition ſurrendered, after it had for a certaine ſpace beene by the Turks notably defended: who conſidering the harme this place did vnto the Emperours terF ritories, by reaſon of the ſcituation thereof, wherein a great and ſtrong garriſon of the Turks alwaies lying, forraged all the Chriſtian territories as far as the riuer Vague, yea, and oftentimes tooke booties as far as Strigontum, and by ſpoiling of all that ſide of Hungary, cauſed the Countrey to pay contribution as farre as Ternauie, ſtanding within foure leagues of the mountaines which ſeperat Hungary and Morauia: all irreparable loſſes to the Chriſtians, and hardly to be auoided: for which reaſons he cauſed it then to be diſmantled, and to be made vnſeruiceable for the wars. G After which time for all that, the Turks for the commodiouſneſſe of the place, had with great labour againe new fortified the ſame, with wals made with great piles of wood and faggots, with earth rammed in betwixt them; a ſtronger kind of fortification, and better able to withſtand the fury of the cannon, than are wals of ſtone: in which ſort the Turks vſe moſt commonly to fortifie ſuch places as they meane to defend, and which oftentimes coſt much for the Chriſtians to gaine the ſame from them.

This place thus fortified, and both with men and munition well furniſhed, and with all things needfull ſtored, was able to endure a great and long ſiege; whereunto the garriſon therein was as reſolutely ſet downe, as were the Chriſtians to attempt it: where now, at their firſt comming vnto it, a part of the Italian Regiment, aſſiſted with 300 Lanſquenets, vnder the leading of County Sultze, and Graſold Generall of the Italians, H were appointed to go before the reſt of the army, and to begin to make their approches: which they did by forcing of a water-mill, driuen by the water of the mariſh, not paſt a musket ſhot from the towne. Wherin while they were buſied, the Turks ſallying out of the towne, came to fight hand to hand with the Chriſtians, and had with them a ſharpe combat, the Turks fighting for the defending of the place and of their liues, and the Chriſtians for the gaining of the ſame, and for their honour. Which ſo contrary a reſolution in that conflict coſt the liues of many; and among others, the life of Graſold, Generall of the Italians, there ſlaine with a harquebuſe ſhot, vnto the great hurt of the whole army, but eſpecially of the Italians, now depriued of ſo great and expert a Commander. At laſt for all that, the Turks were enforced confuſedly to retire again into the town, I hauing in this ſally loſt a number of their men alſo. The Chriſtians neuertheleſſe hauing driuen the Turks backe into the towne, went forward with their buſineſſe in making their approches, and placing their gabions to couer their cannon: wherein the Turks with their great and ſmall ſhot did them great harme, but eſpecially with their murthering pieces, charged with nailes and other ſmall pieces of yron. Howbeit, by the comming of the Lord Ruſſworm with the reſt of the army, the approches were the next day brought on, and the battery planted ſo neere vnto the towne, as that the Turks could not without moſt manifeſt danger and loſſe, any more ſally out to trouble the Chriſtians in their workes. The firſt inconuenience the beſieged felt, was the want of Water, which through the diligence of our men was ſoone taken from them, the cannon right furiouſly battering the wals in the mean ſpace. Wherewith the Turks K diſcouraged, and now out of hope to be relieued, thought it not beſt for them to expect either whileſt a breach were made, or an aſſault giuen, but by parly to preuent theſe dangers, in hope ſo to come to ſome eaſier compoſition, while yet they ſtood in their whole ſtrength.

The Turkes in Hatwan craue parley.

And ſo parley by the Turks demanded, and by the Chriſtians granted, and hoſtages for the ſurety thereof on both ſides giuen, they ſent two of the chiefe men amongſt them to entreat of the ſame: who at the firſt demanded, That their liues and liberty ſaued, they might with bag and baggage depart. Whereunto anſwer was giuen them, That they ſhould only with their liues and liberty be gone, with ſome few hundreds of their worſt horſes of courteſie giuen them, to carry them to ſuch a place as they meant to retire themſelues vnto, and to deliuer into the hands of the Chriſtians all ſuch renegats as were in the towne. L

Now the beſieged Turks carrying yet the markes of the cruelty by the Wallons exerciſed vpon them in the former ſiege, when as the ſame town was by force taken, and filled with dead bodies of all ages & ſex, and doubting now this ſecond ſhipwreck, with like miſery threatned vnto them by the Chriſtian Generall, if they ſhould expect the dreadfull euent of a generall aſſault; accepted of theſe hard conditions, ſeeing no better could be obtained; and ſo couenanting, that they with their families, their liues and liberties ſaued, might with a ſafe conuoy be conducted vnto ſome place of ſurety within their owne territory, they promiſed to giue vp the town.

Hatwan yeelded vnto the Chriſtians.

Which agreement on both parts reſolued vpon, they full of ſorrow and heauineſſe, with their families departing out of the towne the 29 of Nouember, were by Colonell Andaſſ with certain Huſſars ſafely conducted to Solnoc. The Chriſtians entring the town, found therein M great ſtore of victuals & munition, the houſes full of corne and other neceſſaries, and the ſhops ſtored with weapons, ſhot and pouder, with 24 pieces of great ordnance ready mounted, which might haue well ſufficed for the defence of the place. But all theſe things are but acceſſories vnto one principall, that is to ſay, to reſolution, without which they are but of ſmall force, and with-

A with which they are able to do much. Beſide that, the place it ſelfe thus furniſhed well conſidered, ſeemed almoſt impoſſible to haue bin forced; but eſpecially now that Winter was come on, which might haue brought a thouſand ſtormes and difficulties, by the Chriſtians not to haue been endured: ſo that euery man beholding the ſame, with his eies caſt vp towards heauen, gaue God the praiſe, for taking away the Turks courages in their ſo great aduantages, and encreaſing of the Chriſtians in their no leſſe difficulties: vnto whom the glory of this victory was wholly attributed, ſeeing that contrary to all apparance and mans forces, he had giuen to the Chriſtians the victory, no way able by their owne forces to haue been gained. But God, which in his prouidence from heauen beholdeth all things vpon earth, diſpoſeth of the ſame as he ſeeth beſt for his glory, and the welfare of his: ſo that in this action he was the only pilot B which brought this our ſhip into the hauen of health; for the haires of our head are of him numbred, and euen the leaſt creatures vpon earth are of him regatded.

Into this new gained town the Chriſtian Generall put a good and ſtrong garriſon of a thouſand Lanſquenets and fiue hundred Hungarians, part horſemen, and part footmen, for the keeping of the place and of the country thereabout: which done, he retired with his army toward Peſth, which he relieued with victuals, and ſtrengthened with the troups of the Colonels, Collonitz, Geiſberg, and Rouer, who were there bilited to paſſe that Winter, and to preſerue the place againſt the deuiſes and enterpriſes of the Turks at Buda, who were ſtill deuiſing and practiſing for the regaining thereof.

The time of the yeare for ſoldiers any longer to keep the field now paſt, and the great army of the Turks riſen and gone, the Lord Ruſſworm breaking vp his army neere vnto Strigonium, C cauſed all the Enſignes by him this yeare gained from the Turks, euen 64 in number, to be gathered together all very braue and gallant; all which he ſent with great pomp and triumph to Vienna, for a Preſent to the Archduke Matthias; who receiued them with great thanks giuen both vnto the Generall that ſent them, and the ſouldiers that had gained them; and bountifully rewarding them that had brought them. They of Vienna at the ſame time highly commending the Generall, and not a little rejoycing to ſee thoſe ſame Enſignes now in their power within the city, which not long before had proudly braued them in the field.

The Lord Ruſworm breakes vp his army, & ſendeth the Enſignes gained from the Turks for a preſent to the Archduke Matthias.

Now after the breaking vp of the Chriſtian army, a great number of inſolent and ſeditious ſouldiers, eſpecially of the Regiment of Colonell Altmein, roming vp and downe the country, D to ſeeke for booty, moſt cruelly rifled and ſpoiled the country villages, with the inhabitants therein, as well the Chriſtians as the Turks, ſparing no more the one than the other: whoſe outrage not otherwiſe to be ſtaied, they were by commandement from the Emperor, by force charged at Widhof, and two hundred and thirty of them being brought in priſoners to Vienna, foure and thirty of them were there for example hanged, and the reſt as men not worthy of entertainment caſhiered.

The time of the yeare hauing (as we ſaid) broken vp the army of the Chriſtians, the Regiment of the County Reingraue was put in garriſon into the villages of Chiante and Ternauie, alwaies at hand with the enemies, as fitteſt to repulſe them. Theſe ſouldiers were alwaies kept in doings, ſtill fighting while others were at peace, and mannaging their armes, whilſt others E hanged theirs by the wals. For beſide the troubles they had with the Turks, their nigh, but bad neighbours, the very inhabitants of the countrey (who held all that might hurt them, for enemies, were they neuer ſo much their friends) oftentimes, and that for little or no occaſion at al, tooke vp arms, and right furiouſly charged them as their mortall enemies. Of which combats there was no end, the country peaſants ſtill ſtriuing to rid themſelues of ſuch gheſts. So that theſe valiant men ſtill enforced to buy their bread with the price of their bloud, as men become deſperat, vſed the Chriſtians as they did the Turks, diuiding all things with them by the ſword. But in theſe ſmall and often fights mo men were ſlain and loſt than would haue bin in a generall battell, ſome good number either of the one ſide or the other being euery day ſlain: which daily inconueniences cauſed theſe ſouldiers to reſolue to go to ſeeke their liuing elſe- F where, rather than in the midſt of the graues of their fellows. Whereunto they were the rather enduced, for that but a little before, the troupe of Captaine Clinchampe, the beſt and braueſt of the whole Regiment, was one night right furiouſly aſſailed, and almoſt ſurpriſed by the country peaſants. Wherfore they departed out of Hungary into Auſtria without victuals, apparell, or money, their pay due vnto them for 17 months being kept from them. A cruelty full of couetouſneſſe, and a couetouſneſſe full of cruelty, by wrong and hard dealing to leaue thoſe men to the deſperat extremity of hunger, who for our ſafety had expoſed themſelues to all manner of danger. For if the Prince (as he may of right) demand the liues of his ſubjects in his ſeruice, as bound vnto their loyalty; they may alſo of right require due prouiſion for their maintenance: of which two offices where one faileth, the whole ſtate muſt needs fall. For prouiding whereof, great was the wiſedome of Auguſtus, who laid vp the publique reuenue apart by it ſelfe, to defray the publique charge; and that which was his owne priuat, to ſerue his owne priuat vſes.

The peſants of Auſtria ſeek by force to ſtay the paſſage of the ſouldiers of the Reingraues regiment into their country.

Theſe poore ſouldiers thus reſolued, craued leaue of the Biſhop of Presburg to paſſe by the ſuburbs of his towne, without doing therein any harme: which their requeſt he courteouſly granted; and ſo according to their word they indeed paſſed, not ſo much as once wiſhing for that they durſt not once touch. Which their ſo quiet paſſage cauſed the Biſhop to furniſh them with boats, whereby to paſſe ouer the riuer which diuideth Hungary from Auſtria. Which once knowne vnto the peaſants of Auſtria, they aſſembled themſelues together, to the number of 1500 men, and caſt vp a fort vpon the banke of the riuer, with three faulconers in it, reſolutely ſet downe to keepe them from comming ouer into their country. Which their ſo forward a reſolution for a while ſtaied theſe men of war: who to auoid further trouble, courteouſly requeſted paſſage of theſe men, promiſing all their good behauiour in paſſing quietly through their country: which the churles in moſt churliſh maner refuſed to grant, with proud threats of the danger of their liues, if they ſhould by force attempt the paſſage, and not with quietneſſe returne. With which brauadoes of the country churles theſe troups of martiall men prouoked, reſolued by force to remoue theſe lets, and by the ſword to open themſelues a way: ſo turning the head of their baggages toward the fort, as if they would haue there paſſed; while the peaſants ſtood gazing vpon them, Camgaillard with his troupe of horſemen vnperceiued of them tooke the riuer a little higher vp, and by ſwimming gained the farther banke: after whom captaine Clinchamp with his troups immediatly followed alſo. In which paſſage they were much troubled with great flakes of yce, with the great deepeneſſe of the riuer, with the ſteepneſſe of the bankes where they were to land, and many other difficulties: all which they regarded not to be reuenged of their enemies. Theſe valiant men being got ouer, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſing theſe rude country churles, and furiouſly charging of them, quickely ouerthrew them, and cut them in pieces: of whom 300 were left dead vpon the place, as many moe hurt, and the reſt put to flight. Which was no ſooner done, but that the reſt of the troups of the Regiment without let paſſed the riuer, and ſo joyned themſelues vnto their victorious companions. Seuen weekes this Regiment ſtaied in Auſtria; and ſo longer had, but that vpon the complaint and requeſt of the Nobility and of the people of the country, they hauing for 17 months pay due vnto them receiued nine months pay, were licenſed to depart. Which was a great ouerſight in them that had to doe therewith, at once to disband ſo many good men, as had not their like amongſt all the reſt of the Emperours garriſons, and who being ſtaid with a little mony, might with their good ſeruice haue ſtood the Emperour in great ſtead: as by proofe afterward appeared; when as the Emperour by neceſſity forced to call them together againe, could not of all that ſtrong Regiment raiſe but three companies; the reſt being ſome of them returned into their own countries, other-ſome of them gone to ſerue in other places, or elſe otherwiſe diſperſed. Of which three companies, the firſt was giuen to Camgaillard, the ſecond to Baltazar Marades a Spaniard, and the laſt to Iohn Paul an Italian: Which three captaines had before commanded in the Reingraues Regiment, and done the Emperour good ſeruice, as they did afterward alſo.

Diuers happy conflicts of the Chriſtians with the Turks and Tartars.

The reſt of this yeare ended in Hungary, with diuers other encounters and combats, Fortune therein ſtill fauouring the Chriſtians. As 300 Haiducks, going forth to ſeeke for booty, by good hap chanced to meet with a company of the Turkes being very rich, and diuers of them men of good account; amongſt whom, the Gouernour of Mohatz was one: all whom theſe Haiducks cut in pieces; to be borne withall, for ſhewing no fauor vnto them, who moſt cruelly had before ſpoiled them of their parents, lands and goods. Beſides that, they tooke the Gouernor of Copan, with his ſonne, and 24 other very rich Turks, with 170 horſes of ſeruice, and eight fat Oxen prepared for their prouiſion. Which fat booties drew forth other ſouldiers alſo to ſeeke out for the like: of whom, certain troups of the Chriſtians going forth toward

A toward Batſwar, a towne of the enemies, met the Gouernor of the towne and of the territory thereabout come out with his garriſon againſt them; where betwixt them was made a right hot and ſharpe fight: wherein at the firſt encounter the Turks ſeemed to haue the better, but in the end the Chriſtians taking courage, ouerthrew them and cut them in pieces. In this conflict diuers priſoners were taken, with three Enſignes, and many other rich ſpoiles. This happy exploit was ſeconded with newes agreeable thereunto out of Moldauia, whereof the Vayuod by a Curror ſent of purpoſe, gaue our men to vnderſtand, which was, of the generall ouerthrow of the Tartars: who hauing with all manner of cruelty waſted the country, had in the end made the inhabitants ſo deſperat, that repoſing more comfort in a ſpeedy death (the end of all miſeries) than in a lingring life, turmoiled with ſo many intollerable calamities, they generally B arming themſelues, joyned themſelues with their Vayuod, ſo to try their laſt fortune. With which reſolution they in battell encountering with the Tartars, gaue them a great ouerthrow, a number of them being left dead vpon the field, and the reſt put to flight, and chaſed out of the country, the Moldauians notably reuenging their former loſſes, and in their owne territories burying their enemies.

Neither were the Turks in this cold and hard time of the yeare on their part idle, but ſtill plotting of their great and notable deſignes, euen through the middeſt of the froſt and ſnow to haue beene performed. The Baſſa Beged hearing that the Lord Baſta lay with his troupes diſperſed in the country about Lippa, in great ſecurity by reaſon of the extremity of the time, altogether vnfit for men to keepe the field: and therefore imagining it to be no great matter, C now amidſt the froſt and the ſnow to ſurpriſe him; acquainted three other of the Turks Captains and Commanders thereabout with the matter: who liking well thereof, with 5000 men all together ſet forward, in hope to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed him. But he an old expert Captaine, and not ſo careleſſe as they ſuppoſed, had his ſecret ſpies ſtill abroad among them: by whom he aduertiſed both of their purpoſe and of their comming, reſolued in both to preuent them; and to that end hauing called together his forces, ſet forward to meet them in the mid way, and ſo before they were aware to intercept them; neither failed he of his purpoſe: for meeting with the Turks fearing no ſuch matter in place of diſaduantage, and vpon the ſudden charging them round, they, deceiued of their expectation for the eaſineſſe of the victory promſed them, as men diſmaied, after ſome ſmall reſiſtance fled; aboue eleuen hundred D of them being in this conflict ſlaine, and the reſt put in rout, and driuen into the riuer Maruze, there periſhed; ſome few onely by ſpeedy flight with the Baſſa eſcaping. Twenty of the Turkes Captaines were here taken, with ſome few other priſoners, and a great and rich booty.

Beged Baſſa thinking to haue ſurpriſed the Lord Baſta, is himſelfe by him ſurpriſed & ouerthrown.

Much about the ſame time George Barbell, one of the chiefe of the Rebels in Tranſyluania, acknowledging his fault, came to Claudionople, to take the oath for his allegiance vnto the Emperor: by whoſe example a great number of others moued, came in and ſubmitted themſelues alſo: and happily he being a good and valiant Captaine, had done much more for the ſeruice of the Emperor, had he not bin by death preuented; for ſhortly after he ſuddenly died. The other Rebels moued neither by his example, nor by the comming in of ſome others of E their companions, made choice of one Bethlin Habor (a moſt renowned Captaine, and of great reputation amongſt the ſouldiers) for their Chiefetaine: who proud of ſuch a choice, immediatly after ſent an Herauld vnto Baſta, to will him forthwith to deliuer vnto him all the country of Tranſyluania, as to him that was of late choſen Prince thereof, or elſe to denounce vnto him moſt cruell war: and to tell him further, That if he refuſed ſo to do, he was in good hope by his owne forces, without any aid from the Turke, to driue him out, being well aſſured of the faithfull deuoire of the Tranſyluanians. At whoſe proud threats Baſta ſmiling, only ſhewed him his open hand in ſigne that he accepted of his proud threats, not vouchſafing him any other anſwer at all. This glorious boaſter bare himſelfe the higher, for that he had married the widow of Moyſes the chiefe Rebell, whereby he had gained both great riches, and much credit F and reputation among the common people: both which he enjoyed but a while; for the fourth day after that he was married, he died, and ſo was buried. Baſta neuertheleſſe, for the better aſſuring of the ſtrong places of Tranſyluania, put into them garriſons of his moſt faithfull Germanes, and diſpatched Crauſenich away toward the Emperour, to requeſt of him a ſupply of a thouſand horſemen and foure thouſand foot, without which he thought it impoſſible to preſerue and keepe the Prouince troubled with ſo great factions, and ſo earneſtly ſought after by the Turks: and further to certifie him, That the little forces he had left was not ſufficient for the keeping of the places beſet with ſo many enemies, and all lying as it were in their mouthes: That the Prouince ſwarmed with ſeditious people, one thruſting another forward in miſchiefe and rebellion, as the eares of wheat driuen with the winde do one another in the field: That the Turks were alwaies making of new incurſions, which hee was not able to repreſſe without greater forces, which he expected from his Majeſty with all ſpeed poſſible: proteſting, for want of ſuch ſupply to be in time ſent vnto him, to lay the loſſe of the Prouince vpon the negligence of them which might and ought to haue ſent the ſame; acquitting himſelfe for the loſſe thereof, ſeeing that he durſt not to repoſe any truſt or confidence in the faith of the citiſens and inhabitants of the townes, although they were diſarmed, for hauing ſo often falſified their faith, and put their Prouince in danger of vtter ruine and deſtruction. But leauing theſe troubles of Tranſyluania and Hungary, let vs a little ſtep backe to ſee what happened among the Turks themſelues, after the departure of the great Baſſa with his army out of Hungary.

Zellaly comes into Boſna.

By policy ouerthrowes Zeffer Baſſa the Gouernour, and poſſeſſeth it himſelfe.

Mahomet the great Sultan had (as is before declared) by great promiſes made vnto his Rebels, ſought to appeaſe the rebellion in Aſia, and by that meanes drew Zellaly, one of the chiefe Rebels, with twelue thouſand good ſouldiers out of Aſia into Europe, and ſo into his warres in Hungary, vpon an aſſured promiſe made vnto him of the gouernment of Boſna: the hope whereof, as it had drawne him vnto theſe late warres, ſo had it alſo encouraged him with his gallant troups of moſt braue horſemen to doe the beſt ſeruice he could, ſo to ſhew himſelfe worthy of ſo honourable a preferment: which he right notably performed during all the time of the Baſſaes abode in Hungary, to his owne great commendation, and the furthering of his Lord and Maſters ſeruice. But the Baſſa with his weake army retired out of Hungary, and the Baſſa himſelfe returned toward Conſtantinople; Zellaly with three thouſand horſe withdrew himſelfe into his promiſed gouernment of Boſna, to poſſeſſe himſelfe thereof: and being come neere to Bagualue, the chiefe Towne of that Prouince, he there encamped in a faire large medow, within ſight of the city. Now Zeffer Baſſa, then Gouernour of the Prouince, and not as yet thereof diſcharged, ſeeing this Rebell thus to encroach vpon his charge, as if he would euen by force intrude himſelfe thereinto; with all ſpeed called together his garriſons and men of war (euer ready at his becke) and ſo went forth againſt Zellaly, with a purpoſe to haue quickely, and without any great trouble, cut him with his ſo ſmall a company all in pieces. But the old Rebell not ignorant either of his owne weakeneſſe, or of the Baſſaes ſtrength, hauing himſelfe loſt the beſt part of his forces before in Hungary; as he was a man of no leſſe wiſedome than courage, reſolued now to attempt by policy that which he well knew he could not by force effect. Wherefore he as a great Prince, vpon ſome braue reſolution, began to encampe himſelfe as if he had meant there to haue lien, when as immediatly after vpon a faire night hauing cauſed diuers great fires to be made in his tents, as if it had been to beguile the enemy with, he ſuddenly roſe and departed. Of whoſe flight (for ſo it was like) the Baſſa vnderſtanding, and that he had forſaken his campe, haſted thither with all ſpeed with his ſouldiers to take and pillage the ſame; not making any other account of him that was ſo fled and gone, but as of a baſe and faint-hearted coward, who for feare and want of courage had left both his campe and honour as a prey vnto his enemies; the ſpoyle whereof the Baſſa (being poſſeſſed of the campe) gaue vnto his ſouldiers; who glad of ſuch a morſell, greedily ſwallowed it vp, which by and by after became their bane and vtter deſtruction: for whileſt that they were charging themſelues with booties, and euery man was thinking of his prey, nothing carefull of their common ſafety, Zellaly with his three thouſand horſe, all valiant and reſolute men, ſuddenly the ſame night returning, ſurpriſed the Turks being faſt on ſleepe, as buried in ſecurity, and cut them in pieces. Some of greater courage than the reſt, began to make head, and to giue ſome ſhew of their valour, but ouercome with the generall feare, out of order, and not reſolued what to do, they were quickly with the reſt forced, ouerthrowne, and ſlaine. In this ſurpriſe there were of the Baſſaes men ſix thouſand found dead vpon the place: a very great ſlaughter to be made by ſo few men. But what cannot valiant reſolution do againſt careleſneſſe, lulled aſleep in the lap of ſecurity? The Baſſa himſelfe eſcaped by flight, with ſuch as could get out of the campe to follow him.

A Now Zellaly well knowing how to vſe his victory, marched in haſte to all the chiefe places of that Prouince, and with his forces, more feared for their victory than for their number, cauſed all the inhabitants of thoſe places, with moſt part of the reſt of the people of that country, to ſweare vnto him their obedience and fidelity. In which doing he gathered together great ſtore of wealth, with a great number of braue horſemen for ſeruice: all which he put into Balnaluc, a ſtrong towne, whereinto he in triumphant manner entred, with a crowne of laurell vpon his head, and his ſoldiers ſinging his praiſes amiddeſt the ſmoke of a thouſand pieces of great ordnance, which he cauſed inceſſantly to be ſhot off for the ſpace of two daies together: giuing it out withall (amongſt all the ioyfull feaſts and triumphs, made for the magnifying and ſetting forth of his praiſe and glory) That his reſolution was, to take part with the B Chriſtian Emperor, if the great Baſſaes, or other his enemies in great place in court, ſhould ſeeke to croſſe his deſires, or to formalize his actions or proceedings in this manner of the obtaining of his gouernment.

Mahomet ſends for Zellaly to come to Conſtantinople.

Now Mahomet doubting what this man, ſo well acquainted with rebellion, would do, had by diuers meſſengers ſent for him to Conſtantinople, after the breaking vp of the army in Hungary, there of his Imperiall and infinite bounty, to receiue the honourable rewards of his good ſeruice and valour, the greatneſſe whereof he had (as he ſaid) already vnderſtood by Haſſan Baſſa the Generall: which ſo bound him to the reward thereof, as that his deſire and pleaſure was, to grace him in Court with his owne hands, for the greater teſtimony of the loue he bare him, and of the eſteeme he had of him. But the crafty and miſtruſtfull Rebell, doubting that theſe C faire words were all but baits to draw him into his power, and the endangering of aſſured loſſe both of his life and liberty, ſhut his eares againſt theſe ſo ſweet charmes, and as a man well aduiſed, and one which knew that the hand of a Prince iuſtly offended, is alwaies open for to puniſh his rebellious ſubiect, being once in his power, with as great iuſtice in puniſhing him, as he with wrong and diſloyalty offended him; would in no wiſe accept of the offer: but ciuilly anſwered, That he moſt humbly thanked the great Sultan, for his ſo great and honourable offers) and that he was ſo mindefull of him: but that he for his part deſired not any greater reward for the ſeruices by him done, more than the gouernment which his Maieſty had before promiſed him, whereof (according to which promiſe, which he could not thinke, but to be agreeable to his good liking) hee was now poſſeſſed, with a reſolution to hold and keep D the ſame for his Maieſties ſeruice. Which was as much in effect, as for a diſloyall ſubiect to talke with his angry ſouereigne, with his hand vpon his ſword: but with this ſly anſwer, ſuch as it was, Sultan Mahomet for all his greatneſſe, muſt as yet content himſelfe, for feare leſt if he ſhould haue ſought to haue by force remoued him, he might ſo haue raiſed a more dangerous rebellion in Europe, than was already in Aſia. Zellaly ſo politique and reſolute a man, and not to ſeeke what to doe in ſuch matters, being poſſeſſed of ſo great a gouernment, and the Chriſtian Emperour at hand ready to haue backed him, if he ſhould vpon any diſcontentment haue reuolted.

He refuſeth to come.

The troubles of this yeare 1603 thus ouerpaſt, the beginning of the next was like vnto a faire blooming tree, which promiſing great ſtore of fruit, but afterward blaſted with the E extremity of the weather, proueth in effect as barren, as it before ſeemed in hope fruitfull. For beginning with the ſweet Weſterne winds of peace, it ended with the ſterne Northern blaſts of warre. The Turks had oftentimes the laſt yeare made motions of peace, but eſpecially toward the end thereof; outwardly making ſhew of a great deſire and forwardneſſe in themſelues thereunto. Which buſineſſe the laſt yeare begun, was euen with the beginning of this yeare alſo effectually continued, and Commiſſioners were on both ſides appointed to conferre and conclude vpon the ſame. Amongſt theſe Commiſſioners, Colonell Althem was one; who to performe his charge, hauing taken with him the other Commiſſioners deputed with him for this purpoſe, with certaine other Captaines, embarqued himſelfe with them in thirteene ſhips from Strigonium, and from thence ſailing downe the Riuer, landed with his F traine in the Iſland betwixt Budy and Peſth. Of whoſe arriuall there, the Turks of Buda aduertiſed, and on their part ready, came forthwith thither alſo, with all the outward ſhewes that might be, of their moſt earneſt deſire for the concluding of peace: whereas our men, who by a thouſand effects were aſſured of the vnfaithfulneſſe of the Turks, and that neceſſity and not the deſire of any quietneſſe, had drawne them to ſeeke for peace, to the contrary ſhewed themthemſelues very backeward in this buſineſſe. For why, they knew right well, that the Turks had not taken this matter in hand but to ouertake them, and by this time of peace to gaine a time of war more commodious and fit for their ambitious and cruell deſignes. They had the yere before made ſufficient proofe of our forces, accompanied with good fortune, which cauſed them to deſpaire by ſtrong hand to vanquiſh and ouercome vs: beſides that, they ſtill euery houre in one place or other receiued a thouſand loſſes and croſſes from our garriſons, who diſtreſſed and annoyed them both with their forces, and with driuing of them vnto the extremity of wants. Our men knew moreouer alſo, that the troubles of Aſia as well from the Rebels as from the Perſian which lay ſo heauy vpon the great Sultan, drew them to this neceſſity, to ſeeke for a breathing time of peace, wherin to repaire that which was in their forces and ſtrength by wars impaired. And euen yet alſo the manner of the Turks demeaning of themſelues in this action, their delaies, their excuſes, and deferring from day to day to conclude vpon ſome point of their treaty, gaue our men good cauſe to ſuſpect them of euill meaning, as men reſpecting their profit more than their faith: and more ſubtill and cruell in all their actions, than honourable and valorous. The fifth of Ianuary was the day by our men expected for the treaty; for as then the Baſſa of Buda had appointed with the reſt of the Commiſſioners to come into the Iſle to heare what our commiſſioners ſhould demand, & to entreat of the peace. But hee was too true an Infidell to faile of his Infidelity, and ſo came not at all, but deceiued our men both of their hope & expectation. At length in ſtead of himſelf, letters were brought from him to Colonell Althem; wherby he excuſed himſelfe for not comming, requeſting him with the reſt of the commiſſioners, to come ouer the riuer to Buda, the more commodiouſly for them to confer together, and ſo the better to conclude their negotiation. Now though Althem for the Majeſty of his Prince, and the honor of the State, ought not at the requeſt of theſe his enemies to haue put himſelfe into their power, but to haue ſtood faſt vpon the tearmes of honor, yet to the end that the country of Hungary, ſo miſerably ſpoiled with wars, ſhould not take occaſion to complaine of his negligence in this negotiation of peace, he reſolued to go to Buda, as the Baſſa had requeſted: deeming euery action tending to the hinderance of the common good, to be but in ſhew honourable, and in deed hurtfull. Vpon which reſolution he ſent before the Gentleman of his ſtable, and his Cooke, with a Gentleman of the Turks, ſent but the day before from the Baſſa: which men going aboord together, were aſſailed with ſuch a cruell tempeſt vpon the riuer, that neither the skill of the watermen, nor goodneſſe of the veſſell was able to reſiſt the force thereof, ſo that the boat was ſunke and the men drowned. An euill preſage of the peace to be made, the raging water as it were foreſhewing the troubles to come. But this tempeſt by the ſacrifice of theſe poore drowned men appeaſed, Althem and Geisberg, two of the chiefe commiſſioners, embarked themſelues, and ſo paſſed ouer the riuer to Buda. At whoſe arriuall the Turks gaue in ſhew a thouſand teſtimonies of their joy for their comming. Neither did the Germans refuſe their kind offered courteſies, but largely fed of the good cheere, and filled themſelues with the good wines, whereof the Turks had giuen them plenty: and they againe vſing them as kindly, as if they had bin their brethren, and conuerſing with them as with their owne countrymen. Amidſt this carowſing and platters full of good cheere, the propoſitions of peace, which the Turks meant to demand, were ſerued in alſo, and a truce for twelue daies demanded to conſider of the matter: during which time it ſhould bee lawfull for euery man without let freely to come and goe whither they would: which was forthwith on both ſides agreed vpon. And for better teſtimony of the Turks true meaning in this their negotiation of peace, the Baſſa in the preſence of our Commiſſioners diſpatched a Curror toward the great Sultan, to aduertiſe him of this buſineſſe, and of the proceeding therein, according to the cammandement by him before giuen. Which he did, to cauſe our men to beleeue that the great Sultan himſelfe was deſirous of peace, and that his Captaines well affected thereunto, were willing to further the ſame. Which done, the Baſſa preſented vnto Colonell Althem two caſes full of Turks armes, of all manner of faſhions, very rich, and cunningly wrought; both carried by a mule, with furniture for an horſe, embroydered with gold and pearle, very ſumptuous and rich, as a Preſent from the Great Sultan his Lord and Maſter, to the Emperour. And for the Archduke Matthias, he preſented vnto the Colonell, a robe of purple veluet, with ſleeues cunningly enbroydered with gold and pearle, emboſſed with fine and curious figures cunningly wrought with the needle: for the

A rareneſſe thereof as admirable to behold, as for the richneſſe thereof to haue beene deſired: which was by euery man wondered at, when as ſhortly after it was by Althem preſented vnto the Archduke, together with other preſents from the Turks. Beſides that, the ſame Baſſa in token of friendſhip, preſented vnto Althem himſelfe another very faire and rich robe: all the reſt of the Commiſſioners receiuing alſo from the Baſſa other robes of leſſe value, but yet all very rich and ſumptuous.

This buſineſſe for this time thus ended, and the truce for twelue daies concluded, the Chriſtian Commiſſioners loded with Preſents tooke their leaue of the Turks, with the ſhewes of their good wils, and ſo returned backe againe to Peſth. Howbeit theſe the enemies faire Preſents ſtill ſauoured but of enmity, being indeed but like to the Preſents of Hector and Ajax, tending rather to war than to peace.

B Now the death of the moſt valiant and renowned Lord Nadaſti, which at this time happened, was another euill preſage of the bad ſucceſſe of this treaty of peace now at hand: who hauing of long beene a barre vnto the Turks rage in that part of Hungary where he dwelt, they now after his death, with the violence of their forces, as with an heady ſtreame, bare downe before them all our good fortune in that Prouince. This worthy man of great fame and deſert, had ſpent both his yeares and fortune in the moſt honourable warres againſt the Turks: wherein he was ſo skilfull and expert, that he was of them feared as another Huniades, and of the Chriſtians honoured as another Matthias. He had a thouſand times moſt valiantly fought againſt theſe miſcreants, and as many times foiled them, to the great benefit of the Chriſtian C Common-weale, the aduancement of the Emperours ſeruice, and the reliefe of his diſtreſſed Country. Theſe his heroicall deeds of armes were engrauen vpon the gates of the Townes and Cities of Hungary, and within the rockes of Tranſyluania, hauing both in the one country and the other right happily defeated theſe Infidels. He had the honour to haue receiued the firſt incurſions and attempts of the Turks, at ſuch time as Amurath the third hauing perfidiouſly broken the League made with Maximilian the Emperour, with his Forces inuaded Hungary; and was the firſt of all the Chriſtian Chiefetaines that made head againſt them; and being by their ſudden comming in by them almoſt ſurpriſed, performed yet great and worthy exploits and ſeruice againſt theſe faithleſſe men. It ſhould ſeeme that good fortune fauoured the Country of Hungary, but only in reſpect of him: for he being dead, it died alſo, D burying it ſelfe as it were in his graue, and him in glory; not ſuffering him to grow old, and ſo to languiſh in the ruines of his natiue Country. He died of a naturall death, about fifty and foure yeares old, moſt part whereof he liued in armes, ſtill charged with the burthen of his armour, and euen at the yeelding vp of the ghoſt yet breathing wars againſt theſe the enemies of the Chriſtian Faith. His death was much lamented for of many faithfull Chriſtians, but eſpecially of his owne tenants and ſubjects, whom he had alwaies kept and preſerued in ſafety, and ſtill maintained them in all peace and tranquility during all theſe former warres; the Turks not daring once to aſſaile them, nor to enter into their territory, being ſtaied from ſo doing by the bulwarke of his valour, right dreadfull to their attempts. Neuer Turke was buried in his Territory, no more than were the Barbarians vpon the bankes of the riuer Eurotas, E his wiſedome had ſo wiſely prouided for the preſeruation of his people; and his valour ſo worthily aſſured them of their health and ſafety. He was for his Country another Epaminondas, who made his towne not only free from the armes and inuaſions of their enemies, but alſo dreadfull to their forces ſo long as he liued. The Turks on the contrary part no leſſe rejoyced for his death; but accounting his country now rich and plentifull (for that it had neuer been by them ſpoiled) for their moſt aſſured prey came now thither on all ſides, to haue taken the ſpoile thereof, and therewith to haue enriched themſelues. But as they were about ſo to haue done, the valliant Collonitz honoring the remembrance of the Lord Nadaſti his late fellow and companion in armes, and holding that for his owne which he had left, oppoſed himſelfe with his forces againſt theſe rauening wolues. So that they were no ſooner entered into this F his territory, but that contrary to their expectation, they were encountered by this new Nadaſti, and by him ſo ouerthrowne and cut in pieces, that for a good while after they durſt no more attempt the like.

The death of the Lord Nadaſti.

This ſo great a loſſe of ſo worthy a man was a little eaſed by the victory about the ſame time gained by the Vayuod of Valachia againſt the Turks ſpoyling of his Countrey. This valiant champion not able longer to endure the proud inſolency and tyranny of theſe barbarous people, gathered together his troupes of horſemen, with ſuch other ſmall forces as he had; whereof the Turks hauing made ſmall reckoning, and therefore without order pillaging and ranſacking his Country, were, when they leaſt feared, by him vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed and ouerthrowne, many of them being cut in pieces, a number moe taken priſoners, with all the ſpoiles they had got, and the reſt with ſuch feare chaſed out of his Country, as that being glad to haue eſcaped, they tooke no pleaſure for a great while after, to looke into that his Prouince againe.

The ſmall time of truce yeeldeth great contentment both vnto the Chriſtians & Turks in Hungary.

The death of the great Sultan Mahomet.

But to returne againe to the Commiſſioners for the peace to be made betwixt the Great Sultan and the Emperour, the Baſſa of Buda, to the end that the Captaines and Gouernors of the towns and caſtles belonging to the Turks, being ignorant of the truce, ſhould not continue their warlike actions, to the prejudice of his faith giuen; immediatly after the departure of the Chriſtian Commiſſioners from Buda, diſpatched diuers currours towards them, to giue them knowledge thereof, and eſpecially to the Gouernor of Agria, commanding them from thenceforth to abſtain from their ordinary incurſions into their enemies territories, and from all other actions of hoſtility, and ſo to keep themſelues quiet vntill they were from him otherwiſe commanded. This little time of reſpite and breathing from warre, gaue great contentment vnto the poore country people, now with warres almoſt exhauſted and ſpent. And now our ſouldiers during the time of truce laying their armes aſide, ran by heaps with ſpades and ſhouels vnto the places where our Armies had ſometimes lien encamped, there to delue and ſearch to finde ſuch things as the Armies riſing in haſte had haply left there buried. In which action they ſo buſied themſelues as if they had beene Labourers in Harueſt, ſo that nothing was in the fields to be ſeene, but men digging and remouing of ſtones and earth. A right fooliſh buſineſſe, and yet ſo exceedingly pleaſing the greedy minds of theſe couetous men, as that amiddeſt their ſuch moiling labour they accounted themſelues at great eaſe. The Turks alſo did the like, mingled together with our men, and our men with them, without any injury doing one to another either by word or deed. And no doubt it is, but that there they found more trauell than wealth, the greedy deſire which drew them into this worke, deceiuing them in effect. And in this mad labour both the parties ſpent many daies without any let or injury doing either on the one ſide or the other. The Chriſtians of Peſth alſo paſſiug ouer the Danuby, went into the victualling houſes of the Turks at Buda, whereinto they were ſuffered to enter, and at liberty to walke vp and downe the towne at their pleaſure. And ſo the Turks of Buda likewiſe came ouer the riuer vnto Peſth, and there walked at their pleaſure, no man letting of them. Which manner of liuing was very commodious and pleaſing both for the one ſide and the other, the Chriſtians buying of the Turks ſuch things as they needed, and the Turks of them likewiſe. Through which quiet and peaceable intercourſe and traffique, the people in generall ſeemed euen in that ſhort time to haue forgotten a great part of their forepaſſed miſeries, this little time of peace, joyned with ſecurity, hauing well aſſuaged the ſame. But while theſe mutuall and vnwonted courteſies thus paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, and the minds of moſt men were filled with the expectation of an aſſured peace to haue beene euen forthwith concluded, the Great Sultan Mahomet in the middeſt of all his pleaſures and delights died in his Imperiall Palace at Conſtantinople: the newes whereof being in the euening brought to Buda by a courrour of purpoſe ſent from Conſtantinople, the Baſſa forthwith ſent the Captaine of the Sentinels of Buda, to Colonell Geisberg at Peſth, to aſſure him of the death of the Great Sultan Mahomet, and of the ſucceſſion of his young ſon Achmet into his Empire, now already both at Conſtantinople and other places thereabout proclaimed Emperour. By which meſſenger he alſo wrote vnto Colonell Althem, to certifie him both of the death of the Great Sultan, and of the ſucceſſion of his ſonne, as alſo that he was by him commanded to continue the negotiation of the peace, and ſo if he could to conclude the ſame. For the more euidence whereof, behold the copy of the letters themſelues:

OVr due commendations remembered, noble Lord Gouernour, our deere friend and right honourable neighbour. We haue thought good to aduertiſe you, that the fourth day after your departure from this

A this city we receiued Letters from Conſtantinople, giuing vs certainely to vnderſtand of the death of our moſt mighty Emperour Mahomet, and of the ſucceſsion of his ſon Sultan Achmat, into all his dominions and Empires: whereby we are, as his moſt humble ſubjects, ſummoned to yeeld vnto him our oath of faithfull obedience, as vnto our rightfull Lord, and lawfull ſucceſſour of his father into all his eſtates and dominions.
Moreouer, he particularly commandeth vs, to giue him certaine aduice and knowledge concerning the negotiation of the peace begun betwixt vs and you, by the commandement of his deceaſed father: promiſing to confirme and ratifie all that whatſoeuer he ſhall finde done and agreed vpon concerning that buſineſſe, without any qualification at all. And that if the treaty be not yet concluded and ended, that his will and deſire was, that it ſhould be ſo, according to the juſt means and aſſurances that we ſhould faithfully and carefully together deuiſe. Whereof I ſhould readily giue him aduice and anſwer; which I haue deferred to do, vntill I haue receiued your anſwer, which may inſtruct me what to reſolue vpon.
B Which your anſwer I attending, haue ſtaied the Currour of Conſtantinople, to the intent he may carry backeward vnto our Emperour, what he is to hope for concerning this buſineſſe, by the anſwer that you ſhall giue vs. Theſe are now therefore to aduiſe you, as our deere friend, and a moſt valiant Gouernour, to ſet downe that which you ſhall thinke to be moſt fit and neceſſary in this buſineſſe: giuing you withall to vnderſtand, that our new Emperour is a man of reſolution euen in theſe his young yeares, wherein he now flouriſheth, hating idleneſſe, deeming no loſſe greater, and altogether irrepaireable, than the loſſe of time. If then you be ſtill deſirous, that the peace betwixt our Emperours ſhould be made and confirmed, I hope you will employ your whole endeuour, with ſpeed to determine this moſt happy negotiation, and ſo neceſſary for euery mans good. As alſo to auert farre from our owne heads, the curſes of the common people; C for whom it is moſt needfull that the peace ſhould for their good and quietneſſe be concluded, ſeeing that the fruit thereof is expected to be vnto them happy, and the glory thereof for euer ours, for hauing by our diligence and true endeauour concluded the ſame. Which maketh me to hope, that when you ſhall finde your ſelfe ready to conclude this treaty, you ſhall not bring with you men enemies vnto peace, or ſuch as ſhall diſſuade the ſame; but rather wiſe and graue men, which to the vttermoſt of their power may aduance the ſame; and finde out good and reaſonable meanes to aſſure an eternall and faithfull peace betwixt our Emperours, vnto which ſo generall a good euery one of vs is in duty bound to imploy the vttermoſt of his ſufficiencie and power. And thus is that I haue of truth to write vnto you at this time; And ſo I bid you farewell.

D Now theſe Letters although they moſt concerned the continuation of the treaty of peace, already begun, and were too friendly from an enemy, to haue in them any good meaning, yet did they well aſſure the Colonell to whom they were written, of the death of the great and late Sultan Mahomet, and of the ſucceſſion of his ſonne Achmat into his Empire, to which end they are here ſet downe.

This late mighty Monarch, and now nothing but a loathſome lump of dead fleſh, the great Sultan Mahomet, departed this life about the later end of Ianuary, in the yeare of Grace 1604, (according to their computation which begin their yeare at Chriſtmas) when he had liued about foure and forty yeres, and thereof reigned eight. He was a man of no great ſpirit, and yet exceeding proud; which was the cauſe that he was both the leſſe beloued and feared of his E ſubjects in generall, but eſpecially of the Ianizaries and other his ſouldiers and men of warre, who ſcorning his looſe gouernment, and grieued to ſee euen the greateſt affaires of his State not only imparted to women, but by them mannaged and ouerruled alſo (as by his mother, the Sultaneſſe his wife, and others) not onely rebelled againſt him, but were oftentimes in their rages about to haue depoſed him. He was altogether giuen to ſenſuality & voluptuous pleaſure, the markes whereof he ſtill carried about with him, a foule ſwolne, vnweldy, and ouergrowne body, vnfit for any Princely office or function: and a minde thereto anſwerable, wholly giuen ouer vnto idleneſſe, pleaſure, and exceſſe, no ſmall meanes for the ſhortening of his daies, which he ended with obloquie, vnregarded of his ſubjects, and but of few or none of them lamented.

F He had iſſue foure ſonnes, and three daughters married vnto three of the great Baſſaes.

Mahomet his iſſue.

His firſt and eldeſt ſonne was called Mahomet (after his owne name) whom he cauſed to be ſtrangled in his owne ſight, vpon ſuſpition of aſpiring vnto the Empire, and conſpiring with the Rebels in Aſia: but afterward finding him guiltleſſe, cauſed his body to be buried in his owne Sepulchre, and hanged the Baſſa that had miſ-informed him.

His ſecond ſonne died a naturall death, being yet very young.

His third ſonne was Sultan Achmat, who ſucceeded his father, and came to the Empire by the vntimely death of Mahomet his eldeſt brother.

His fourth ſonne being then a youth of about ſixteene yeares old, was carefully kept within the Seraglio, with ſuch a ſtreit guard ſet ouer him, as that his name was not to be learned, euen by a good vnderſtanding friend of mine, of late lying about three moneths together at Conſtantinople, who moſt curiouſly enquired after the ſame, hauing very good meanes to haue learned it. He was reported to haue been long ſince murthered, howbeit that he of late liued, but looking euery day to be by his brothers cruell commandement ſtrangled, which is accounted but a matter of courſe, and a death hereditary to all the yonger male children of the Othoman Emperours: the policy for the maintenance of their great Empire entire and whole, ſo requiring.

His dead body lyeth buried at Conſtantinople, in a faire Chappell of white Marble (neere vnto the moſt famous and beautifull church of S. Sophia) for that only purpoſe by himſelfe moſt ſumptuouſly built about fifty foot ſquare, with foure high ſmall round towers, about the which are certain ſmall round galleries of ſtone: from which the Turkiſh prieſts and churchmen, at certain houres, vſe to call the people euery day to Church: for they vſe no bels themſelues, neither will they ſuffer the Chriſtians to vſe any. But the top of this Chappell is built round, like vnto the antient temples of the heathen gods in Rome. In the midſt of this Chappell (being indeed nothing elſe but this great Sultans Sepulchre) ſtandeth his tombe, which is nothing elſe but a great vrne or coffin of faire white Marble, wherein lieth his body, couered with a great couering of the ſame ſtone ouer it, made riſing in the midſt, and ſtooping on each ſide: not much vnlike to the coffins of the antient tombes of the Saxon kings, which are to be ſeen on the North ſide of the Quire of S. Pauls Church, and in other places of this land: but that this coffin of the great Sultan is much greater and more ſtately than are thoſe of the Saxon kings; it being aboue fiue foot high at the end therof, and by little and little falling toward the feet, couered with a rich hearſe of cloth of gold downe to the ground: his turbant ſtanding at his head, and two exceeding great candles of white waxe, about three or foure yards long, ſtanding in great braſſe or ſiluer candleſtickes gilded, the one at his head, the other at his feet, which neuer burne, but there ſtand for ſhew only. All the flore of the Chappell being couered with mats, and faire Turky carpets vpon them. And round about this his tombe, euen in the ſame Chappell, are the like tombes for his wiues and children, but nothing ſo great and faire. Into this Chappell, or any other the Turks Churches or Chappels, it is not lawfull for either Turke or Chriſtian to enter, but firſt he muſt put off his ſhooes, leauing them at the church or chappell gate, or carrying them in his hand. Neere vnto this chappell, and the great Temple of Sophia, are diuers other chappels of the other great Turks; as of Sultan Selym, this mans grandfather, with his ſeuen and thirty children about him: of Sultan Amurath, this mans father, with his fiue and forty children entombed about him. And in other places not far from them, are the chappels and ſepulchres of the reſt of the great Sultans; as of Sultan Mahomet the Great, of Sultan Bajazet, Sultan Selym the firſt, Sultan Solyman: all by theſe great Mahometan Emperors built, whoſe names they beare. And being all of almoſt one forme and faſhion, haue euery one of them a faire Hoſpitall adjoyning vnto them, wherein a great multitude of poore people are daily ſtill relieued.

Some others of the great Baſſaes haue their Chappels and Sepulchres, with their great and ſtately almes-houſes alſo, not much inferiour vnto thoſe of the great Sultans; as namely, Ibrahim Baſſa, of all the Baſſaes that euer were amongſt the Turks the moſt magnificent, hath his ſtately chappell, ſepulchre, and almes-houſes, neere both in place and beauty vnto that of Solymans. The Turks bury not at all within their churches, neither are any at all buried within the wals of the city, but the great Turkiſh Emperours themſelues, with their wiues and children about them, and ſome few other of their great Baſſaes, and thoſe only in Chappels by themſelues built for that purpoſe. All the reſt of the Turks are buried in the field; ſome of the better ſort in tombes of marble; but the reſt with tombe ſtones laied vpon them, or with two great ſtones, the one ſet vp at the head, and the other at the feet of euery graue, the greateſt part of them being of white Marble, brought from the Iſle of Marmora. They will not bury any man where another hath beene buried, accounting it impiety to digge vp another mans bones.

A bones. By reaſon wherof they couer al the beſt ground about the city with ſuch white ſtones; which for the infinit number of them are thought ſufficient to make another wall about the City. But now to ſtand no longer about the manner of the Turks burials, leauing this great Sultan to reſt with his anceſtors, let vs now proſecute the courſe of our hiſtory.

Sed quò ſis alijs terror & ira Dei.
Quid turges igitur, faſtuve ſuperbis inani?
Sic te cum miſeris numinis ira premat.
Pone modũ magnis, ni vis ſuccumbere magnus:

Nec tibi promittes regnandi tempora longa Te tua fata vocant, te tua fata premunt.

Thy vertue doth not make thee great, nor yet thy ſtore of pelf; Nor is it thyne own mighty arm that doth exalt thy ſelf.
But God aboue, who with a beck doth ſhake the world from hie; From him all glory doth proceed that doth belong to thee.
He gaue to thee, then but a child, thine empire large and wide;
And giues to thee, now grown a man,

But that to plague the world for ſin he hath appointed thee.
Why doſt thou therfore ſwel with pride,

ACHMAT.

THE LIFE OF ACHMAT, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, EIGHTH EMPEROR OF THE TVRKS.

M*Ahomet* the late Sultan in the midſt of his exceſſiue plea-ſures by vntimely death taken away, Achmat the elder of his two ſonnes yet liuing, who was to ſucceed him in the C Empire, to preuent the vſuall and inſolent tumults of the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court at the change of the Emperours, and to take from them all occaſions of diſcontentment; by the counſell of the great Baſſa's (before he took vpon him the gouernment) cauſed an exceeding great ſum of mony, namely two millions and an half, as a token of his bounty to be diſtributed amongſt them: the Spahi and Siliſtars his chief horſmen receiuing ther-of ten Crownes a man, with fiue aſpers a day more to encreaſe their pay: and the Ianizaries thirty crownes a man, D and on aſper a day of ordinary pay: they of his court, eſpecially the chiefe officers, taſting of this his bounteous liberality alſo. With which ſo great a largeſſe all men well contented, he in a moſt rich and ſtately Chariot, ſo placed as that all men might ſee him, was in great majeſtie carried thorow all the chiefe ſtreets of Conſtantinople, the people on euery ſide gazing vpon him, and ſtill as he paſſed by them, proſecuting him with their moſt ioiful and happy acclamations. Some wiſhing, that he being but young might (as another Solyman) beginne his reign with the conqueſt of Malta, as had the other with the conqueſt of the Rhodes: & other-ſome as heartily praying, that with glorious and victorious conqueſts hee might be like vnto Mahomet the Great, whom he was then reported much to reſemble. In which ſo great & publique magnificence, he being about 15 years old, was with all the accuſtomed ſolemnities o-E penly crowned, euery man wiſhing vnto him a moſt long and happy reign. And albeit that no great fruit was for the preſent to be expected from ſo yong and tender a plant, yet neuertheleſſe by his authoritie and in his name many good orders were taken for the reliefe of his ſubiects, with moſt heauy grieuances generally oppreſſed, during the looſe and careles reign of his father. His grandmother alſo, a moſt proud, ambitious and imperious woman, & with-all exceeding rich, who with great authority ouer-ruled all in the time of her ſonne Mahomets reign, he now remoued from the ſtate, as not fit for her to haue to do therein, and ſo depriued her of all her former power and command. The Perſian Embaſſador, whom his father in his diſpleaſure had cloſe ſhut vp, he ſet at liberty, and with him ſent the Baſſa of Aleppo to entreat of peace with the great Shaugh of Perſia, who not long before (as was reported) had F recouered the great city of Tauris, and was then preparing himſelf for new conqueſts. Which report for the motion of peace with the Perſian diſcouered in his ſubiects their diuers opinions concerning himſelf; ſome condemning his patience, as not beſeeming the Othoman Em-perors, vnto whom fury and rage had alwaies made them a way vnto their great and dreadfull

conqueſts, euen againſt the moſt puiſſant armies and ſtrongeſt townes and fortreſſes of their enemies: and ſome other to the contrary prayſing therein his wiſedome, in ſeeking by faire means (now in the beginning of his reigne) to diſ-arme his enemies when they might moſt hurt him; at his better opportunitie, in his ſetled eſtate, to oppreſſe them for euer. So the actions of Princes are like vnto ſtrange lights appearing by night in the ayre, which hold mens eyes buſied with the intentiue beholding of them, ſome thereof diuining well, and ſome others euill, according to the diuerſitie of the beholders conceits and humors.

The treaty for peace alſo in Hungary was notwithſtanding the death of Mahomet, by the Baſſa of Buda ſtill continued, who (as he ſaid) by the new Sultan authoriſed, by letters incited the Gouernor of Strigonium to repaire vnto ſome ſuch conuenient place as wherein the matter might be ſafely concluded. Vpon which motion the Gouernor with the reſt of the Commiſſioners departing from Strigonium, the fourth of February came to Collonitz his Campe, from whence they were by the ſoldiers moſt brauely conducted along the banks of Danubius, vnto the ſhips which lay ready for them, to carry them downe the riuer to Peſth: during which time of their paſſage nothing was to bee ſeene or heard but fire and ſmoake, and the thundring of the great Artillery both from Peſth and Buda, the Chriſtians and the Turks both ſtriuing to excell each other in theſe their ſhewes of ioy and triumph. The Gouernour with the reſt of his company being happily arriued at Peſth, met there with a number of the better ſort of the Turks ſent thither by the Baſſa to meet him, and in his name to greet him: who with a thouſand honours againe receiued and ſaluted them. All ſhewes of kindneſſe, and ſignes of the happy ſucceſſe of the negotiation begun. And now the Chriſtians deſirous to excell the Turks, as well in courteſie as in valor, appointed a number of them the next day to goe to Buda, to inuite certaine of the chiefeſt and moſt honourable men amongſt the Turks, vnto a banquet at Peſth: Who willingly accepted of the offer, and ſo came ſix hundred of the better ſort of them ouer the Danubie to Peſth, where the feaſt was moſt ſumptuouſly and magnificently prepared for them. There were ten faire and rich pauilions ſet vp for the entertainment of them a little diſtant from Peſth, in a faire place, and fit for this purpoſe. In the firſt whereof were placed three very proud and ſtately tables. At the firſt of which tables, on the right hand, were ſet the Commiſſioners for the Emperour, with the two Baſſaes, and one Mufti or Arch-Prieſt, with a Mitre vpon his head, a long furred gowne vpon his back, and vnder that, a robe of moſt fine and exceeding rich ſilke. Vpon the left hand, at the ſame table were placed certain of the Turks Lords, and other great men. At the other two tables were ſet other of the beſt ſort of the Turks mingled with the Chriſtians: and ſo at all the other tables in like order were ſet a Chriſtian and a Turke, vntill that the ſix hundred Turks were placed, with as many Chriſtians among them: who by their good countenance and behauiour one of them to another, might haue ſeemed to haue been all of one & the ſame Beliefe, Nation, and Countrey. The Turks after the manner of their ſuperſtition, would not ſit downe before the ſetting of the Sunne, which being ſet, they with a thouſand Ceremonies, to the imitation of their Archprieſt, ſet themſelues down at the tables in order as is aforeſaid, and there merrily repoſed themſelues vntill nine of the clocke at night. At which time the tables with great reuerence taken away, the Turks as men well contented, and full of ioy returned to Buda, the inſtruments of muſicke, trumpets, and Drummes, on euery ſide ſounding about them with much glee, and as it were witneſſing to heauen and earth the great contentment they had receiued. Yet for all this fair ſhew, nothing but deep diſſimulation, mixt with foul treaſon: For a little before their departure, they of Peſth were aduertiſed, That the Turks in great number wel appointed, were come out from Buda to ſurpriſe Peſth during the time of the feaſt, being in hope that the Chriſtians all buſied in that action, had left the towne walls vnfurniſhed of defence. But they too wel acquainted with their trecheries, to put any truſt or confidence in their fair ſhewes, had as well prouided for the defence of the town, as for the magnificence of the feaſt abroad. By which meanes the Turkes diſappointed of their intended purpoſe, were in the attempting thereof repulſed, and ſo glad to return as they came, backe againe vnto Buda.

The Turks ſeek to ſurpriſe Peſth.

The next day after, the Emperours Commiſſioners complained vnto the Baſſa and the reſt of the Turks Commiſſioners, of this ſo trecherous dealing. Who excuſed themſelues as altogether

A together ignorant therof; diſauowing the action for want of ſucces, which had it bin effected, they would to the vttermoſt moſt ſhamefully haue maintained. An ordinary courſe among the Great, with ſpeech and countenance in ſhew to condemn that for want of effect, which in heart and mind they could for their own profit haue wiſhed had bin performed.

Neuertheleſſe the Turkes the next day (as if no ſuch thing had bin meant) requeſted the Chriſtian commiſſioners to come to Buda, as they had don to Peſth: but they, as wel by proof as by report, perceiuing the euil meaning of the Turks, excuſing themſelues returned to Strigonium, as loth any more to aduenture themſelues into the power of their faithles enemies: yet left they Geisberg at Peſth, with Commiſſion to continue the negotiation for peace with the Baſſa of Buda: if he ſhould find him therunto diſpoſed, or any hope of bringing the trea-B tie to good effect or iſſue.

Mahomet the late Sultan had a little before his death (as is declared) ſet at liberty County Tſolan (caried away priſoner to Conſtantinople after the taking of Alba-Regalis) and ſent him with Letters of Credence to intreat of a peace to be made with the Emperor; with promiſe to yeeld himſelf againe priſoner, if he failed to obtain the ſame: for whom the French Embaſſador became pledge. He hauing now deliuered his letters of Credence vnto the Emperor, and commanded to ſay what he had further in charge; declared, That the great Sultan offered to deliuer vnto his Majeſty the ſtrong townes of Buda, Alba-Regalis, and Caniſia, in exchange of Tranſyluania and Valachia, wherto he laid claim; promiſing for his part to make a moſt ſure & firm peace with the Emperor for time to come, and to giue him ſuch aſſurance C therof as ſhould of him reaſonably be demanded.

Count Tſolans meſſage from the great Sultan to the Emperor.

The Baſſa of Buda alſo amongſt other the fair remonſtrances of peace, had offered vnto the Emperors Commiſſioners to reſtore Caniſia and Agria, for Peſth, Hatwan and Vacia, together with the remiſſion of all ſuch paiments and tributes as were by the Emperour due to the great Sultan for the kingdom of Hungary. All which fair ſhews and offers, though much vnreaſonable, were nothing but windy words to delay the time, and ſubtil baits to deceiue the Chriſtians: for the euent and iſſue which giueth life to all actions, with a form to them agreeable, hath by experience taught the Chriſtians, that all the glorious and glozing proceedings of the Turks in this buſines of the peace, ſo much wiſhed and expected of the Chriſtians, were but nets and ſnares wherwith to intangle them with the vain hope thereof, vntil that they in D the mean time might fortifie their townes with new ſupply of men, munition, victuals, and whatſoeuer elſe was needful, the more eaſily afterward to anoy them at their pleaſure, and ſo to laugh at their ſimplicitie and light beleefe. For Mahomet being dead, and Achmat his ſon (yet by reaſon of his minoritie, vnder the tuition of his mother and other the great Baſſa's) ſucceeding in his place, the Turkes aggrauated the conditions of the peace, and propounded them ſo farre from reaſon, as that any man might ſee them now to haue no more deſire or regard of peace, after they had diſpatched that for which they ſeemed before ſo deſirous of it. Inſomuch, that they ſent a meſſenger in poſt from Conſtantinople to the Baſſa of Buda, to forbid him vpon pain of his head, any further to continue the treaty of peace, but forthwith to renew the War. So this peace ſo much expected, and now of the people generally hol-E den for as good as concluded, ſuddenly vaniſhed into ſmoke; nothing remaining of that body, compoſed of ſo many wiſhes, more than a vain expectation, now diſperſed with the winde of the Turkiſh trechery. And yet during the time of this negotiation of peace, ſought for by the Turks both by often letters and meſſengers, many a ſolemn oath had paſſed both from the Sultan Mahomet, and from the Viſier Baſſa, for their faithfull and ſincere dealing in the treaty therof; as, By the God of heauen and earth, By the Books of Moſes, By the Pſalmes of Dauid, and By the holy Euangeliſts: oathes much vſed of the Turkes, and reſerued for their greateſt ſolemnities, and ſtrongeſt aſſurances of their leagues and promiſes. All which for al that, hauing ſerued but as baits and traines to beguile the ſimple and well meaning men, lay now neglected and vnregarded. Such is the faith and aſſurance which men haue from faith-F leſſe Infidels.

The treaty of peace thus broken off, it was forthwith by ſome bruited, That Achmat the great Sultan, vnder the conduct of the Viſier Baſſa his gouernor, was himſelf in perſon with a moſt huge army about to come into Hungary. Some others in the meane time reporting, that he was letted ſo to do by reaſon of the Perſian Wars, whereunto hee was of neceſſitie to G ſend the greateſt part of his forces; ſo that hee would but only ſend one of his great Baſſa's with the remainder of his ſo great an army againſt the Chriſtians into Hungary, being before ſworn neuer to return again to Conſtantinople, vntil he had brought the countries of Tranſilvania and Valachia, with the remainder of Hungary, vnder the great Sultans obeiſance, together with the country of Auſtria, and eſpecially the ſtrong city of Vienna, the end of the Turkiſh Emperors conqueſts. And that to this purpoſe the grand Seignior had in al places with great rigor leuied large ſums of money vpon his ſubiects for the maintenance of his ſo great an army. It was by others alſo reported, That onely the preparations for ſo great an Army ſhould be made this year, the Turks being reſolued to do much therwith the next year, and therfore willing to beſtow much, in hope with ſo great and puiſſant an Army as they were about H to raiſe, to end the wars in Hungary, and not to return vntil they conquered all the reſt of that kingdom, in the rent reliques wherof the Othoman Emperors had ſtaid. So that all handicrafts men were ſet to worke both night and day, not onely to forge Weapons, to caſt great Ordnance, and to make pouder, but to prepare all other things neceſſarie alſo for ſo great an exployt.

All theſe great preparations were made for the ſeruice of the Viſier Baſſa for the War in Hungary, and of Cicala Baſſa in Perſia; wherof he was appointed Generall, hauing before preſumptuouſly promiſed, vtterly to ruinat the Perſians eſtate, and with ſo great a power euen to ſwallow him vp. And indeed theſe Eaſtern wars much troubled the Turks, news comming ſtil concerning the conqueſts of the Perſian vpon his territories; and that euen of late the Perſian I king proſecuting his victories, had taken Babylon with all the country round about; and that diuers other towns and cities, more moued with fear, than with the faith wherewith they had bound themſelues vnto the Turks, now yeelded to the Perſian, as weary of the Turkes ſeruitude, and deſirous of their antient liberty. And yet for all that, the Turkes (as they are wiſe to diſſemble their loſſes, and to ſtrike a fear into their enemies) had giuen it out in Conſtantinople, That the Perſian king was neer vnto Babylon diſcomfited, all his army ouerthrowne, and he himſelfe taken priſoner. So that the Turkes forces before diſtracted, ſhould wholly ioine together, to the vtter ruine and deſtruction of the Chriſtians in Hungary. And the more to confirm this euil newes, it was reported, That the Beglerbeg of Grecia had raiſed a great power to ioine with the Viſier Baſſa his forces, to the intent to leaue nothing vnconquered in K Hungary. For the better effecting wherof it was ſaid alſo, That the Viſier Baſſa had cauſed a great number of Veſſels loded with pouder and other warlike prouiſion, to be brought by water out of Egypt to Belgrade, to ruinate the eſtate of the Chriſtians. All which reports were by the Turks giuen out, to couer their own miſhaps, and to terrifie their enemies: as knowing right well, Warres to depend much vpon reports, and that a falſe bruit once beleeued, often worketh the effect of a thing indeed don. Howſoeuer it was, thoſe ſo dreadful reports might well haue ſerued to haue ſtirred vp the ſpirits of the Chriſtians, to haue prouided for their owne defence, and to haue ſtood vpon their gard. For he that faileth to prouide againſt the preparations of his enemy, well deſerueth either bondage or death, which ſoeuer ſhall befall him, for hauing by his negligence betrayed his owne abilitie and power to haue withſtood L him.

The great report of the Turks preparations and forces had now daſht all the talk of peace at Conſtantinople, and the hot fire of ambition had quite ſcorched the ſweet flours appearing vpon the ouerture of the late hope of the common repoſe; ſome perſuading the great Sultan, That he was able by his power at the ſame time both to ſubdue the Perſian King, and to confound the whole forces of the Chriſtian Emperor, hauing ſo many great kingdoms within his Empire, ſo many Armouries ſtored for his ſeruice, and ſuch ſtore of treaſure ready for his deſignes; promiſing vnto him moſt happy and eaſie ſucceſſe both in the one and the other expeditions, euen at one and the ſelfe ſame time: ſo that hee might vanquiſh the Perſian by Cicala, chiefe Commander of his Army in Perſia; and conquer the remainder of Hungarie, M with the Countries of Tranſylvania and Valachia, by the Viſier Baſſa Generall of his forces againſt the Chriſtians. It being (as they ſaid) a thing both honourable and profitable for a Prince, to beſtow both men and money, thereby to gaine men, honour, and Empire: ſo that

A things which with great charge might be done all at once, were more profitable than thoſe which with leſſe charge were don at diuers times; for that things ſo don at once yeelded preſent profit, as being in our power, and recompencing the charge: the other in long time putting vs to great charge, and yeelding little or no profit at all. And indeed men ſtood in great fear of this the Turks yong Emperour, who was by nature fierce, haſty, vigilant, cruel, ambitious and proud, in his behauior and actions much reſembling Mahomet the ſecond, hee which took from the Chriſtians ſo many kingdoms, towns, and cities, and among the reſt, the Imperial city of Conſtantinople. He like a yong Alexander occupied himſelſe in all the exerciſes of war, hated idlenes, his fathers greateſt pleaſure; he cauſed Arms to be made, cannos to bee caſt, ſhips and gallies to be built, and took pleaſure to diſcourſe how the ſame were to be B imploied againſt his enemies: ſo that it was greatly feared, that he being but a child in Conſtantinople, would proue a man grown in Chriſtendom, in bringing the ſame vnder his power and obeiſance. He ſpared no perſon nor means to ſatisfie his deſire. So that ſtrangers were to expect ſmall curteſies at his hands, when as they ſaw him vſe ſuch bloudy cruelty againſt his nobles and domeſtick ſeruants, of whom ſoon after he was Emperour he put diuers to death, with one of the Baſſa's alſo, who was Gouernor of Peſth when as our men won it. But as juſtice and clemencie to good Princes are the ſureſt tyes to keep their ſubjects faſt bound vnto them in their obedience and duties; ſo are cruelty and rage the chiefeſt bridles wherwith the Turkiſh Emperors keep their ſubjects in awe and ſubjection vnto them, and themſelues in their eſtate.

The diſpoſition of Achmat.

C But leauing the Turks buſied about their preparations for the accompliſhment of their yong Emperors high deſignes, let vs return into Hungary, taking Tranſylvania in our way; the wofull miſeries of which Country my mind abhorreth to think vpon, and my pen therof to write. This Prouince, ſomtimes much renowned for the great victories obtained againſt the Turks by the inhabitants therof, vnder the leading of their valiant Prince Sigiſmund Bator and others, and abounding with plenty of al things, was now not by any inuaſion of the Turks, but by ciuill diſcord amongſt themſelues, and rebellion againſt the Emperour, now their Soueraign, ſo waſted and ſpoiled by the ſouldiers of all ſorts, that many of the poor inhabitants for want of food fell down dead as they went in the ſtreets and fields: miſerable Wretches, alwaies ſowing, but neuer reaping; alwaies labouring, but nothing profiting, the merciles and D greedy ſouldier ſtill ſpoyling and deuouring all. By long continuance of which daily outrages the fields at length lay now vntilled, the paſtures vnſtored and neglected, and all things els vnmanured and quite out of courſe. By means wherof the famin ſo increaſed, that the poor peaſants of the country hauing eaten vp for great dainties, all the dogs, cats, mice and rats that they could get, fell to eating of dead horſes, and the loathſom carrion of other hunger-ſtarued beaſts. It is reported alſo, That one man ſhould eat another: and that at Hermanſtat a woman hauing ſix children, did among them eat one another, vntill they were at length all ſix deuoured. And contrariwiſe, That two men did eat one another. Yea, theeues & malefactors hanged for their villanies, were by the poor and miſerable hungry people cut down from the Gallows, and deuoured; the people generally liuing vpon nothing but the roots of E Weeds, green herbs, and the leaues of trees.

The miſery of Tranſylvania.

An horrible famine.

For remedy of which ſo extream miſeries, it was on al parts agreed, that a general aſſembly of the States of the whole prouince ſhould be holden at Dewa. Wherin it was accorded, that all hoſtility ſet apart, the Gentlemen of Tranſylvania hauing by their rebellion forfeited both their liues and lands, ſhould be pardoned their liues, with three fourth parts of their lands reſerued vnto them; and that for ready mony they might of the Emperour redeem the fourth part alſo. But concerning the moueables of ſuch as were dead in the time of theſe troubles, and already confiſcat vnto the Emperour, they ſhould ſo remaine; and that they ſhould pay their diſms or tenth part of their wines and fruits vnto the Emperour. And further, That there ſhould be no further exerciſe of religion permitted vnto them, but onely the F Romiſh religion. And that the towns of Cronſtadt and Clauſenburg ſhould within 3 weeks after, pay, one of them 20000 dollars, and the other 8000: And the Magiſtrats of thoſe places ſhould deliuer the keyes of their towns, with all their power, into the hands of the Emperors Lieutenant: and that the Gentlemen of theſe Towns which would not be accounted in the number of the rebels,ſhould for the ſafety of their perſons take letters of pardon for their rebellion,of the General of the Army. This pacification gaue ſome little time of breathing vnto this poor diſtreſſed Country, which bared of all ſtrength,and as it were vpon the graues brink,had now but euen the laſt gaſp to giue; and the Countrey people began again to giue themſelues vnto their wonted labours,in hope at length to reap the profit therof themſelues.

But alas all in vain: for why, the rauening ſouldiers inured to prey, after their wonted maner made hauock and ſpoil of all things,leauing nothing vnto the poor Country man but his labor for his pain,and time enough to bewail his manifold and remedileſſe miſeries. The chief cauſes wherof were the Nobility and Gentlemen themſelues,who not liking to be gouerned, or rather (as they tooke it) oppreſſed by the Germans; and hauing not vpon any deſire that they had of peace, but rather by neceſſity inforced, yeelded vnto the Pacification aforeſayd, ceaſed not ſtil vnder-hand to incite the ſouldiers (ready enough of themſelues to doe miſchief) and in what they might to trouble the State, being gouerned by the Germans,whom they accounted as meer ſtrangers. All which their doings Baſta the Emperors Lieutenant perceiuing, cauſed three of the greateſt of the Gentlemen of the country, and whom he moſt ſuſpected to be the authors of theſe troubles, to be apprehended, and faſt mured vp betwixt two ſtrong walls in an old ruinous Monaſtery. Whither their friends afterward comming to viſit them, & finding them ſtarued to death,were therwith much abaſhed,as were alſo others their complices when they heard therof.

But leauing them to work themſelues further troubles, let vs againe return to the Turkes affairs.

The Turks deal deceitfuly with the Christians.

Now was all the hope of peace betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks become deſperat,the Turks making therof no more account, ſeeing they had according to their deſire prouided Alba-Regalis, Agria,and Buda,of all things neceſſary. They had in four wagons put into Agria the pay due vnto their garriſons: ſo that their affairs being now in good eſtate,and their courage reuiued, they began to ſcoffe and jeſt at our incredulity, to beleeue that they euer had any purpoſe to conclude vpon any thing that was not agreeing with their profit, how far ſoeuer it were differing from their honor or faith. So that now theſe faithleſſe men began again to renue their wonted incurſions and pillages vpon the Chriſtians, with all other kinds of hoſtility,and that in more cruel maner than euer before: and our Huſſars on the other ſide well requited them with the like, beeing as well contented as they with ſuch doings, their whole fortune depending vpon the points of their weapons,& euer ready to ſerue their prince for pay. Now it fortuned that fourſcore of the Turks going forth to ſeek for prey,chanced to meet with certain of theſe Huſſars,and finding themſelues too weake to incounter with our men,and betaking themſelues to flight,were certain of them taken priſoners, and ſo brought vnto the Generall; vnto whom they vpon examination confeſſed, That the Turks much maruelled at the ſimplicity and fooliſhnes of the Chriſtians, to beleeue that they were deſirous of peace,and not to haue diſcouered their manifeſt intentions to the contrary, tending onely to the pleaſuring of themſelues,and the annoying of them their enemies, to the ſtrengthning of themſelues,and deſtruction of the Chriſtians: as by proof it appeared, ſo ſoon as their deſires were accompliſhed. And that their yong Emperour was alwaies againſt this treaty of peace,what ſhew ſoeuer he made to the contrary, conſtrained therunto by the victories and conqueſts of the Perſian King: all his wiſhes and deſires aiming at no other end, than at the general ruin of all Chriſtendom.

Our gariſons ſeeing themſelues thus charged by the Turks, took vp arms alſo, requiting them with the like outrages. They of Pappa and Veſprinium were the firſt that began theſe broils after the treaty of peace; who hauing joined their forces together, and making head toward Alba-Regalis,met with a number of Turks, driuing ſheep and cattell thither; whom they ſurpriſed, and together with their cattel caried away priſoners. Which good hap was ſeconded with the liberty of 20 Chriſtian priſoners from Buda: who one night ſeeing their Keepers oppreſſed with ſleep and wine, cut their throats, and ſo happily eſcaped ouer the Riuer to Peſth.

Now whilſt theſe troubles betwixt the Chriſtians and Turkes (after the treaty of peace broken of) thus began again in Hungary, the Turks, beſide the rebellion in Aſia, were together by the ears in the prouince of Boſna. Zellaly hauing by force joined with policie, driuen Zeffer Baſſa (as is before ſaid) out of Boſna, and poſſeſſed himſelſe of that prouince, thought himſelſe now ſure enough within the ſtrength of his gouernment, although he beeing by the great Sultan ſent for to Conſtantinople, refuſed to come, as knowing right well himſelſe to hold that ſo great a gouernment much againſt his will and pleaſure. But Zeffer Baſſa now ſupported with the authoritie of the great Sultan, and deſirous to be reuenged of the diſhonour and loſſe he had before receiued from Zellaly his enemy, with a great army ſuddenly entred into Boſna, and ſo comming vpon Zellaly, fearing as then no ſuch matter, ouerthrew him with all his power, and neuer left purſuing of him, til he had chaſed him out of the prouince, and ſo again recouered the gouernment therof vnto himſelf. But ſhort was the ioy which the Baſſa receiued of this ſo pleaſing a victory, for within a few daies after hee died; comforting himſelſe in this, That he died not vnreuenged. Of all which things the great Baſſa's of the court hauing vnderſtanding, and loth to loſe ſo great a ſoldier as was Zellaly (who as a man diſtreſſed was now making ſhift for himſelſe) or by vſing of him hardly, to deterre the other Aſian Rebels from comming in, and yet not willing to truſt him with the gouernment of ſo great a prouince as was Boſna; they to prouide for all euents appointed him to be gouernor of Temeſware; and Begedes Baſſa (before Gouernour there) to ſucceed Zeffer Baſſa in the gouernment of Boſna. Therby contenting all parties, to keepe their forces whole and entire againſt the Chriſtians.

Colonel Althem his regiment in mutiny.

But as the Turks were troubled with their affaires in Boſna, ſo the Chriſtians were no leſſe but rather more buſied with theirs both in Tranſylvania and Hungary. The Eſtates of Hungary had appointed a generall meeting at Poſſonium, wherein the Archduke Matthias was to ſit as Preſident, there to conſult of the means for the maintenance of this yeares wars againſt the Turks. But as the Archduke was about to haue entred into the city in the middeſt of his ſoldiers, ſuch a fire vpon the ſudden aroſe in the city as conſumed the greateſt part therof: an ill preſage of the action then in hand, and a wofull ſpectacle to behold; with the terror wherof al mens minds poſſeſſed, turned them from the magnificent entertaining of the Archduke (which was before determined) to the quenching of the raging fire, as more neceſſary & concerning them than the other. Beſides that, the miſeries then to be ſeene in the other parts of Hungary yet holden by the Chriſtians, were both great and lamentable; for beſide the harms therin done by the Turks, the regiment of Colonel Althem had made ſuch ſpoil and hauock all ouer the country where it lay, that the towns and people in general ſo grieuouſly complained therof vnto the Emperor, that he mooued with their iuſt complaints, cauſed the authors of theſe ſo great outrages to be apprehended and brought priſoners to Vienna, where ſome of them were beheaded, and ſome others of them hanged. Beſides whom ſo condemned and executed, there were ſome other Captains and Lieutenants, of whom ſome denying the fact, and other ſome ſtanding vpon the iuſtifying of that they had done, as therunto by extream neceſſitie inforced, were for their further triall ſent priſoners vnto Prague, were they were committed to priſon into the Caſtle vntill their cauſes might be heard. Amongſt which Captaines and Lieutenants, and other great officers, was one Genderot, Colonel Althems Antient, who moſt wickedly a little before had ſlain Nudercy, a gentleman of good ſort, and his fellow companion in Arms. For which murther hee was committed priſoner into a very high and ſtrong tower within the Caſtle, (wherin County Paradiſer who ſold Caniſia vnto the Turks, lay ſometime priſoner) vntil his trial might within a few daies after bee made: the horror of which criminall place, together with the guilt of conſcience, ſo troubled and wounded the minde of Genderot, as that all the hope now to ſaue his life was by making an eſcape, and ſo to auoid the ſtroke of Iuſtice. Which he happily brought to paſſe by the help of one of his Lacquies, who had found means to bring vnto him a little cord, wherby ſtraining himſelf out at a little window (by which it was thought almoſt impoſſible for any man to haue got out) he ſafely got down to the ground, and there hauing two good horſes ready for him, hee with his man fled amain, and ſo eſcaped, his Keepers drunk ouer night, being in the morning found yet ſleeping, without perceiuing any thing; whoſe drunkennes and fauor toward the priſoner had giuen him meanes to eſcape. The reſt of the captains and lieutenants in priſon at Prague G were ſome of them beheaded, and ſome of them hanged, and the reſt at the interceſſion of the Nobilitie of Auſtria, and of other great men pardoned, yet with condition, That they ſhould pay the fines ſet vpon them, and ſerue their Emperor in his wars three months of their owne charge without pay: ſome few of the common ſouldiers, to the terrour of others had two of the fore fingers of their right hands cut off, and afterwards faſt nailed vnto gibbets ſet vp by the high waies ſide.

The Regiment of Colonell Meysberg in mutiny

In like maner alſo the regiment of Colonel Meysberg roſe in mutinie for their pay & came and incamped at Sneche, about a league from Vienna, threatning to deſtroy the countrey, and to kill the chiefe men therein, if they were not paied their pay. Which rebellious mutiny the Captains did what they might to appeaſe; they beſought them, but in vaine; they intreated H them, but to no purpoſe; they promiſed them pay, but preuailed not, yea, the Colonell himſelfe thruſt himſelfe into the midſt of them, with moſt earneſt prayers, and his hands caſt vp, putting them in mind of their duty, and laying before them the danger of moſt aſſured death and diſhonour, if they continued further to proceed in that their diſloyaltie, whereunto their headſtrong fury ſo diſorderly led them. But they as men inraged, carried headlong with their fury, breathing nothing but threats and deſtruction, and by no praiers or perſuaſion to be moued, preſently made choice of another Chiefetaine, vnder whoſe conduct and leading they reſolued to rifle the ſuburbs of Vienna, and with the ſpoyle of them to pay themſelues. Vpon which reſolution they marched on, and ſo drew neere vnto the city: with which their ſo great and dangerous an inſolencie the Gouernors of the city moued (the ſufferance whereof, they ac- I counted to be to themſelues both diſhonorable and harmfull) they on the other ſide reſolued by plaine force to repreſſe them, and by iuſt armes to chaſtiſe them, who were not otherwiſe to be reclaimed. But ſuch be the miſerable calamities of warre, where violent remedies muſt purge out of the body of the commonweale the good humors together with the bad, ſo to recouer the health thereof: which remedies, not but vpon neceſſity to be vſed, are ſo quicke and violent in their working, as that they afford not leiſure to diſcerne the whole and ſound from the ſick and infected, to ſaue the one, and to ſpill the other, but that they muſt altogether run the ſelfe ſame way. For albeit that the whole regiment was in this mutinous action, and ſo all in like danger, yet were they not therof all alike guilty, many of them being euen againſt their wils and good liking carried away headlong, as with the violent courſe of an headie riuer. K

Now the Captaines of the towne with their troupes and companies, ſtrengthned with ſome other ſupply ſent from other places, were to ſet forward againſt theſe rebellious mutiners, and to fruſtrate their deſignes: for the greater ſtrengthning of whom, diuers of the burgeſſes of the towne were inforced to enter into this action alſo: amongſt whom, there were two accounted very honeſt religious men, who by all meanes ſought to excuſe themſelues from going, labouring both by liuely reaſons, and by the Word of God, to proue, that they neither might nor ought of right to enter into armes againſt their Chriſtian brethren, inforced with extremities, for want of their due pay, to forget their duty, and to do that beſeemed them not. But what auaileth it to alleadge either reaſon or law amongſt the clattering L of armes, the noiſe whereof is ſo great, as that Reaſon and Law cannot there be heard. Theſe two men ſeeing themſelues inforced to goe, and much grieued in conſcience to do that they were inioyned to do, and to help to ſhed the guiltleſſe bloud of their innocent brethren (as they accounted them) entred both of them into a moſt ſtrange and wofull reſolution, which was to die themſelues, rather than to imbrue their hands with the bloud of the guiltleſſe: whereupon one of them hauing oftentimes called vpon the name of Ieſus, with his owne ſword thruſt himſelfe through the body, and ſo died: the other vpon the like reſolution threw himſelfe into the riuer, and ſo periſhed alſo: men worthy to be pittied for their conſcience ſake, but iuſtly to be condemned for their ſo weake and deſperat a reſolution. In fine, the rebellious mutiners ſeeing in what perill they were, being euen now ready to bee charged, and withall conſidering the weakneſſe of their power in compariſon of them that came againſt M them, thought it beſt vpon the ſight of ſo great a tempeſt to ſtrike ſail; and ſo changing their [illegible]ination, and laying downe their armes, craued pardon of the Archduke; who [illegible] them, and ſo tooke them to his mercy; yet with condition, that they ſhould

A ſhould again return vnto their gariſons, and deliuer into his hands the ring leaders and chief authors of that mutiny to be puniſhed according to their deſerts, as afterwards they were: the ordinary end of ſuch inſolent and diſordered actions, which haue nothing aſſured vnto them but death, which (all things els failing) attendeth only vpon them.

But while the Chriſtians thus diuided were at variance among themſelues, the Turks were ready enough to take aduantage of ſuch their dangerous diſcord. And firſt of all Zellaly the old Rebell, but now gouernor of Temeſware, hauing in his crafty head plotted the taking of the city of Lippa by ſurpriſe, and to that purpoſe gathering together the greateſt power hee was able to make, in the euening ſet forward from Temeſwar, and ſo trauelling by night came to Lippa, vnto the walls wherof he planted ſcaling ladders, and at the ſame time laboured to B haue forced the gates, in hope ſo to haue gained the town. Which was done with ſuch a terrible noiſe and outcry as was poſſible by the Turks to be made, after that they were once diſcouered, therby to haue diſmaied the Chriſtians within the town: Who wel acquainted with ſuch ſtratagems of their enemies, and now therwith awaked, came readily to the walls, and there ſo well defended themſelues and their towne, that the Turks being repulſed, were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and hauing loſt a number of their men, with all ſpeed to retyre. Vpon whom the Chriſtians ſallying out, ſlew many of them in that their diſordered retreat, little differing from plaine flight, and tooke many more of them priſoners. Yea Zellaly, who not many hours before had thought to haue ſurpriſed Lippa, was now glad himſelfe to haue recouered the walls of Temeſwar.

C Some of the Turks that were there taken priſoners, being examined, reported, That the army that was this year to come into Hungary was like to be very great; and that a part thereof was now come to Belgrade, expecting there the comming of the Tartars, who were together with them to enter into Hungary. And that by reaſon of the wars in Perſia, which deuoured almoſt all the ſoldiers in Conſtantinople, and yet could not be therewith ſatisfied; the great Sultan had commanded, That all ſuch as were able to bear armes, as well in Boſna, as in that part of Hungary which was ſubiect vnto him, and in the other prouinces therunto adioyning, ſhould be ready to join with his army in Hungary, for the furthering of his conqueſts there. And that the Perſian King proſecuting the courſe of his victory, had ouerthrown Cicala Baſſa with his Army, and taken his ſonne priſoner, almoſt ſlain all his troupes; and entred into con-D federacie with Caracaſe chiefe of the Aſian rebels, a man of great power, who had following of him a great number of valiant men, al reſolutely ſet down for the troubling of the great Sultans eſtate.

About the ſame time the gouernor of Caſſovia (a great and ſtrong town in the vpper part of Hungary) going forth with a good part of his Garriſon to appeaſe the ſouldiers lying about in the Countrey (but now vp in mutinie for their pay) and there ſpending ſome few days about this buſineſſe, in ſhewing them the danger of this their inſolencie, and perſuading of them by the euill ſucceſſe and end of ſuch like actions, to returne againe vnto their duties; and they againe on the contrary ſide, obſtinately vrging the payment of their pay, or elſe to haue leaue to depart, as being not able longer to continue without the one or the other: And E ſo the time paſſing, it fortuned that certain Turks then priſoners at Caſſovia, incouraged by the abſence of the Gouernor and of the garriſon ſouldiers, to attempt the gaining of their liberty, brake their irons, and ſlew their keepers, in hope ſo to haue eſcaped: but beeing in the doing therof diſcouered, and ſo againe ſurpriſed before they could do any further harme, and by torture examined, by what means they thought to haue eſcaped out of the City, the walls thereof being kept with continually Sentinels; they confeſſed, That their purpoſe was, the ſame night to haue ſet fire vpon diuers places of the city (ſo to haue drawn the people to the quenching therof) and at the ſame time to haue ſlain the Sentinels vpon the walls, and ſo to haue made their eſcape. For which their ſo miſchieuous a fact and purpoſe, they were ſome of them executed, and the reſt again committed to priſon, were more ſtreitly kept and lookt F to than before.

Now as Caſſovia had by Gods prouidence thus eſcaped ſo great an intended miſchief, Caniſia at the ſame time alone felt the euil hap by the Turks intended both to Caſſovia & Lippa; for a ſouldier in garriſon in the citadel there, hauing through negligence or miſhap caſt fire into the pouder prouided for the ſtore of the caſtle,the pouder taking fire,blew vp the citadel, the towers,the houſes & walls;and to be brief,made this poor place like another Rome burnt by Nero. So that had any of the Chriſtian forces bin then neere the place,it had bin an eaſie matter to haue won the ſame;as wel for the ſmal reſiſtance that was therin to haue been found,in ſo great aſtoniſhment of the men,and deſtruction of the place. But ſuch accidents haue no certain hours limited to their beginnings,nor aſſurance of their comming;ſo that oftentimes they chance without any man to make vſe of them,and again fly away when greateſt preparation is made to obtain them.

At the ſame time the Turks of Buda ſent two hundred of the ſoldiers of their garriſon to fetch in forrage a little from Peſth: Who as they were in the doing thereof too preſumptuous, ſo were they well puniſhed for their ſo great pride. For the Chriſtians in Peſth hauing diſcouered them in this action,ſallied out vpon them and charged them; againſt whom for a while they right valiantly defended themſelues,but oppreſſed with number, at length they were quite ouerthrowne,moſt of them being there ſlaine, and the reſt taken priſoners. Wherwith the Baſſa of Buda was ſo much offended,that in reuenge thereof hee in his rage threatned with fire and ſword to do what harm he could vnto the Chriſtians. But as the common prouerb ſaith,Halfe warned,halfe armed: and enemies threats bring this comfort with them, That in receiuing the threatned harms,we are in hope to be therof reuenged,as therefore before prouided.

Vnto theſe woſull troubles of Hungary, proceeding as well from the inſolencies of the Chriſtian ſouldiers themſelues, as from the fury of the Turkes, who were their antient and mortall enemies; were joined the like or rather worſe calamities in Tranſylvania, extreame famine and want of all things ſore raging in both Countries: ſo that hardly hath any miſery or extremity been ſeen or heard of, euen in Countries by the iuſt and heauy iudgements of Almighty God appointed to vtter ruine and deſtruction, which were not in thoſe two countries to be found, and of many felt. For remedie wherof, George Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant in Tranſylvania, had there done what hee might for the appeaſing of the tumults and troubles in that prouince,and now of late brought the ſame into ſome good tearms, as it was thought,and as is before declared. Howbeit that in proofe it fell out far otherwiſe, and that the more he therin laboured,the farther he was off from his intent and purpoſe. For the Nobility of that prouince, who were generally inclined vnto rebellion, and deteſting the Germanes, together with their gouernment, reiected the Decrees and orders which were agreed vpon in their late meeting together for the concluding of peace: inſomuch, that aſſiſted by the Turks, they had taken certaine Caſtles and ſtrong places in that prouince. And the better to ſupport their rebellion and inſolencie, they had appointed a certaine place to meet at, where the Turkes and they might confer together of the meanes which they intended for the effecting of their deſignes. Whereof Baſta hauing by ſecret means got vnderſtanding,to remedy this pretended miſchiefe, hee ſent away a great number of Haiduckes to lie in wait to ſurpriſe them vpon the way. Which men, who were skilfull in the paſſages of the country, failed not in this action,but lay cloſe in ambuſh, very conueniently for the ſurpriſing of their enemies, Who proceeding in their intended purpoſe, and thinking of nothing leſſe than of that which was intended againſt them, were ſuddenly, before they were aware, Turkes and Tranſylvanians all together ſurpriſed and ſlaine. Which exploit beeing performed, theſe Haiducks and other ſouldiers deſtitute of their pay,and inraged with fury,fell vpon the prouince,vſing therein all hoſtilitie,as if they had beene mortall enemies vnto it; puniſhing the guiltleſſe for the guilty,and ſeiſing vpon all mens goods in common, to pay them that which was by ſome few in priuat kept from them. All the whole prouince was ſubiect to the rage and fury of thoſe and other ſuch mercileſſe men of war, who without any remorſe,indifferently ſlew and maſſacred all that came in their way;but eſpecially the poore and weak innocent people, who called vpon the Almighty God for remedy and redreſſe of theſe euils they ſuſtained,and cried out vnto him for reuenge of their ſo great and cruel wrongs. The highways were euery where ſo ful of theeues, that no man could trauel from place to place,but that he was in great danger to be ſet vpon and ſpoiled. For the Haiducks being men that liue onely by prey and roaming vp and downe the Countrey, made good priſe and booty of whatſoeuer

A came in their way, ſparing neither Turks nor Chriſtians: inſomuch, that they hearing, how that the Zecklers with a good conuoy were bringing a number of waggons laden with victuals, and a great many of Oxen and other cattell to Claudianople, although they were of the ſame party, Beleefe, and Nation, yet they lay in wait for them to ſurpriſe them: againſt whom the Zecklers ſeeking to defend themſelues, were by them cruelly maſſacred, and their waggons, with their Beeues and other Cattell, all carried quite away. But what ſhould wee ſay? Hunger breaketh euen the ſtone wals, and forceth men vnto all extremities, and now the famine in that Prouince was ſuch, as that the people were for the moſt part glad to liue by feeding vpon the roots of herbs and weeds, and ſuch other vnwholeſome things, whereof great mortalite afterward enſued amongſt them. Which was the cauſe that Horvat, Captaine of B theſe Haiduckes, being reprooued for the outrages by them committed, and charged to take order, that no more ſuch like ſhould afterward be done; anſwered, That it was not poſſible to keep ſouldiers in any order amidſt the extremitie of famine; for that the belly was an inexorable vſurer, which tooke pity vpon nothing, but with great rage exacting that which it thought due for the nouriſhment of it ſelfe.

Amidſt theſe troubles of Tranſyluania and Hungary, there were two of the Turks ſpies of Buda diſcouered and taken; who at Vienna had obſerued all the actions and proceedings of the Chriſtians, and to the vtmoſt of their power had informed themſelues of their deſignes, as alſo of their preparations and forces to be raiſed and leuied for this yeres warres: of which two ſpyes, the one was empayled, and the other kept in cloſe and ſtreit priſon, vntill that fur- C ther matter might be drawne out from him.

The forces of the Chriſtians were now beginning to gather themſelues together and to make an head in Hungary; a riſe report at that time going, That they would forthwith take the field: whereof the Baſſa of Buda vnderſtanding, and deſirous in what he might to hinder that their forwardneſſe (whereof he doubted the effects) thought it beſt to betake himſelfe to his old and cunning practiſe, for the treaty and concluding of a peace with the Chriſtians, whereof he now made ſhew himſelfe, together with the reſt of the Turks, to be very deſirous: ſo by putting the Chriſtians in hope thereof, to make them the more remiſſe and negligent in their doings, and to gaine time of them, vntill that the Turks great army (then in preparing) might be brought downe into Hungary. To which purpoſe he in moſt friendly manner thus D writ vnto the Gouernour of Strigonium.

The Baſſa of Buda, to the Gouernor of Strigonium ſendeth Greeting.

Letters of the Baſſa of Buda to the gouernor of Strigonium.

WE know right well (noble Gouernour) that you are not ignorant, how that your brother the Gouernor of Strigonium before you, hath moſt earneſtly embraced the negotiation of peace, in ſuch ſort, as that we cannot ſo much yeeld vnto our ordinary quarrels and diſſentions, but that we muſt giue E you to vnderſtand the cauſes which haue croſſed and hindered the concluding of ſo great a good the laſt year now paſſed. The firſt let came by reaſon of the time, choſen too late to bee imployed in that Treaty of peace, when as now both the Armies were already on foot, and euen in readineſſe to joyn battell, and could not be then ſtaied by that intreaty, nor ſent back again without ſome exploit doing: Each part had reſolued vpon their proper deſignes, and euen choſen their ground for battell, and were then hardly to bee turned from that whereupon they were before reſolued. And albeit that during this laſt Winter the treaty for the peace was again begun, and that the men of warre on both ſides in hope thereof, reſted vnarmed and free from all hoſtility, (a moſt fit time to haue begun and ended this treaty of peace, which hath beene ſo much wiſhed for of our ſoueraigne Emperour, deſired of his ſubiects, and requeſted by thoſe of your Emperours, with whom my dread Soueraigne would confirme and contract a firme and continuall peace) yet F for all that, ſince the departure of the Gouernour from Strigonium, we ſee three months to haue been paſſed, without any Letters at all, or meſſage by word of mouth brought vnto vs concerning this matter. So that we haue not any thing whereof to certifie our ſoueraigne Emperour. And foraſmuch as the courſe of time hath brought theſe two contrary Armies euen vnto the point of battell, and that they are mar- ching one of them to incounter with the other, and ſo to enter into the liſts of honour; wee haue thought good before, to deſire to know of you what we are to expect concerning the peace. We therfore requeſt you, G as our very good brother and friend, in what you may, to ſtay the comming of our armies into this Kingdom, and to attend to that which may produce the concluſion of this Treaty, being on our part moſt ready to lend both our ear and deſire to whatſoeuer ſhall be iuſt and meet in this Treaty, and neceſſary for the Common good: beſeeching you to beleeue vs in this buſineſſe, and not to doubt of our good will, more affected to your good, than is yours to our welfare. Wherof we in good time aduertiſe you, for that our army which is now before Belgrade, being once arriued here, and marching in field, we canot poſſibly cauſe it to return without ſomthing doing, conſidering the great harm, which under the aſſurance of your faith giuen, we haue receiued from your people during the time of the truce, which they haue many waies violated. Which their euill dealing hath greatly inſenced vs againſt your men in captiuitie with vs, and cauſed our ſoldiers to ſhew great rigor againſt their ſlaues. We therfore attend your anſwer, and the returne of your brother, to H the end we may together reſolue according vnto equitie and reaſon, of that which ſhall be needfull to bee done for the common good and welfare.

Now for all this fair gloſing, it was no hard matter to gheſſe at the Baſſa's ſecret meaning: for how deſirous ſoeuer he ſeemed to be of peace, and willing to the furtherance thereof, yet neuertheleſſe moſt true it is, that during the time of all theſe faire ſhewes, the Turkes hauing aſſembled the garriſon ſouldiers on all ſides, had by night ſurpriſed the Caſtle of Simnin vpon the Chriſtians, ſlaine part of the ſoldiers therein, carried away the reſt priſoners, and moſt I cruelly afterwards burnt the place: ſo manifeſting by their foule deeds the euill meaning of their faire and deceitfull words.

But now leauing the Baſſa for a while vnto his crafty deuices, and paſſing ouer many ſmal ſkirmiſhes which hapned in Hungary and Tranſyluania, as not beſeeming the grauitie of an hiſtory; let vs now out of Europ look ouer into Aſia, to ſee how the great Turks affairs there in the mean time went.

Ths rebellion in Aſia was by the comming ouer of Zellaly and his followers for a time ſomwhat pacified, but not ſuppreſſed; that peſtilent humor of diſloyaltie hauing before infected the minds of ſo many, as that in ſhort time after the Rebels were much ſtronger, and the Rebellion much more dangerous than before. For the appeaſing and ſuppreſſing whereof, Cicala K Baſſa the old Renegate, and a man of great experience and ſeruice, was ſent by the Graund Sultan as Generall, with a great and mighty Army into Aſia; where hee needed not long to looke for his enemies, they being as ready as he, either to giue or to accept of battel: ſo that for men ſo on both ſides reſolued, it was no hard matter to bring them to the triall of a battel.

Cicala Baſſa ouerthrowne by the Aſian Rebels.

Which they with like deſire and equall minde joyning, there made a great and terrible fight, the Baſſa fighting for his honour, and the Rebell for his life: howbeit that at length, the Baſſa after much bloud-ſhed and a great number on both ſides ſlaine, being put to the worſe, fled with his Army altogether diſordered and in rout, hauing in that ſo dangerous a confuſion of his people much ado to ſaue himſelfe. With which ſo ſhamefull an ouerthrow giuen him by the Rebell, the Baſſa was more aſhamed than diſcouraged; who again repaired his Army, L ioyning thereunto great and mighty ſupplies, and ſo ſtrengthned, came now again the ſecond time, to reuenge himſelfe of the great diſhonour which he had before receiued, and vtterly to ſuppreſſe the Rebels. Who now finding themſelues too weake to incounter with ſo great and mighty a power, wiſely betimes retyred, praying aid of the Perſian King, who ſent vnto them his owne ſonne with a great Army of good and valiant ſouldiers. The which might haue giuen the Baſſa cauſe enough to haue ſtayed his haſte, and to haue beene well aduiſed, how he joined battell with ſuch deſperate and reſolute enemies, and now backt with ſuch ſtrong ſupplies. But he being blinded with the fury of his former loſſe, and too much deſirous to be thereof reuenged, with more haſt than good ſpeed came on, and joined battel with theſe his enemies, who were now in readineſſe, and well prouided to receiue him. The two M Armies were in number equall; but the Rebels of the two more reſolute and carefull of themſelues and of their welfare, as they which had repoſed all their hope and confidence in their owne armes and valour; ſo that the battel was with great outcries and fury begun both on the

A one ſide and the other: in the beginning wherof the Turks right furiouſly charged the rebels, and ſeemed ſomewhat to preuaile vpon them; vntill that the Perſian Kings ſon with certaine troups of his moſt braue horſmen charging them in the rereward, & ſome other of the rebels with like fury aſſailing them vpon their flanks, their whole army was ſo diſordred, that Cicala doing what he could to put his men again in order, and ſo to haue reſtored the battel, nothing therin preuailed, but was glad together with the reſt of his army, now all in rout, to betake himſelf to flight. In this battel were forty thouſand men ſlain on both ſides, whereof thirty thouſand were of the Baſſa's Army, and the reſt of the Rebels; who by this ſo great a victorie gained no leſſe honour and reputation, than had the Sultans Generall got contempt and diſgrace.

B The Perſian King after this great diſcomfiture of the Turkes, continuing his conqueſts, took in the Countrey of Sirvan, (a matter of great importance) beeing now deſtitute of all reliefe, by the ouerthrow of Cicala Baſſa; who had he preuailed againſt the Rebells, ſhould haue marched thither againſt the Perſian King, to haue ſtayed the courſe of his victories: who now victorious and out of fear, made head toward Aruſta, a very great and ſtrong towne, neer whereunto the riuer Tygris dischargeth it ſelfe into the great riuer of Euphrates; the which City he at laſt won, with all the places and countries thereunto adioyning; and hath ſince as a moſt happy and victorious Prince againe recouered from the Turkes, whatſoeuer they had ſince Sultan Solymans time by force of armes taken from the Perſian Kings his predeceſſors, two or three ſtrong places only excepted. Of which moſt notable Wars betwixt C theſe two the moſt mighty Princes of the Eaſt, that is to ſay, the Great Turke and the Perſian King, I can rather wiſh than hope to be better informed; and that not ſo much for curioſity, (although that the knowledge of ſuch matters yeeld vnto ſuch as bee deſirous thereof great pleaſure, with no leſſe contentment) as for that they (though very farre off) in ſome ſort much concern the good and quiet of the Chriſtian Commonweale; the Perſian wars beeing the only means whereby the fury of the great Turkiſh Sultan hath been, and yet is for a time auerted from the Chriſtians in Europe, vpon the Perſians in Aſia: as it is greatly to be feared, that ſome one or other, if not more, of the Chriſtian Princes neereſt vnto him, ſhall to their great coſt and harm feel, ſo ſoon as theſe two Mahometane Princes ſhall be at peace amongſt themſelues.

D But leaue we the Baſſa a while to grieue at his ouerthrowes, and the Perſian King to triumph of theſe victories, and ſee what the great Sultan himſelf in the mean time doth.

Achmat ſick of the ſmall pox.

This yong Prince Achmat (now one of the greateſt Monarchs in the world) had not many months reigned, but that he fel ſick of the ſmal pox, wherwith he hauing a groſſe & ful body, was ſo fouly tormented for a fortnights ſpace, that oftentimes fainting, it was generally ſuppoſed he would therof haue died: Yea, diuers of the great Baſſa's were in ſpeech concerning his yonger brother to be taken out of the Seraglio to ſucceed him: which was thought would haue coſt him his life, after that the Sultan his elder brother was again recouered. And no doubt it had, but that he was the onely Heir then left of the Othoman Family, if that his brother the Sultan ſhould haue failed. But he againe recouering of his foul and childiſh diſeaſe, E to ſhew vnto the Ianizaries and others who doubted thereof, that he was ſo recouered, moſt proudly mounted vpon a goodly horſe ſumptuouſly furniſhed, and in great ſtate and magnificence rid ap and down thorow moſt of the chiefe ſtreets of the Imperial city of Conſtantinople; the people (as their accuſtomed manner is) in euery place as he went rejoycing to ſee him, and proſecuting him with their moſt joyfull acclamations, wiſhing vnto him a long and happy reigne. Neither is it any maruell, ſeeing the almighty God hath euen in the faces and countenances of Princes ingrauen ſome reſemblance of his owne, if they become reſpectiue and admirable in the eies and ſight of the common people, who cannot but honor them with their voyces, whom God hath bleſſed with his power, and other his extraordinarie worldly bleſſings.

F This yong prince ſo recouered of his ſickneſſe and hauing ſhewed himſelf to his ſubiects, began forthwith to giue himſelfe (according to the heat of his youthfull ſpirit) immoderately vnto the pleaſures of the field, and other ſuch violent exerciſes, being in their moderate vſe wholſome, but in their violences much hurtfull; but eſpecially vpon the new recouery of his late ſickneſſe, the griefes whereof came in haſt, but were to leaue him at leiſure. Whereupon G two of his Baſſaes carefull of his health, were ſo bold, as out of their loue to reproue him for ſuch his violent and immoderate exerciſes (the day not being long enough for them) and by effectuall reaſons to diſſuade him from the ſame. But ſo far off was he from hearkening vnto their wholſome perſuaſions, as that to the contrary he therwith inraged, thruſt them both out of their places. So dangerous a thing it is, euen in zeale and loue to preſume to controll great Princes in their moſt vain pleaſures; others in the mean time not louing them at all, but only for their owne profit attending vpon their idle appetites, injoying the preferments due vnto their more faithfull and loyall ſubiects, and yet ſecretly in themſelues, ſmiling at the vanitie of ſuch as by whom they be ſo vnworthily honoured and promoted.

Haſſan Baſſa appointed lieutenant Generall of the Turks wars in Hungary.

But as in the immoderate vſe of all things there is a ſatietie which breedeth a diſliking and H diſtaſte of them (pleaſures being not by any meanes more commended, than by their nouelties and ſeldome vſe) ſo this young Sultan Achmat hauing glutted himſelfe with his pleaſures, began now to caſt his eyes vpon his other more neceſſarie affaires of State, but eſpecially vpon his warres both with the Chriſtian Emperour and the Mahometane Perſian King.
Now hee was not ignorant of the great valour and ſufficiencie of Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa, for the mannaging of his warres in Hungarie, wherein hee had of long time been exerciſed, and ſo therein beſt experienced. This old Captaine pleaſed him beſt, whom as an old, expert, and politicke Generall, hee reſolued to continue in his charge as Lieutenant Generall of his warres in Hungarie, and by the continuation of him in ſo great and honourable a place, to binde him to all loyall ſeruices in thoſe warres, euen to the vttermoſt of his power. This I Great Baſſa was then at Belgrade, vpon the frontier of his gouernment in doubtfull ſuſpence expecting the reſolution of his Prince concerning this buſineſſe, and yet in hope longing after a ſecond charge: Whoſe longing deſire Achmat quickly ſatisfied, by ſending vnto him both a commiſſion for the continuation of his charge and dignitie, and certaine honourable Preſents in token of his extraordinarie fauor towards him; which were a Generals Enſigne, with an Hungarian Mace of pure gold. Now whether theſe Preſents, joyned vnto the continuation of his charge, were welcome vnto him or not, ambitious minds (ſuch as was his) can eaſily tell: and hee to ſhew his contentment therewith, gaue thereof good teſtimonie by the publicke actions of joy, cauſing all the great Ordnance of the place in thundring wiſe to be oftentimes diſcharged, and the Trumpets and Drummes to be moſt joyfully K ſounded.

In the meane time newes was brought to Conſtantinople, how that the Perſian King hauing muſtred his men, was in the field with aboue an hundred thouſand good ſouldiers, and that Bigages Baſſa, one of the great Rebels in Aſia, had confederated himſelfe with him, to the further troubling of the Turks eſtate. Whereupon Achmat, although he had before giuen order vnto Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa his Lieutenant in Hungary, for the beſieging and taking of Veradinum, a ſtrong City in the vpper Hungary; now by a meſſenger ſent in haſt, commanded the ſame Baſſa, all other buſineſſes ſet apart, with all the power that he could make, forthwith to returne to Conſtantinople, there with him and the reſt of the Baſſa's to conſult and reſolue vpon the moſt neceſſarie warre, and of the readieſt meanes for the continuing of the ſame. For L albeit that the Turks were moſt deſirous to haue warres with the Chriſtians, and ſo (if it were poſſible) to haue conquered the remainders of Hungary; yet the danger of the Perſian warres, and of the rebellion in Aſia daily more and more increaſing, ſuffered them not wholly to attend vnto the warres againſt the Chriſtians in Hungary, but drew them now into a doubtfull conſultation, which way firſt to turne their forces. But being come to Conſtantinople, the Grand Seigniour tooke the paines and did him the honour to come vnto his houſe; whither the Councell for the State being aſſembled, it was there moſt proudly reſolued vpon, euen forthwith at one and the ſelfe ſame time with equall forces to make warre both vpon the Chriſtian Emperour in Hungary, and the Perſian King in Aſia, accounting themſelues M ſtrong enough to ſubdue and bring vnder foot both the one and the other, no power vpon earth being in their proud conceit of themſelues able to encounter or withſtand theirs. So for the mannaging of theſe warres, and of their ſo proud a reſolution to be performed in ſo remote parts of the world, Haſſan Baſſa was continued in his charge, as Generall of the army

A in Hungary; and Cicala Baſſa was appointed to haue the command of the army to be ſent againſt the Perſian: Two moſt expert Captains, being to fight againſt their heredetarie enemies; Haſſan againſt the Chriſtians, and Cicala againſt the Perſians, by whom he had not long before bin euil vſed. An ordinary policy of the Othoman Emperors, not to commit the charge of their armies againſt the Chriſtians, vnto Renegates; for feare leſt they, touched with ſome remorſe of conſcience, might bettay the ſame, or otherwiſe deale vnfaithfully in their charge: but ſtill to imploy them againſt the Perſians, of whom they haue no further knowledge, but as of their enemies in the field. But Cicala Baſſa well acquainted both with the difficulty and the danger of the Perſian war, (the ſcarres whereof he yet bare about with him) made ſhew as if he had been vnwilling to take vpon him the charge thereof; and ſo begun to excuſe B himſelfe, vntill that at length vpon promiſe made vnto him, for the furniſhing of him with a ſufficient army, and all things els neceſſary for ſo great a war, with a large and moſt honourable entertainment for himſelfe, and all the Perſian priſoners being alſo giuen vnto him in reward; he therewith contented, accepted of the honourable charge, whereof in his ambitious mind he was indeed moſt deſirous. And ſo receiuing the Generals Enſigne, with the other marks and cogniſances of his honour, cauſing the Drums to be ſtrucken vp, and the Trumpets to bee joyfully ſounded, he cheerfully prepared himſelfe for that his ſo great an expedition; expecting but the comming of his ſonne, who at the requeſt of the Venetians was gon forth with a fleet of gallies to ſcoure the Leuant ſeas of the Pyrats, who then exceedingly troubled the trafficke of the Venetian Merchants.

C Amiddeſt which the Turks ſo great deſignes, the Tartar Cham, bound for his pay to ſerue the Great Turke in his warres againſt the Chriſtians; by his Embaſſadour excuſed himſelfe vnto the Great Sultan, for that he could not himſelfe in perſon come this yeare with his forces into Hungary, by reaſon that he was otherwiſe neceſſarily buſied with the moſt vrgent affaires of his owne Eſtate: yet promiſing withall, in ſtead of himſelfe, to ſend his ſun with a good power of men. Now whereas many men maruell, why the Tartar Cham, being ſo great a Prince, and not much in danger vnto the Turke (being ſeparated from him by the Blacke or Euxine ſea) ſhould be ſtill ſo ready at the Turks call, to do him ſeruice in his warres; The cauſes whereof are diuers, and thoſe not far to ſeeke. Firſt, their neere affinitie (as both deſcended from the ſame beginning, by often marriages ſtill confirmed: Then, D Their likeneſſe of manners and condition, no ſmal bonds of loue and friendſhip: And thirdly, For that the Turkiſh Empire for want of heires males of the Othoman Family, is aſſured, and as it were entailen vnto the Tartar Cham: But moſt of all, For the yearely pention and great pay which he, being a bare Prince, receiueth from the Turks; his rude and needie people being alſo euer ready, in hope of the ſpoyle, to follow him into thoſe warres. But this his excuſe for not comming himſelfe this yeare into Hungary, being by the Great Sultan accepted of, Haſſan Baſſa reſolued vpon his expedition for Hungary, made great preparation for the good ſucceſſe of the warre there, gaue great hope thereof vnto the Great Sultan, and cauſed himſelfe to be proclaimed Lieutenant Generall of all the Great Sultans Forces againſt the Chriſtians: euery man affourding vnto theſe good hopes a thouſand E wiſhes for his health and welfare: but eſpecially the Mahometane Prieſts aſſured him of their helpe, ſo that hee would not faile to do the vttermoſt of his endeauour againſt the Chriſtians their enemies. For why, the Turks doe account him the beſt and moſt zealous man, which can do the Chriſtians moſt harme. And ſo with theſe great acclamations of joy and honour, Haſſan the great Baſſa ſet forward with his army from Conſtantinople, towards Hungary.

The reaſons why the Tartar Cham is ſo ready to ſerue the great Turke in his warres againſt the Chriſtians.

The Chriſtian Emperor ignorant of all theſe the Turks great preparations and haughty deſignes, ſought by all meanes how to reſiſt them, ſparing nothing that might any way ſerue or ſtand him in ſtead to that purpoſe. Experience had aſſured him of the Popes readineſſe in contributing to this action, what in his power was; hauing before receiued ſo many F teſtimonies of his good wil. Which cauſed him now to diſpatch alſo his brother Maximilian the archduke, a good and a deuout Prince, to him, with expreſſe charge in the Emperors name to yeeld all ſubmiſſion to his Holines, to moue him to relieue the wofull eſtate of his diſtreſſed affairs. Maximilian ſetting forward about this buſines, arriued at Venice, where he was by that State right honorably entertained. From Venice he trauelling toward Rome,and with a great Re- G tinue approching the city,was there met by a great number of Noblemen with their Followers,ſent from the Pope;and ſo by them with great honour was brought into the Vatican Palace,to the intent that ſo he might the oftner and with more eaſe haue acceſſe vnto the Pope, who then lay there ſick of the gout. The next day he being brought vnto the Popes preſence, & after vſual reuerence don hauing audience giuen him,in the preſence of the cardinals he began to deliuer vnto him the cauſes of his comming,which (as he ſaid) were two: firſt,To put his Holineſſe in remembrance of the manifeſt peril and danger which hung ouer the heads of the Chriſtians in general, from the Turk,but eſpecially ouer them of Italy,being ſo neer the Turkiſh Empire, and a great gap laid open for the Turks therinto to enter, by the way of Ca-niſia the key of Stiria. And then in the Emperors behalfe to requeſt him to ſtretch forth his H helping hand againſt this his mortal enemy;who was now drawing al his power together into one head,to deſtroy him: hauing certaine vnderſtanding of his great preparation made thorowout all his dominions, to thruſt him out of his, if in theſe extremities hee were not relieued by ſuch Princes as could not in the end themſelues auoid the laſt violence of theſe harms whereof he felt the firſt aſſaults. Which his Holineſſe conſidering in the zeal of his deuotion,and by the increaſing of the danger, he was in hope to find of it the like aſſiſtance in this his ſecond need,that he had before receiued in his former affairs; the pretious balme of his deuout charitie being of greater vertue than to ſerue but for one time,but being of ſufficient power to ſerue for all ages,and all times of neceſſity. And that therefore he beſought his Holineſſe,to apply the ſame vpon the preſent wound, ſeeing that without his help hee was more I like to periſh than to liue. Whereunto the Pope anſwered, That his former actions alreadie paſſed ſpake enough for him in this action, to manifeſt his deuout meaning,ſo that it was needleſſe for him to vſe further words to expreſſe the ſame. That the great ſupplies both of men and money which he had ſent forth for the good of the Chriſtian commonweale, were the ſure teſtimonies of his carefulneſſe for the ſame. And albeit that theſe euill haps had ſo far preuailed in Hungary, yet that he for his part had neuertheleſſe ſtill done what hee might for the remedying of thoſe ſo great euils. And that now by the aduice of his honorable coun-cellors there preſent, he had appointed an hundred and fifty thouſand crownes to be paid towards the maintenance of the Chriſtian army in Hungary this yeare; in hope to do more than that afterward for the Emperor in his wars againſt the Turks: whom God (as he ſaid) ſuffered K to preuaile vpon the Chriſtians,not for any goodneſſe that was in them,but for the chaſtiſing of the wickedneſſe of the Chriſtians themſelues.

Which ſumme of an hundred and fifty thouſand crowns was afterward according to a decree made by the Pope and Cardinals, leuied and paid of the tenths of the clergy throughout all Italy. And ſo Maximilian the Archduke moſt magnificently entertained and feaſted by the Pope, and by him rewarded with foure thouſand crownes, hauing well diſpatched the buſineſſe he came for,returned againe vnto the Emperor his brother.

Valachia ſpoiled by the Tartars.

But as the Chriſtian Emperor was thus carefull about his prouiſions for the withſtanding of the Turks,they were not any whit behind him in augmenting of their forces for the inua-ding of him, And now the Tartars in great number being about to come vnto their aid into L Hungary, being denied paſſage by the Polonians, had turned head towards Valachia, with a purpoſe by force and ſtrong hand to get that of theſe weake people, with the power of the ſtronger had embarred them of. And ſo preſuming vpon their number, they entred into the ſame Prouince,which they all ouer rifled and ſpoiled at their pleaſure. Where ſuch of the countrey people as could eſcape their fury, fled into the townes, leauing their goods behinde them vnto their mercileſſe rage, not with any thing to be ſatiſfied. Rodolph the Vayuod him-ſelfe as a man with fury diſmaied, fled to Cronſtat to George Baſta: where he conſidering the danger he was now in,and that he was ſtill to expect the like ſo often as the Tartars were for the ſeruice of the Turke to come into Hungary; before Baſta tooke a new oath of allegance vnto the Emperor,ſolemnely proteſting to die and liue in his ſeruice; neceſſity now inforcing M him to acknowledge his duty, and to ſeeke for the remedy of his harmes, which he had before oftentimes moſt proudly reiected. Vpon which his ſo humble ſubmiſſion, Baſta receiued him and his countrey into his protection.

In

A In the meane time two traitours were brought to Claudinople, who hauing by wonderful craft ſurpriſed a ſtrong caſtle belonging vnto a certaine great Ladie a widow, neere vnto a burrough called Caraſebe, and rifled and ſacked the ſame, traiterouſly afterward ſold it vnto the Turks, to the great hurt of the Emperors ſubiects neer vnto the place, and the no leſſe aduantage of the Turks. Whereof the Haiducks hauing gotten vnderſtanding, and cunning in ſuch matters, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the Turks by the way as they were comming to haue taken poſſeſſion of the place: who ſeeing themſelues too weake to withſtand their enemies, & out of hope to ſaue themſelues by flight, were there as men diſmaied and appointed to be ſlaine, moſt of them by the Haiducks cut in pieces, and the reſt taken priſoners. The two traitors being according to their deſerts, for their ſhamefull treaſon moſt cruelly put to death, to the terror B of others.

The Turks ſurpriſed by the Haiducks.

The Haiducks hauing no houſes but the fields, nor other trade but their armes (ſpoyled of the one by the Turks, and armed with the other by neceſſitie) are alwaies in readineſſe for ſeruice.
In hope of profit, it is to them a pleaſure to paſſe ouer the mountaines of ice, to trauell thorow the ſtorms of thunder and lightning, to ſwim ouer the deep riuers, and to thruſt themſelues into a thouſand dangers; which as it is no commendable kinde of life, ſo is the practiſe of it vniuſt. For as in this, ſo in other their actions they ſpare neither friend nor foe, all that comes in their way being ſubiect and as it were appointed to their fury: but eſpecially when they want their pay, which affordeth vnto them a thouſand excuſes for the robbing and ſpoyling of all men without reſpect. With which maner of fury they were euen at this time inraged C for want of their pay, in ſuch ſort, as that if their right hands ſpoiled the Turkes, their left hands robbed the Chriſtians: as vpon one and the ſelfe ſame day they took from the Turkes of Agria a number of beaſts and cattel, and rifled diuers villages of the Chriſtians. And not content with theſe outrages, meeting with an hundred or ſix ſcore waggons, laden with great ſtore of victuals going toward Alba Iulia, conducted by the Zeclers, ſet vpon them, ſlew them that droue them, and carried away the Wagons with them. But theſe wrongs by Chriſtians don vnto Chriſtians, euen the mortal enemies of the Chriſtians, the Turks themſelues reuenged.
For the Turks of Temeſwar hauing bin abroad toward Lippa, and found good ſtore of booty, meeting with theſe ſharks, were by them charged, not ſo much for that they were their enemies, or for the zeal of Chriſtianitie, or for deſire of honour, as for to get from them their D prey and booty. But the Turkes being in number twice as many as they, and withall well acquainted with ſuch buſines, were not ſo eaſily ſpoiled; but knowing their own ſtrength, with their number oppreſſed their enemies, moſt of whom they ſlew, and tooke the reſt priſoners: God being as iuſt in his puniſhments, as he is in his works powerfull, puniſhing the Wicked by the weapons of others as wicked or rather worſe than they.

The Turks in the mean time while things thus paſſed, began again to fall to their old practiſe, for the ſoliciting of a peace. But ſuch phanſies were too ſtale and common, any more to deceiue the Chriſtians withall: howbeit they yet gaue ſome ear thereunto, to diſcouer in their policie the commodities and inconueniences of the peace by them in ſhew offred, with a thouſand proteſtations in their words, but far differing from their thoughts and deeds; who E during the time of the parley, laboured in what they might to benefit themſelues and to hurt vs. For euen in that ſame very time they fortified their Townes and Caſtles with men and victuals: but eſpecially the City of Buda, whereinto by a Conuoy of three thouſand Turks come from Belgrade, they put an exceeding quantitie of all ſorts of neceſſary prouiſion, ſufficient to ſerue the ſame for an whole yeare. Beſides that, it was certainly knowne by certaine Turks taken priſoners and brought to Poſſonium, That all this parley and treaty of peace was but of purpoſe feigned to put the Chriſtians in ſecuritie; for that the Baſſa of Buda, who was the chiefe publiſher of the ſame, had no ſuch Commiſſion from the great Sultan for the concluding of any peace in the abſence of the Viſier Baſſa; vnto whom the Graund Seigniour had giuen charge, not to make any peace with the Emperour, but vpon condition, That hee F ſhould firſt deliuer vnto him the City of Strigonium; which if hee would not yeeld, that then he ſhould beſiege it, and by force take it from him; and after the winning thereof, to refuſe all other treaty of peace, it being the only cauſe for which the Turkes deſired peace. Of all which their double dealing and crafty deſignes the Emperour vnderſtanding, and whole-ly reſolued for war, preſently ſent County Sultze with commiſſion to Vienna, and appointed George Baſta Lieutenant General of his army into Hungary; aduiſing them carefully to looke vnto their charge, and not too much to truſt vnto the gloſing and flattering ſpeeches of the Turks.

Reonin ſurpriſed by the Haiducks.

The Haiducks in the mean time alwaies in armes, as hauing no other inheritance whereon to liue, ceaſed not ſtill to looke abroad to finde that which was neuer loſt. Now it fortuned them in roaming abroad toward Belgrade, to light vpon Reonin a ſtrong and fair Caſtle of the Turks, wherein eight hundred of the Turkes ſouldiers and other of their countrey people had their abode, together with the greateſt part of their ſubſtance. In the ſtrength of which caſtle the Turks truſting, and there lying in ſecurity, without further care of their ſafety, were vpon the ſudden before they were aware, by theſe aduenturous men ſurpriſed; who for haſt thruſting one another forward, at length caried the place, ſlew the greateſt part of the Turks, and taking the reſt priſoners, with a great and rich booty returned to Lippa. The like exploit they of the gariſon of Caniſia attempted vpon the caſtle and borough of Lambac; which they took and ſpoiled, and afterward ſet it on fire: the flame whereof ſerued for a ſignal vnto the troups of County Serin, which paſſing that way, and lighting vpon the Turkes ouerloded with the ſpoils they had there taken, cut them in pieces, and ſo recouered from them their booty.

Petrinia in danger to be betrayed to the Turkes.

About this time, certaine of the garriſon ſouldiers of Petrinia, hauing ſecretly conſpired with the Turks (by whom they were before corrupted) to deliuer vnto them that ſtrong Caſtle; and being about to haue betrayed the ſame by a Mine which they were in making vnder a ſtable neer vnto a ſtore houſe wherein the pouder for the ſtore of the Caſtle lay; with a purpoſe by firing of the ſame, to haue giuen the Turks entrance by the ruines thereof, who lay cloſe hidden in a wood neer vnto the place; it fortuned this their wicked purpoſe to bee perceiued by certain offenders then kept priſoners in the ſtable neer vnto the mine. Who hauing diſcouered the Traitours whole purpoſe, and in feare to be burned or blowne vp by the fury of the Mine ſo neere vnto them, diſcouered it vnto the Gaoler, who made the Gouernour therewith acquainted; by whoſe commandement they were forthwith apprehended, and being conuicted of that their ſo foule and heinous a treaſon, were with exemplary puniſhment executed.

Now as the Turks had oftentimes made ſhew as if they had bin deſirous of peace, ſo ceaſed they not yet with great earneſtneſſe to ſolicit the ſame: ſo that the Emperour, although hee knew it to be a thing rather to be wiſhed than hoped for; yet leſt he ſhould ſeem careleſſe of the common quiet of his ſubiects and people, and to refuſe ſo great a good ſo oftentimes offered him, now once again appointed certain perſonages of great place and authority, to attend the propoſitions of peace to be on the Turks behalf propounded. Of which commiſſioners Cæſar Gallen Sherif of Strigonium, an Italian, and a man of great experience in matters of ſtate, was one. Whom the gouernor of Strigonium had of purpoſe ſent to Peſth, to conſider of ſome good means for the concluding of a peace, whereof he himſelf had laid the firſt foundation; and vnderſtood that the Turks demands and pretenſions not much diffred from thoſe which they had many times before demanded. Whereof the firſt was, That the Emperour ſhould for the time to come wel and truly pay vnto the great Sultan & his ſucceſſors, all ſuch tribute as he was wont to pay to the Turkiſh Sultans his predeceſſors, during the time of his leagues with them, and that without any demand to be therof made. The ſecond, That the Emperor ſhould alwaies haue his Embaſſador lieger at the great Sultans court, with honourable preſents, there to ſolicit the continuation of his loue and friendſhip toward the Emperor his maſter. The third, That the Emperor ſhould deliuer vnto the Turks all the towns and Caſtles which he had taken from them either by force or by ſurpriſe, during the time of this war, together with the countries of Tranſyluania and Valachia. Vpon which demands granted, they promiſed to ſend a meſſenger vnto the great Sultan, in their names intreating him to ſurrender Caniſia vnto the Emperor, but not Agria, which they ſaid they might in nowiſe deliuer, except they were thereunto by force of arms conſtrained.

Vnto which their ſo proud and vnreaſonable demands the Commiſſioners for the Emperor anſwered, That the Emperour long before this time had made peace with Sultan Selymus

A the ſecond,and with Sultan Amurath the third,this Sultan Achmat his predeceſſors. An aſſured peace,ſworn vnto and confirmed by all the iuſt and ſolemn oathes that could haue beene by any man deſired : and for the more aſſurance thereof conceiued into writing, and with the moſt authentique ſeals of their Majeſties confirmed. Whereby both parties were moſt ſeuerely and ſtreitly forbidden, one of them to attempt any thing againſt the other, or to encroch the one of them vpon the other,during the time of ſuch their League. And if ſo bee that contrary to the tenor thereof, either part ſhould vndertake to ſurpriſe any place belonging to the other, and ſo become maſters thereof; that vpon the leaſt requeſt of the party ſo wronged,the places ſurpriſed ſhould be again forthwith reſtored, as vſurped vpon contrary to the publique faith,and the vſurpers to be ſeuerely for the ſame puniſhed. And yet that the B Turkes notwithſtanding thruſting by heapes beyond the barres of this ſo ſtrong and holy a League,had violated and broken the ſame, by ſurpriſing a number of places both in the high and lower countries of Hungary,neither giuing eare vnto any ſpeech or requeſt that could bee made vnto them for reſtitution therof.

And yet not ſo contentented,had alſo taken a number of places from the Emperor in Sclavonia, between the riuers of Culp and Vnna : which places he had oftentimes by as iuſt right redemanded,as they were by vniuſt forces vſurped before the beginning of theſe wars. Demands eſteemed iuſt and reaſonable euen by the Turks themſelues, and yet for all that, altogether reiected by the great Sultans. Of which their ſo great injuſtice the Emperor had oftentimes moſt iuſtly complained, and ſo did euen at this day, at the feeling of ſuch his hurts C and harmes. And that the Emperour hauing by ſo many perfidious dealings made proof of the vntruſtineſſe of the Grand Seigniour his predeceſſors, what aſſurance then can hee conceiue of his fidelitie ? or vpon what foundation of faith can hee build the ſure building of peace,ſo much deſired of him? And yet if he might hope ſo much of the faith of another man, as he is aſſured of his owne iuſt meaning, differing much from that of the grand Seigniours, (which he knew to be neuer anſwerable vnto his) that he for his part could be well contented to embrace the peace; prouided alwaies, that he might haue Caniſia and Agria yeelded vnto him. Or that if they would needs ſtill hold thoſe places, that he might likewiſe in peace hold the places that he had before won in that war,the reaſons being on both ſides alike. And that as concerning Tranſylvania,he could not deliuer that without betraying his owne right, D and the welfare of that prouince; hauing obtained the ſame as well by agreements and couenants between him and the ſon of the laſt Duke Iohn, as by the free and voluntary releaſment which Sigiſmund Bathor the laſt and immediat prince thereof,had not long before made vnto him. For the defence of which his rights,hee had ſpent many men and great ſummes of money, and all for the keeping of that prouince by force of arms, which by ſo good right belonged vnto him.

And that for Valachia, he could be content to yeeld ſome part of his right vnto that prouince, ſo that the Turkes ſhould ceaſe from thenceforth to demand of him any more tribute; or that he ſhould as of ordinary duty ſend his Embaſſadors with yearely preſents to the great Sultan,not being able without need to conſent vnto ſuch a needleſſe ſeruitude; ſeeing that all E Princes ought to be at liberty,at their own choice to ſend their Embaſſadors, and not at another mans appointment.

Which anſwer of the Emperours Commiſſioners ſerued no no other purpoſe but for the Turks to laugh and ſport at, how iuſt and reaſonable ſoeuer they were; ſtill preſſing them to yeeld vnto their vnreaſonable demands, or elſe threatning to aduertiſe the great Sultan thereof, who by force would take that from them,to their further loſſe,which they refuſed to grant him by fair means,to their own good. And ſo the Treaty was for that time broken off without any thing concluded. Which cauſed the Gouernour of Strigonium to retyre himſelfe backe againe vnto his Charge : yet for all that,leauing Cæſar Gallen behind him,to entertaine it in ſo ſmall hope as was thereof yet left. Who afterwards ſeeing it almoſt deſperate, making F a great feaſt vnto certaine of the chiefe of the Turkes of Buda,and hauing in that merriment drawne from them a promiſe to liue as friends with them of the garriſon of Peſth,and of other places which lay neere vnto that Towne, he retyred himſelf afterwards vnto Strigonium alſo.

The baſe cowardiſe of the Gouernour of Peſth.

Shortly after whoſe departure, Iagenreuter Gouernour of Peſth, notwithſtanding the late promiſes of the Turks at Buda, for their liuing by him in peace & amity; and the aſſured promiſe of Cæſar Gallen, at his laſt departure, for the ſpeedy furniſhing of the town both with men and all things neceſſary for the defence thereof, which he ought with great aſſurance to haue expected; yet diſmaied with the report of the comming of Haſſan Baſſa the Turkes Generall with his great army, and that by the ſtreit commandement of the great Sultan, he was to begin his conqueſts in Hungary with the winning of Peſth; as a man afraid of his own ſhadow, thought good betime to prouide for himſelfe: and vpon that reſolution, hauing yet ſeen no enemy at all to force him, truſſing vp his baggage, the fift of September forſooke the Towne, with fiue Companies of footmen and ſix Troupes of horſemen following him: a ſufficient number to haue for a time defended the Towne, and endured a ſiege, eſpecially in ſo ſtrong a place, and ſo well prouided both of victuals and munition. All which, this cowardly Gouernour (but moſt vnworthy of that name) left together with his honour for a prey vnto his Enemies; hauing yet before his departure out of the Towne, cauſed the principal buildings thereof to be vndermined, and barrels of gun-pouder to be layd vnder them, where they were ſhortly after all ouerthrown, and moſt part of the towne burnt. But being gone not paſt half a league from the place, he met with four hundred Haiducks, all well armed, whom the Gouernour of Strigonium had ſent for the reliefe of Peſth, with a number of boats loded with corn, munition, and other neceſſaries of all ſorts, for the better aſſurance of the place, and the performing of the promiſe before to the ſame end made by the Gouernor of Strigonium. Which Hungarian Haiducks meeting with theſe diſmayed Cowards vpon the way, thought it not the beſt way to go any further, as thinking themſelues not able to doe that with their ſo ſmall a number, which the other durſt not vndertake with their far greater: wherefore ioyning themſelues with the other fearfull Fugitiues, they with them returned to Strigonium; leauing their Veſſels and munition vnto their enemies, who immediately after ſeiſed vpon them.

The next day after, the mines hauing taken their effect, the Turks wondring to ſee ſo great and terrible a fire in Peſth, which ſtil more and more increaſed, there being none that went about to quench it, aduentured to come ouer the riuer from Buda, and to draw neer to the town now all on a light fire, which finding abandoned & forſaken by the Chriſtians, they diligently quenched, and repaired the ruines of the wall, and ſo without any loſſe became Maſters of the ſame.

Iagenreuter the cowardly late gouernor, with his fearful troups in the mean time comming to Strigonium, and by the Gouernor examined of the cauſes of his flight, & of the ſo ſhamefull leauing of his charge; and beeing able to alledge no other cauſe or reaſon, but the great bruit or report of the Viſier Baſſa's comming with his army to beſiege the towne: was therefore committed to priſon, and there reſerued to be afterward iuſtly puniſhed for his diſloyaltie and cowardiſe.

The Baſſa of Buda by the Gouernors cowardiſe thus poſſeſſed of Peſth, by letters excuſed himſelf to the gouernor of Strigonium for the taking therof, the treaty of peace being not as yet quite broken off: alledging for himſelf (as the truth was) that he had taken it as a place by the Chriſtians vpon a vain fear forſaken and deſperatly ſet on fire, without any ſuch cauſe giuen them by him or any of the Turks. And further, offered vnto the gouernor, if he ſo pleaſed, to deal with him for the exchange of priſoners on both ſides taken, offering to exchange one for another. And as for the concluding of the peace, ſo oftentimes intreated of, and euen yet in hand, that he for his part was wonderfull deſirous it might be fully concluded and ended, before the arriuall of Haſſan with his Army in Hungarie: for that he being once come, there would then be no time amidſt the noiſe of ſo many weapons, and ſo many men of Warre, to talke of peace.

Haſſan comes into Hungary.

Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa was now for all that already entered into Hungary, drawing after him a world of men, and was come towards Sexart. For the viewing of which army the Gouernor of Palantwar going forth with an hundred horſemen, by euill hap chanced before hee was aware, vpon the ſudden to meet with fiue hundred Turkes, by the Baſſa himſelfe likewiſe ſent forth to diſcouer the Countrey and the paſſages therof; by whom hee charged, and

A and with the multitude of his enemies oppreſſed, was himſelf, taken priſoner, moſt of his men being in that conflict ſlaine, ſome few of them that were left aliue by ſpeedy flight hardly eſcaping.
Which euill hap on the Chriſtians ſide, was forthwith recompenced with the better ſucceſſe of the County Serin, who falling vpon three hundred Turks neere vnto Sigeth, being in number ſcarce halfe ſo many as them, yet ſet vpon them with ſuch courage, that giuing them no leiſure to conſider of the weakeneſſe of his forces, they were by them ouerthrowne and cut in pieces, before they were well aware of him.

But together with the time of the yeare, to come vnto the maine point of theſe preſent warres in Hungary: the Turks finding themſelues ont of hope by any capitulations or treaties of peace, to regaine the ſtrong towne of Strigonium out of the hands of the Chriſtians, B were now reſolued to employ the vttermoſt of their forces for the obtaining of the ſame; with a thouſand proteſtations, That if by force of armes and ſtrong hand they ſhould gaine the place, they would neuer more haue peace with the Chriſtians. At which their vain threats and ſpeeches, the Chriſtians before reſolutely ſet downe for the defending of the place by them ſo much deſired, and well acquainted with their great brags, could not but with ſcorne ſmile, as men nothing therewith diſmaied, nor ſo to be remoued. Neuertheleſſe the Baſſa conſtant in his reſolution for the regaining of Strigonium, with all his forces came the eighteenth day of September and laied ſiege vnto it. Now vnto this ſiege the Turks, in hope of ſpoyle and booty, came flocking from all places, as it bad beene to ſome great Mart; and the fields in all the Country thereabout were couered and ſwarmed with armes, men, horſes, and C tents. They encamped neere vnto Charles his hill, taking vp with their tents halfe a league of the Country round about: and at their firſt comming moſt brauely aduanced their Enſignes with their halfe Moones, the arms of their ſtil encreaſing Empire. Whom the beſieged in this action imitated, brauely aduancing their Enſignes vpon their walls, as did the Turks in the fields; and further brauing and prouoking them with a thouſand thundering ſhot, diſcharged out of the Towne amongſt them. All the wall round about the Towne gliſtered with armes and flames of fire, out of which the deadly bullets flew, carrying with them death and terrour into the middeſt of theſe new come enemies, for their welcome. The Turks neuertheleſſe came ſtill reſolutely on, and as men prodigall of their liues euen in the middeſt of ſo many dangers, began to make their approches. Vpon whom the Chriſtians with great courage ſallied D forth, to diſturbe them in their works, and ſo for the ſpace of certaine houres hauing had with them an hot and ſharpe skirmiſh, without any great hurt receiued, retired againe into the towne, leauing vnto their enemies by that they had done, a good teſtimony of their valor and reſolution. The Turks for all that lodged themſelues, made their trenches, and ſo encamped before the mount of Saint Thomas, where by the placing of their cannon, they well declared their meaning for the battering of that fort.

Strigonium beſieged by the Turks.

The Chriſtians ſally forth vpon the Turks.

Againſt which their deſignes, George Baſta, Lieutenant General of the Imperial army, right reſolutely oppoſed himſelfe, hauing neere vnto Strigonium caſt vp a ſtrong fort, well furniſhed with men and great artillery, from which he greatly annoied the Turks with his great ordnance, and with the fury thereof enforced them to remoue farther off with their approches: E his army vpon the riuer of Danubius in the meane time lying betwixt the Iſle of Strigonium, and the old towne of the Raſcians, to keep the enemy from entering either into the one place or the other.

The carefull endeuors of Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant Generall, for the preſeruation of Strigonium.

County Sultze Gouernour of the place alſo hauing taken a generall muſter of his men, and with comfortable and cheerefull ſpeeches encouraged his ſouldiers, putting them in minde of their duty, and of the honourableneſſe of the action now in hand, as vndertaken for the maintenance of the Chriſtian Religion, for the ſeruice of the Emperour, and the ſafegard of their owne liues: perſuading them withall, not to put any truſt or confidence in the Turks faith, or faire promiſes, conſidering that their weapons were euen yet wet with the bloud of their Chriſtian brethren, moſt perfidiouſly by them of late maſſacred and ſlaine at the taking F of Alba Regalis: encouraging them alſo with the goodneſſe of their cauſe, with the carefulneſſe of their friends abroad for their reliefe, with the regard of their owne valour, and cowardiſe of their barbarous enemies, whoſe onely hope and truſt was in their multitude: and withall comforting them, that holding out but ſome few moneths, the very elements themſelues and the time of the yeare, would as it were fight for them, and affoord them aid, their enemies being not able with their great army, in the exrremity of Winter weather, without their irreparable loſſes to hold the field. And that as for himſelfe, his honour together with his life, were ſo bound vnto his graue and ſepulchre, at the foot of the wals of that place, as that they could not be from the ſame ſeparated; hauing propoſed the glory of the preſeruation of that place, or elſe of an honourable death, as the end of all his actions, and conſummation of all his hopes. And that therefore he moſt earneſtly beſought them to follow his ſo honourable a purpoſe, in aſſiſting him in that action, ſo much concerning their liues and honour, and wholly depending of their courage and reſolution. And that for teſtimony of his earneſt deſire to the furthering of this ſeruice, he was willing to depart with a good part of his ſubſtance and treaſure, to be beſtowed vpon them, amiddeſt theſe the trophies of his honour; hauing commanded them to haue certaine moneths pay payed before hand vnto them, which was accordingly done.

Now the Turks hauing a purpoſe eaſily to begin the conqueſt of Strigonium by the taking of the ſtrong fort of Saint Thomas, came the foure and twentieth day of September to aſſault and batter the ſame: vpon whom fiue hundred horſemen, and two thouſand footmen ſallying out of the fort, cauſed them, after a ſharpe and bloudy conflict, and not without ſome loſſe on both ſides, to retyre backe againe, and to forſake the mount whereupon they were encamped. But in purſuing of them too farre, they fell into a great ambuſh, before by the Turkes for that purpoſe layed to entrap them; where betwixt them was fought a moſt ſharpe and bloudy fight; the Turks preſuming vpon their multitude, and the Chriſtians ſtanding vpon their valour and honour. Vntill that in fine, valour by number being oppreſſed, ſeuen hundred of the Turks being ſlaine, the Chriſtians were enforced to retire, hauing loſt about an hundred of their men, and amongſt them the valiant County Caſimir of Hohenloth, for whoſe dead body there was a notable fight betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks; not much vnlike vnto that which the Poet Homer deſcribeth, to haue been fought betwixt the Trojanes and the Greekes, for the body of Patroclus. Howbeit that at length the Chriſtians being ouercharged with the comming on of the whole army of the Turks, were glad (as I ſaid) to retire, and ſo to leaue the dead body of the County Caſimir in the power of their mercileſſe enemies; who as dogs which reuenge themſelues vpon the ſtones which are caſt at them, being not able to bite the hands of them that threw them, ſo did they vpon the body of this gentle Knight, by cutting off his noſe and eares, and afterwards his head. But within ſome few daies after, this body ſo diſfigured was againe deliuered vnto the Chriſtians for a Turke of good account, who was about that time by them taken priſoner. At which time the Turks ſeemed to be very deſirous of peace, moſt earneſtly requeſting County Fredericke of Hohenloth (the ſlaine Counties brother) not to be an hinderer thereof. Howbeit that this was but one of their old practiſes, depending ſtill vpon vnreaſonable conditions, whereof the yeelding vp of Strigonium was one of the chiefeſt, as the place by them moſt deſired.

Hatwan moſt ſhamefully forſaken by the Chriſtians

But if this ſiege of the Turks auailed them not againſt the place beſieged, yet was it profitable for them againſt another place by them not artempted, which was the ſtrong Towne of Hatwan, more ſubject vnto feare, without any danger, than was Strigonium vnto the bullets and battery of the Turks, with juſt cauſe of diſtruſt. For the ſouldiers which lay there in garriſon, terrified with the ſiege of Strigonium, and doubting leſt the Turks leauing that ſiege, ſhould come and beſiege them, truſſing vp their bag and baggage, the nineteenth of September abandoned the place, and carrying away with them the beſt of the great ordnance, left the reſt altogether with the place, and great ſtore of prouiſion, vnto the enemy, not in hope of any ſuch matter.

The bruit of the ſiege of Strigonium had called thither all the forces of both parties in Hungary, and the Countries thereabouts, on the one ſide for the winning thereof, and on the other for the defence of the ſame. Amongſt others, the County of Tambier, Gouernour of Lippa, was about to haue gone thither with certaine of his troups to haue aided the Generall, for the preſeruation of the place. But in the meane time Bethlem Habor, chiefe of the rebels in Tranſyluania, aſſiſted by Beckheres Baſſa with foure thouſand Turks enterd into the Prouince, to haue made himſelfe maſter thereof vnder the protection of the Turke. Whereof the

A County hauing got knowledge, reſolued to go and meet him, and to encounter him at the very firſt enterance of him into the Prouince. This old Rebell knowing that George Baſta was by the Emperours appointment gone out of the country with the beſt troups of his horſemen, the greateſt ſtrength of the Prouince, came on in great ſecurity, thinking of nothing but of victory, and of performing his intended exploit, without feare of any to let him: ſo that caſting no further perill, he was ſurpriſed by the County, before he was aware, and put to flight. Neither was the fight long betwixt men accuſtomed to vanquiſh, reſolutely ſet downe, and well armed, againſt men daſmaied, halfe naked, and ſurpriſed. In which conflict aboue a thouſand of them being ſlaine, and a thouſand of horſes of ſeruice taken, the reſt fled; amongſt whom Bethlin himſelfe with the Baſſa flying, were glad by ſwimming to ſaue themſelues amiddeſt a thouſand chances and dangers of their liues.

Bethlem Habor the Rebell ſurpriſed & ouerthrowne by the County Tambier:

B The Baſſa of Temeſwar aduertiſed of this ouerthrow by one of them that was fled from the ſame, preſently he ſent forth his Lieutenant with a good number of men, to relieue the vanquiſhed Turkes: Who by the way vnderſtanding of the generall ouerthrow of them whom hee was ſent forth to relieue, as alſo of the ſtrength of his enemies, and that hee was come too late to the reliefe of his friends, retired as faſt as he could with his men backe againe homeward toward Temeſwar. But being in their retreat diſcouered, and hotly purſued by theſe men imbrued with the bloud of their enemies, and yet breathing with victory, they were by them ouertaken euen almoſt at the gates of their City, and there (as men before ouer-come with feare, and ouerwhelmed with deſpaire) cut in pieces, without any fight or reſi-C ſtance by them made, beſeeming men of their ſort, the Lieutenant himſelfe being there ſlaine alſo.

Succors ſent to the rebels by the Baſſa or Temeſwar, defeated by the County Tambier.

After which exploits done, the County turning towards Iula, chanced to light vpon certaine companies of Turks loaded with booty, which they had got in roaming abroad into the Countrey thereabout, whom he purſued euen vnto the gates of the towne, which they found ſhut againſt them; for that they within the towne ſeeing the Chriſtians euen at the heeles of their companions, had ſhut their gates, neither durſt now open the ſame, for feare leſt the Chriſtians ſhould together with them enter the towne, and ſo become maſters thereof. Who ſo ſhut out by their owne friends, were there all by the Chriſtians ſlaine, euen in the ſight of their companions, not daring to let them in, nor able to relieue them. After which maſſacre D done, the Chriſtians not yet ſo contented, burnt the ſuburbs of the towne, and ſo loaded with the ſpoiles of their enemies, departed. The County after ſo many honourable exploits in a ſmall time performed, returned to Lippa, where he arriued the 25 of September, and from thence afterward aduertiſing Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant Generall, of theſe his exploits don, cauſed ten of the Turks Enſignes, all ſtained with their owne bloud, to be preſented vnto him, as the ſure tokens of his good ſeruine done.

But to returne againe vnto the ſiege of Strigonium, the greateſt exploit by the Turks en-tended for this yeare, from which we haue from the occurrent of the ſame time a little ſtrayed. The Viſier Baſſa perceiuing by the valiant and reſolute defence of our men, how little hee preuailed in this ſiege, and that it was like enough to tend at length to his diſhonour, E thought it good once againe to prooue, if hee might by compoſition gaine that which hee was now almoſt out of hope by force to obtaine. And to that purpoſe cauſed a motion to be made vnto the beſieged, for a treaty to be had concerning a peace, and a day appointed for the ſame. Vnto which motion for peace the Imperials (although they had no hope at all, of any peace to be concluded) eaſily yeelded, leſt they might bee thought obſtinately to haue rejected the ſame. Whereupon Commiſſioners were on both ſides appointed, to meet together, to conferre of the matter. And ſo for the Emperour Althem himſelfe, with Ferdi- nand Collonitz, and Fredericke of Hohenlo, County of Rhene, were appointed neere vnto the Raſcian Towne to meet with the Turks Commiſſioners, to heare what they would ſay. Howbeit the Commiſſioners on both ſides beeing met at the place aforeſaid, all their conference F was but vaine and to no purpoſe; the Turkes ſtill vrging the yeelding vp of Strigonium, and the Imperials as earneſtly refuſing the ſame. So that the treaty for peace being broken off, and the Commiſſioners departing, the ſiege was more cruelly by the Turks continued

Now there were in the Turks army lying at the ſiege, certaine companies of Coſſackes, G men for their pay indifferent to ſerue any Prince of what Religion ſoeuer. Which ſeruiceable men, in number 700, had agreed together the 28 of September, by night to forſake the Turks campe, and to come vnto the Chriſtians. Of which their purpoſe and deſigne the Viſier Baſſa hauing by ſome vntruſty amongſt them got knowledge, cauſed the footmen of theſe companies to be apprehended and ſlaine; the horſemen in the meane time making themſelues way ouer the bellies of ſuch as would haue ſtaied them, fled, and eſcaped, ſome of them to Komara, and ſome to Dotis. Threeſcore of theſe Caſſocks being by the Turks hardly purſued, aduentured to ſwim ouer Danubius, and ſo all naked came to Collonitz, by whom they were courteouſly entertained and apparelled. And within three daies after, two hundred horſemen moe of the ſame Coſſackes came to Collonitz alſo: who marching in good order vnto the head of H the Chriſtian campe, were there ſworne vnto the Emperours ſeruice; and in token of their loyalty, there diſcharged their piſtols thrice. Which horſemen Collonitz diuided among the reſt of his troups, as hauing before time had good experience of the courage and good ſeruice of diuers ſuch others of their fellowes.

By theſe fugitiue ſoldiers it was vnderſtood, that the Ianizaries in great number vp in mutiny againſt the Viſier Baſſa, would haue enforced him to haue raiſed the ſiege, and ſo to haue departed. The cauſe of their ſo great diſcontentment (as they pretended) was the manifeſt and aſſured danger of their liues, with little or no hope at all for the gaining of the place: They themſelues being ſtill expoſed to the dangers both of the ſiege and of the field, hauing the beſieged on head of them armed with an aſſured reſolution, and the Chriſtian army at I their backes, of knowne valour and experience. Beſides that, the place it ſelfe was (as they ſaid) impregnable, being at all times to be relieued, by reaſon that it commanded ouer the Danuby, which might alwaies relieue it both with men and victuals. And that therefore after that they had ſatisfied their honour, by giuing an aſſault or two vnto the fort of Saint Thomas, they had reſolued to ariſe, and to be gone. And much about this time, viz. the nine and twentieth of September, in the night time, was a moſt dreadfull fiery impreſſion ſeene in faſhion much like a Rainebow, of a fiery red colour, which beginning ouer Cockera, and riſing higher ouer Strigonium, at length vaniſhed away ouer the fort of Saint Thomas. The ſight whereof much troubled the beholders thereof, as well the Chriſtians as the Turkes: ſuch K ſtrange meteors and apparitions being oftentimes the preſages of the ruine of them to whom they appeare.

In the meane time whileſt the Turks thus lay before Strigonium, at the ſiege of Saint Thomas fort, the Lord Baſta, Lieutenant Generall of the Emperours forces, to giue the Turks to vnderſtand, how that he was alwaies in readineſſe to attend vpon their doings, and to take hold of all ſuch opportunities as ſhould by them be offered, and ſo to keepe them in ſuſpence, came with ſeuen thouſand braue horſemen, and ſhewed himſelfe in the plaine field in order of battell; ſo, as it were, brauing the Turks euen vnto their owne trenches: where hauing diſcharged their piſtols thrice, they returned as victorious, alwaies keeping themſelues in order, as men ready either to giue or to accept of battell. Howbeit the Turks for the preſent keeping themſelues cloſe within their trenches, mooued not; but afterwards being deſirous to counter-braue L this the Chriſtians preſumption, the third day of October they came forth of their trenches, and gaue a ſecond aſſault to Saint Thomas fort, imploying the vttermoſt of their power in this action, whereupon they well knew a great part both of their honour and of their ſafety to depend. But in aſſayling the fort they met with them as reſolutely ſet downe for the defence thereof, and for the maintenence of their honour, as were they for the winning of the ſame. So the aſſault was begun with great fury and aduenture, as was the other before: howbeit that it endured not long, for that the Turks fought rather for the diſcharge of their duty, and to haue ſome iuſt cauſe to raiſe their ſiege, than for any hope they had to preuaile, or to carry the place. For it befell them according as they had expected, ſo that after that the M fight had endured little more than halfe an houre, amiddeſt the tempeſts of armes and fury, in fine the Turks out of hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the ſiege, and retired, hauing in that conflict loſt fiue hundred of their beſt ſouldiers.

The fort of S. Thomas againe aſſaulted.

The Gouernour of Strigonium had in the city vnder his charge ſix thouſand Hiaduckes, who

A who attainted with treaſon and feare, all forſooke the place excepting fiue hundred, preferring their liues vnworthy the ſauing, before their duty, and the life and honour of their Generall. With which ſhamefull treaſon, and the reſolution of the great Baſſa for forcing of the place, the Germanes there left, ſeeing their Captaines diſmaied, gathered themſelues together, promiſing by their own valour, to ſupply what wanted by reaſon of the trechery of the others; offering themſelues to be ſworne againe vnto the ſeruice of the Emperour, and rather to die all in the place, than to yeeld it vp vnto the Turks, or to leaue it vnto their enemies: where by their generall conſent a ſolemne decree was made, that whoſoeuer hee were which ſhould ſpeake or once make mention of yeelding the Towne, ſhould forthwith therefore be hanged vpon a gibbet. The Turks although they had now in two aſſaults been twice B repulſed, came yet forth once againe the fifth day of October, and aſſaulted Saint Thomas fort the third time: wherein they failed not to doe what they might, but were by the Chriſtians therein ſo receiued, that deſpairing of the winning thereof, they with great loſſe and ſhame retired. Which diſgrace cauſed them to returne to their old practiſes, for the taking of places by policy. For hauing in many places vndermined the walls, and filled them with gunpouder, they were in hope by that meanes to haue opened themſelues a way vnto their conqueſt. Of which their hope for all that, they were deceiued: for the Chriſtians hauing perceiued their meaning, did by countermining not only fruſtrate their endeauour, but carried away the pouder alſo, which they had before laied in the mines, reſeruing it to their owne further neceſſity and vſe. Wherefore the Turks ſeeing themſelues of thir hope deceiued, C returned againe vnto their old practiſes, to come to a parly for peace. Of which their motion the Chriſtians nothing diſliked. But the Commiſſioners on both ſides being met together for that purpoſe, in a little Iſland beneath Strigonium, when as the Turkes had offered vnto the Chriſtians the City of Agria for Strgonium; or if ſo be that that exchange pleaſed them not, but that they would needs keepe the City of Strigonium ſtill, that then in conſideration of the peace, they ſhould deliuer vnto them the ſtrong Townes of Fileck, Saint Setſchin, Pallanke, and Nouigrade; both of which demands were very vnreaſonable: The Commiſſioners thereupon againe departed without concluding of any thing.

The fort of S. Thomas the third time aſſaulted.

Now the army of the Turkes was in it ſelfe diuerſly diuided with quite contrary deſires; D the Viſier Baſſa with ſome other of the Commanders, ſtood ſtifly for the taking of the place, as men willing either to returne from thence with victory, or elſe there to end their daies: but the Ianizaries to the contrary, were as earneſt to be gone, and to raiſe the ſiege, deeming it impoſſible then to preuaile againſt a place ſo ſtrong, ſo well manned, and ſo eaſily to be ſtill relieued. With which their reſolution ſo contrary vnto his, the Baſſa enraged, and yet propoſing before his departure to proue the vttermoſt of his forces againſt the fort now already by him thrice before aſſaulted, the tenth of October gaue thereunto ſix great aſſaults, but with like ſucceſſe as before, finding there ſtill the ſame defendants, no whit diſcouraged, but armed with their accuſtomed reſolution. For the defendants encouraged by their moſt valiant commanders, with ſuch fury repulſed the Turks, that they were glad to giue ouer aſſault E vpon aſſault, and with great loſſe of their men to retire. Their often retreats alſo being vnto them no leſſe hurtfull than were their aſſaults, the deadly bullets being out of their fort diſcharged vpon them like ſhowers of haile. So that the Baſſa now after ſo many aſſaults, out of all hope to gaine the fort, and ſtill preſſed by the Ianizaries for the raiſing of the ſiege, immediatly after roſe with his army, quitted his trenches, and retired with his campe neere vnto a caſtle, about a league diſtant from Strigonium. From whence the Turks the better to couer their diſhonour, and to hinder the Chriſtians from purſuing of them in their retreat, the next day after came into the field with a good part of their army, and ſhewed themſelues before the Raſcian Towne, and there skirmiſhed with the Chriſtian Haiduckes. Which manner of skirmiſhing for all that was more in ſhew, than in effect, neither party therein F receiuing any great loſſe or hurt. In the meane time, the beſieged which were in Strigonium, hauing gotten certaine knowledge, that the enemy had already remoued his cannon and other prouiſion for the ſiege backe againe into Buda, in token of joy diſcharged all their great Ordnance out of the city and the fort; by the report thereof giuing knowledge vnto the

the other townes and caſtles of the Chriſtians, of their deliuerance. Of which ſo common a joy euery one of them were partakers, as deliuered from ſome part of the feare which the ſiege of ſo great a city as was Strigonium, had brought vpon them. And ſo the ſiege of Strigonium, begun the eighteenth day of September, was by the Turks giuen ouer the thirteenth of October: the Ianizaries inſolently threatening to haue ſlaine the great Baſſa their Generall, if he had there any longer ſtaied.

Baſta the Emperors Lieutenant in the meane time awaiting all opportunities, failed not to take hold of ſo fit an occaſion, but with his horſemen following after the Turks army, ſlew of them a great number, and tooke ſome other of them priſoners. And afterward returning vnto their campe, found it void of men, but full of bullets, with certain pieces of great ordnance, which the Turks had left there, hauing not time to remoue the ſame to Buda. Vpon this riſing of the Turks army the Commanders thereof were diuerſly affected vnto the ſeruice that was further to be done, as they had before been in the time of the ſiege. Such of them as lay in Hungary or neere therunto, deſiring ſtill to hold the field, in hope of the ſpoile of the country: but they which dwelt farther off, eſpecially ſuch as were come out of Aſia, deſiring as much to be diſcharged, their horſes being almoſt all dead with faintneſſe and trauell, and themſelues weary of the ſeruice.

Shortly after the riſing of the Turks army from Strigonium, two fugitiues of the Turks moſt brauely mounted, came vnto Baſta the Emperors Lieutenant, and preſenting him with a ring of great value, and a moſt faire Turkiſh Enſigne, told him, moſt part of the Turks army to lie then incamped in the country neere vnto Peſth; and the great Cham, a young Prince of about twenty yeares old to be come thither with a great power of Tartars, to aid the Baſſa: And that the Turks by their comming incouraged, were determined yet to make a great excurſion for the ſpoiling of the country. All which ſhortly after was certainely knowne to be true, the plaine country of the vpper Hungary about Palanka, Setſchin, and Villecampe, being by them, but eſpecially of theſe new come Tartars, all ſpoiled and burnt. For remedy whereof Sigefride Collonitz oppoſing himſelfe with his Hungarian horſemen, againſt theſe inſolent forragers, ſo danted them, that ceaſing further to ſpoile the country, they departed, carrying away with them ſuch priſoners and ſpoile as they had there taken, and leauing behind them a ſtrong garriſon of three thouſand good ſouldiers, for the repairing and keeping of Peſth, but a little before cowardly (as we ſaid) by the Chriſtians forſaken. But within ſome few daies after, viz. the foure and twentieth of October, the Viſier Baſſa by his letters written vnto County Althem Gouernour of Strigonium, made a mention for a treaty of peace to be had for the comfort of the diſtreſſed people of that ſpoiled country, ſolemnly proteſting, moſt religiouſly on his part to keepe the ſame, if it ſhould be once concluded: and yet in the meane time with fire and ſword ſpoiling all the Countrey by the way as he departed out of Hungary.

But now as this poore Country began to feele reliefe by the departure of the great Baſſa with his army out thereof, ſo the Country of Tranſyluania joyning thereunto, was at the ſame time as much with rebellion and diſcord diſtreſſed. Bethlin Habor the Rebell, with his Baſſa ouerthrowne and driuen out of Tranſyluania (as is aforeſaid) the Lord Belgioſa, Baſta his Lieutenant in this prouince, thinking all things now at quiet, was making himſelf ready with his troups, to haue gon to aid the Lord Baſta his General, then incamped in the plains of Strigonium, to hinder the Turks deſignes for the taking of this Towne. But as he was about ſo to haue done, behold, euen at the ſame time when he leaſt feared, a ſecond Rebell there ſtarted vp far worſe than the firſt, namely, the Lord Iſtiuan (otherwiſe ſurnamed Botſcay, or more truely * Potſcay) who accompanied with great troups of men of warre vnder the protection of the Turke, and ſtiling himſelfe by the name of the Prince of Tranſyluania, entering that Prouince, miſerably burnt and ſpoiled the ſame. For the repreſſing of which ſo ſudden a rebellion, Belgioſa with a thouſand horſe, vnder the leading of Rotkeuitz and Peter Laſla, marched toward Veradin: and with his troupe comming to Ador, a country village about a league diſtant from Veradin, and meaning thither to aſſemble together his army, he ſent to Petſie Gouernour of Veradin, to put him in minde of his duty, and to craue his aid. Which valiant captaine, alwaies preſt and ready to do his Prince ſeruice, failed not now of his duty, but calling

He was in ſcorn called Potſcay (which in the Bohemian language ſignifieth tarry, or ſtay) of the long delaies hee by way of diſgrace had before endured in the emperors court.

A together ſix companies of footmen out of Romoſa, and joyning vnto them foure companies out of Veradin, together with the Sileſian horſemen of Schuet-Kenhut his Regiment) whom by reaſon of his ſickeneſſe he was not able to lead) and with them the Haiduckes of County Tambier, came vnto the place of the rendezuous, bringing with him all warlike prouiſion in token of his fidelity. With this army Belgioſa marched againſt the Rebels, who as reſolute men attended his comming: for why, Botſcay knowing the Haiduckes of County Tambier ſecretly to fauour him and his rebellion more than they did Belgioſa and his juſt quarrels, ſtood in no feare of them, but aſſured himſelfe of them as of his friends; who failed not of his hope and expectation, but euen at the firſt joyning of the battell, turned themſelues to his part: with the going ouer of whom, the number of the Rebels was much encreaſed, and Belgioſa his B power both in force and courage much weakened, ſeeing themſelues at once expoſed both vnto the force of their enemies, and to the trechery of their fellowes, who now with conjoyned forces moſt fiercely aſſailed them: who finding themſelues now on all ſides inuironed with ſo great a multitude, and not able with ſo ſmall a number as was left, to withſtand the violence of their enemies, and the treaſon of their companions; after they had to the vttermoſt of their power performed all the parts of valiant and couragious men, were there almoſt all cut in pieces, and there buried in the field of their loyalty, honoured with their owne bloud, and altogether embrued with the bloud of their enemies. In this vnlucky and diſloyall fight were diuers good and faithfull Captaines ſlaine: Petſie Gouernour of Veradin, and Pallas Lippa, both great Captaines, and grieuouſly wounded, were there taken priſoners. The Lieutenant C of Petſie alſo, hauing retired himſelfe with ſome of his troups into a place of good ſtrength, there ſo valiantly defended themſelues, that Botſcay out of hope to ouercome them by force, to get them into his power promiſed them vpon his Oath, if they would yeeld themſelues, to ſuffer them in ſafety to depart. But what truſt or credit is to be giuen to him who hath before broken his faith and loyalty to his Prince, this Rebell well ſhewed by the death of theſe valiant and warlike men, who after that they had vpon his faith and promiſe yeelded themſelues, were by his appointment cruelly ſlaine and cut in pieces. The Sileſian horſmen were there alſo ouerthrowne and buried in the middeſt of their enemies: and as for Belgioſa himſelfe, he ſtrangely eſcaped out of the battell, and ſaued himſelfe by flying to Veradin. The Victorious Rebell after the battell, in ſtead of praiſing God, ſacrificed to the Diuell, by D ſending a great part of the Enſignes by him gained, to the Viſier Baſſa, with a thouſand praiſes of his glory, for ſupporting him in his rebellion; and vaunting much of this his victory, gaue him withall to vnderſtand, That he had ſlaine aboue 6000 of his enemies.

Belgioſa in a great battell ouerthrowne by Botſcay the Rebell.

This victory gotten, together with the humble ſubmiſſion of Botſcay, obtained of the Great Sultan, That from thenceforth he ſhould be ſtiled by the name of the Prince of Tranſyluania, with a further charge from him, to do the vttermoſt of his endeauour for the ſubduing vnto his obeyſance the reſt of Tranſyluania; promiſing plentifully to ſupply his wants both with men and mony, and out of hand to ſend him three thouſand Tartars to his aid. And indeed this was a very great and bloudy battell, fought from the firſt breake of the day, vntill eleuen a clocke at noone: but whether ſo many were ſlaine there or no, it cannot certainely E be told, for that diuers of them who were ſaid to be ſlaine, and ſo accounted among the dead, had hid themſelues in the wood thereby, and ſome others of them by ſome other meanes eſcaped death alſo. Petſie himſelfe had with him when he was taken two Monkes, whom the ſouldiers in deſpight cut into many pieces, and carried him faſt bound in chains to Derritza, to be there cured of the dangerous wounds by him in the battell receiued.

Botſcay in his rebellion countenanced by the Great Sultan, and called prince of Tranſylvania.

But as for Pallas Lippa, who being wounded, was taken priſoner with Petſie, hee was afterwards by Botſcay appointed his Lieutenant Generall, and ſo by his commandement was publipuely proclaimed, as he which was deſirous to take vpon him the defence of the reformed Religion, and of ſuch as were willing to profeſſe the ſame: who forthwith made a generall proclamation, That all they which were deſirous of the liberty of conſcience, and to liue free F from the ſuperſtitions of the Roman Church, ſhould repaire vnto him as vnto their head and chiefetaine, ready to entertaine them, and to allow to euery one of them fiue Dollars a month for their pay. Vpon which Proclamation made, a great multitude of men vpon the ſudden reſorted vnto him; ſo that in a ſhort time he had following of him ten thouſand Haiduckes, beſide a number of the other common raſcall people; yea, almoſt all the gentlemen of the country repairing vnto him, bound themſelues by oath to him, and one of them to another, G That as they would not take vp armes to fight againſt the Chriſtian Emperor, ſo they would not ſubmit themſelues vnto the Turke, but only ſtand vpon the defence of their religion, and the liberty of conſcience.

The Rebell Botſcay thus wonderfully encreaſed in ſtrength and number, beſet almoſt all the paſſages of the country, and with the ſword of rebellion in his hand, and his ſouldiers following him, commanded the cities ſtill as he went to yeeld vnto him: but hearing that Belgioſa was after the late ouerthrow gone from Veradin to Caſſouia, where his wife lay; and being come thither, to haue been by the citiſens rejected, who would not only not receiue him into their city, but turned his wife alſo out of their city vnto him; he with a great army comming thither, tooke the City without reſiſtance, the Citiſens for the moſt part enclining vnto H him. Of which City beeing poſſeſſed, hee forthwith changed both the Religion and ciuile gouernment thereof, ſlew part of ſuch as were of the Romiſh Religion, and thruſt the reſt out of the City, with all the Church men, tooke the Biſhop and the Emperours Treaſuror priſoners, and ſo changed the whole gouernment of the Towne vpſide downe. The onely man he ſtood in feare of, was Belgioſa, for whom he laid wait by all meanes hee could to haue taken him, with a purpoſe to haue vſed him moſt hardly, if hee had fallen into his hands.

Theſe things thus done in Tranſyluania and in Hungary, the Viſier Baſſa being about to returne to Conſtantinople, to grace that little which he had done this yeare in Hungary, and I to auoid the ſuſpition of his euill ſucceſſe in that Prouince, borrowed of Botſcay the reſt of the Enſignes, together with Petſie and other the noble Chriſtian captiues which he had taken in the late battell with Belgioſa: which Enſignes and priſoners he confidently afterwards cauſed to be preſented vnto the Great Sultan Achmat, as taken by himſelfe; and in recompence thereof, left three thouſand Turks and Tartars with the Rebell, to aid him in his wars both in Tranſyluania and Hungary.

Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant in Hungary, and Gouernour of Tranſyluania, hearing of the ſtirres and troubles of late raiſed in both thoſe Countries, by Botſcay and his rebellious Followers, and hauing as he thought beſt, ſet all things in order againe at Strigonium, marched thence with his Army, being fouretеene thouſand ſtrong, towards Caſſouia, with a K purpoſe to haue ſuppreſſed the rebellion in the vpper Hungary, before it ſhould haue ſpred farther, to the endangering of the whole ſtate of both thoſe Countries, as afterward it did. Howbeit before he could come thither, the Rebels after the taking of Caſſouia, being wonderfully encreaſed both in ſtrength and number, had taken in moſt of the ſtrong Townes and places in the vpper Hungary, the people almoſt generally now fauouring their quarrell, carrying with it the face of Religion, with the ſuppreſſing of the German gouernement, both things vnto them much pleaſing. And now hearing that Belgioſa (a man of them moſt hated, beeing, as we ſaid, ſhut out of Caſſouia) was fled into the Caſtle of Zipze, they by Letters required of Turſon Captaine of the Caſtle, to haue him deliuered vnto them, to be according to his deſerts puniſhed; promiſing withall, to doe Turſon himſelfe no harme, ſo L that hee would take part with them in defence of their Religion, and of the liberty of conſcience: which if hee ſhould refuſe to doe, yet that they would giue him free liberty to depart whither hee would, out of his Caſtle, and in ſafety to conduct him thither, ſo that he would forthwith reſolue, what courſe hee would take. But if hee ſhould of this his offer miſlike alſo, then they threatened to ſpoyle his Countrey, to kill his people, to raſe his Caſtle, and to make himſelfe an example vnto others. Wherewith for all that hee nothing mooued, refuſed to deliuer vnto them Belgioſa, the man whom they ſo much deſired, or yet to accept of any of their other offers. Whereupon the Rebels with great labour repairing the broken way betwixt Caſſouia and the Caſtle, and bringing certaine pieces of great Ordnance from Caſſouia, in great number came and ſtreightly beſieged the Caſtle. M With whoſe attempts the valiant Captaine nothing mooued, with his thundering ſhot out of the Caſtle ſo welcommed them, that hauing thereby receiued great harme, they thought it not their beſt courſe to ſtay any longer there with ſo great a power, but with the greateſt

A part thereof to go to Preſburg, to reforme that city and ſome other places by the way; perſuading themſelues, That the Captaine of this caſtle ſo ſhut vp, and on euery ſide beſet with his enemies, would at length of himſelfe yeeld vp the caſtle.

But while the Rebels thus lay at the ſiege of this caſtle, certaine companies of them went to haue taken the ſpoile of a Religious houſe there by: but comming thither, and breaking open the doores, and ſearching euery ſecret corner of the houſe, they found therein nothing worth the reckoning of, but ſo returned almoſt empty handed: for the Prieſts had for feare of them before carried away with them all the beſt of their goods and ſubſtance into the beſieged caſtle. And ſo likewiſe the riſe report of their comming to Presburg flying abroad, almoſt all the Prieſts and Ieſuits in Presburg and the country thereabout, leauing their Churches B and Colledges, fled with their ſubſtance to Vienna, ſcarcely accounting themſelues ſafe there, vntill that the garriſon of that ſtrong city was increaſed with a new ſupply of ſix hundred good ſouldiers.

And now the Rebels, their number ſtill more and more encreaſing, and hauing ſet all the vpper part of Hungary on a broyle, were beſieging diuers other caſtles and ſtrong places, yet holden for the Emperor; when as Baſta in the meane time, comming from the ſiege of Strigonium, came and with his army encamped about three miles from Filek. Of whoſe comming the Rebels hearing, and thereupon retyring, he forthwith followed after them toward Budnoc, which caſtle they alſo left, and ſo neere vnto Ramoſambat, the place of their rendezuous, gathered together a great number, with an intent to haue giuen Baſta battell. Whereof Baſta C hauing knowledge, to ſpare the effuſion of more Chriſtian bloud, by an Herauld ſent vnto them in friendly and courteous manner, aduiſed them to change their minds, and to returne againe vnto their former allegiance. But finding them obſtinately ſet downe in their former purpoſe, for the maintaining of their rebellion, and the giuing of him battel, he marching forward with his army, with great force charged certaine companies of the Rebels, appointed to keepe the paſſage of Filek; who at the firſt right valiantly receiued the charge, and defended the paſſage, vntill that at length with number oppreſſed, and aboue foure hundred of them ſlaine, they were put to the worſe, and enforced to flee; in which flight, amongſt others there taken priſoners, Blaſe Nemet their captain was taken alſo, whom Baſta cauſed to be hanged vp by the heels, with the Enſignes ſet vp about him which he had taken from the rebels in the late fight; and D after he had for a time ſo hung, made him to be taken downe, and his head to be ſtrucke off from his ſhoulders. In this conflict fifty of Baſta his men were ſlaine alſo, and many moe hurt. and amongſt them Collonitz, hurt in his ſhoulder and his foot with a ſmall ſhot.

Baſta after this victory marching on with his army, by the way met with certaine other companies of the rebellious Haiducks as he was going to S. Peters, with whom he had many an hot ſkirmiſh for the ſpace of three daies together, being by them ſtill put to the worſe, inſomuch that hauing burnt many of his carriages, tents and other luggage, he was of nothing more carefull, than how well to get out of their hands. Neuertheleſſe ſeeing no other remedy, he with great courage not onely endured the often and fierce aſſaults of his enemies, ſtill more and more encreaſing vpon him, but the fourth day after ſo many vnfortunat ſkirmiſhes, E (being the eight aud twentieth of Nouember) putting his men in order of battell, right valiantly againe charged the Rebels: who by reaſon of the darkeneſſe of the weather, it beeing then a very thicke miſt, being not able to perceiue where the enemies attempts were moſt to be feared, or what way to turne their owne forces; as men diſmaied, were eaſily by them ouerthrowne and put to flight: who ſo flying, Baſta with his ſouldiers fiercely purſuing, made of them a great ſlaughter: ſo that in the ſpace of leſſe than three houres, fifteen hundred of them were in this thicke and darke miſt ſlain, with ſome few alſo of Baſta his ſouldiers, and amongſt them Fredericke Earle of Solmes, and the County of Erbach wounded. Vpon the report of which ouerthrow, the Rebels which yet lay at the ſiege of the caſtle of Zipze, in hope there at length to haue taken Belgioſa, forthwith roſe and retired themſelues to Leuſta. But Baſta after F this victory remoouing to Saint Andrewes, and hauing recouered that towne from the Rebels, and thereinto put a new garriſon, and ſo by this meanes ſomewhat daunted and repreſſed the inſolency of the Haiduckes in thoſe quarters, and being not well able longer to keepe the field with his army in ſo vnſeaſonable a time of the yeare, and ſo to maintaine warre as it were both both againſt his enemies,and the extremities of nature, ſought by letters to haue reclaimed them of Caſſouia againe vnto their obedience; offering vnto them pardon for all their offences paſt,ſo that they would now at laſt acknowledge their fault, and receiue into their towne a garriſon of the Emperors. To which purpoſe he writ alſo to them of Eperia, in hope that if he might ſo haue gained thoſe two ſtrong towns,to haue in them Wintered in ſafety with his army. But them of Coſſouia hauing in the city a ſtrang garriſon of ſix thouſand good ſouldiers,and out of feare to be by Baſta beſieged at that time of the yeare, and withall in hope (if need were) to be by Botſcay relieued, (who was then reported to be forty thouſand ſtrong) vtterly refuſed to hearken to Baſta his motion, for their reconciliation, or at all to ſubmit themſelues againe vnto the Emperour. Which cauſed him with his army to come neerer vnto the city, yet ſtill ſeeking rather by faire meanes to haue perſuaded the citiſens to haue returned vnto their loyalty, than by force to haue conſtrained them. But finding them obſtinately ſet downe, and by no perſuaſions to be remoued, but with their great ordnance in what they might to trouble his campe,he ſent before the County Hohenloh and Rotnitz, with part of his army to Eperia, to command them vpon their allegiance to receiue the Emperours ſouldiers into the city, and to relieue them with ſuch things as they were able: and within a few dayes after, viz. the fifth of December, followed himſelfe with the reſt of his army. But being come thither,after much talke had with the chiefe men of the City, it was at length,contrary to all mens expectation,agreed, That Baſta aſſuring them of the free exerciſe of their religion, of the good behauiour of the ſouldiers towards them, and to defend them from the iniury and incurſions of their enemies,they ſhould open the gates vnto the Imperials, and relieue them with what they were able, and ſo as before to continue in their allegiance and obedience vnto the Emperour. Of all which things when Baſta had vpon his faith giuen, aſſured them, they opened their gates and receiued in the ſouldiers: vnto whom now almoſt dead and ſtarued with hunger) nothing could haue happened more lucky or welcome. Leuſta, Barbeld, Zebena,famous townes in thoſe places,following the example of Eperia, ſubmitted themſelues in like manner, and helped Baſta his ſouldiers with reliefe. Thither with great danger came vnto Baſta, Sigefrid Collonitz, a man of great power and authority in that part of Hungary,to confer with him about the appeaſing of theſe troubles: who afterward by his letters vnto the States and the reſt of the Nobility of Hungary, yea, and to Botſcay himſelfe, in vaine perſuading them to lay downe armes,and to returne againe vnto their wonted obedience vnto the Emperour.

There had been hitherto in the Imperiall campe great ſcarcity of victuals and of other neceſſaries,ſo that for want thereof,and for the extremitie of the cold, and other miſeries, it was greatly feared,leſt the campe ſhould haue been broken vp; to the irrepairable loſſe of his Imperiall Majeſty,as the ſtate of things then ſtood in Hungary. For the remedy whereof,thirty waggons loded with mony and cloath were ſent from Vienna, vnder the conduct of County Solmes, Colonell Starenberg, the Treaſurer, and others: vnto whom Tanhuſar joyned fifteene hundred Huſſars(Hungarian horſemen ſo called)to ſtrengthen the conuoy againſt the danger which was feared from the Haiducks which lay vpon the way, and who indeed were now roaming about and ſeeking after booty in euery corner of the country. Which Huſſars being come with the reſt of the conuoy into a thick wood,about two miles from Filek,like enemies ſet vpon the waggoners,whom they ſhould haue conducted, and there made a great ſlaughter of ſuch as were about to reſiſt them; inſomuch that the County Solmes had much ado to ſaue himſelfe and to get out of their hands, leauing the waggons as a prey vnto the trecherous Huſſars; who now become maſters of them, draue them away to Botſcay the Rebels campe: Tanhuſar their Captaine in vaine purſuing after them (with ſuch of his Huſſars as more faithfull than the reſt, had no hand in that ſo foule a treachery) and recouering nothind but tenne waggons loaded with cloath,which the traitors had left behinde them, hauing taken the horſes out of them, and put them into the other waggons wherein the mony was, (which was reported to be 130000 florens) with the more ſpeed to bring them vnto Botſcay. Who hauing vpon the ſudden receiued ſo great a ſumme of mony, by him not looked for, forthwith diuided the ſame amongſt his ſouldiers,the more to encourage them in their rebellion againſt the Emperour.

The Huſſars traiterouſly ſpoyle them whom they ſhould haue conducted.

The newes of this ſo great a loſſe being quickly ſpred thorow all the Emperours campe, at the firſt filled the ſouldiers with griefe and diſdaine againſt the trecherous Huſſars, but afterwards with wrath and indignation againſt their own Commanders, as deeming it to haue bin nothing but a falſe report by them deuiſed and giuen out to deceiue them, and to feed them with a vaine hope. Which perſuaſion, though not true, had now ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed their minds, as that they were about all to haue riſen vp in mutiny, and to haue forſaken the ſeruice, to the vtter perill of their Captains, and endangering of the whole Prouince, now vpon point to haue bin for euer loſt. All which miſchiefes Baſta foreſeeing, did firſt what he might with words and faire promiſes to haue appeaſed them; which not ſeruing, he with certaine thouſands of duckats and waggons of cloth taken vp at Leuſta and other townes there by, wiſely contented them, in ſome good meaſure furniſhing the old ſouldiers, before halfe naked, both with mony and apparell, the ſouldiers greateſt contentments.

Which mutiny ſo againe appeaſed, the Imperials ſhortly after ſurpriſing a caſtle not farre from Eperia, found therein a great many of Hungarian Gentlemen, whom they carried away with them priſoners, to learne of them what they might concerning the Rebels proceedings, and further deſignes. In the meane time the Haiducks on the other ſide beſieged the caſtle of Sendra, which they after many aſſaults tooke, and put to the ſword all the garriſon ſouldiers therin; and departing thence, firſt rifled and after burnt the towne of Filek. They alſo took the caſtles of Boluar, Setſchin, Dregell, Burac, Holloc, Blaueſtein, and the ſtrong caſtle of Cabra geria, whither they of Hatwan not long before had carried their great ordnance at ſuch time as they for feare of the Turks, then lying at the ſiege of Strigonium, had abandoned the place: all ſtrong holds in the vpper Hungary. After the taking of which places, Ferentius Radius, and Charles Iſtuan (Botſcay his neere kinſman) and the chiefe captains and ring leaders of the rebels, exacted contribution mony of the minerall townes (as they call them) belonging vnto the Emperor in the vpper Hungary; but eſpecially of the city of Newſoll, enforcing them alſo to ſweare to be in all things obedient to Botſcay, and to take his part againſt the Imperials, threatning with fire and ſword to infeſt ſuch places as ſhould refuſe to do the like. And to the intent that they ſhould not by Collonitz be incouraged or defended, who to that end was comming thither, the Rebels in great number went to meet him, and hauing belaied all the paſſages, enforced him to retire himſelfe vnto his caſtle of Libentſia, where he lying in great danger with his wife then in child-bed, accompanied but with 50 German ſoldiers only, for that he durſt not to truſt his Hungarian Coſſackes, now in heart altogether enclining vnto the Rebels, was glad in poſt to ſend to Vienna, moſt humbly requeſting to haue a new ſupply of German ſoldiers ſent vnto him for his reliefe, and the furtherance of the Emperors ſeruice, in that ſo dangerous a time and wauering eſtate of that country, being the beſt part of that the Emperor then held in Hungary.

Diuers places taken by the Haiduckes.

Collonitz prayeth aid from Vienna.

Now while Baſta thus lay with his army at Eperia and in the country thereabout, he dayly receiued great harme from the Haiduckes, who were ſtill houering about him, as Hawkes ouer their prey; his ſouldiers, by neceſſity enforced to fetch in wood, and other things neceſſary into the campe, being ſtill moſt miſerably ſlaine and cut in pieces; yea, they were ſo bold, as oftentimes to trouble him in his campe, and to aſſayle the ſoldiers where they lay quartered in their trenches; as amongſt other times, they did in the latter end of December to end the yeare withall: at which time they by night breaking into the quarter where Charles Collonitz, with Copell and Pettinger, two Captaines of Auſtria, with their companies lay, they ſlew the ſaid Copell, with almoſt all his ſouldiers, and burnt Pettinger in his tent, Collonitz himſelfe being at the ſame time in great danger, and hardly by them beſet alſo; vntill that encouraging his men, by performing all the parts both of a good Captaine and valiant ſouldier, he by true valour enforced them at length to retire backe againe into the woods, from whence they came, hauing in this conflict ſlaine foureteene of them with his owne hand.

Copel and Pettinger ſlaine by the Haiduckes.

About this time was a ſpy taken in the Imperiall campe, one of Botſcay his chiefe men, diſcouered by one comming from Caſſouia to Eperia which knew him: who by Baſta his commandement apprehended, vnd vpon torture examined, and confeſſing what he had done, was for his good ſeruice hanged and afterward quartered, to the terrour of others attempting the like.

A ſpie taken.

The euill ſucceſſe of Cicala Baſſa againſt the Perſians.

The Turks this yeare were not much fortunat in their warres: Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa and their Generall againſt the Chriſtians in Hungary hauing in vaine (as is before declared) beſieged G Strigonium, and with all his forces done nothing worth the remembrance; and Cicala Baſſa their other Generall againſt the Perſians in the Eaſt being with all his great power by the Perſian King ouerthrowne and put to flight, and the city of Babylon now called Bagdat taken: as it was firſt at Prague the two and twentieth of October reported by the Secretary of the Vayuod of Valachia, ſent thither by an Embaſſador from his Maſter vnto the Emperour, and afterward confirmed by an Embaſſador ſent from the Perſian King himſelfe vnto the Emperor; who hauing audience, told his Maieſty, how that the King his Maſter was not ignorant of the great and difficult warre by him now for many yeares maintained againſt the Turkiſh Sultan, with whom although he for his part might haue liued in peace & amity, yet that mooued with the zeale which one Prince ought to haue to the reliefe of another, he had taken vp H armes againſt him, ſo to auert ſome part of that heauy war from his Maieſty euen vpon himſelfe:
and that he had already obtained many great and notable victories & conqueſts againſt him: and recouered a great territory, wrongfully before taken from the Perſian Kings his predeceſſors by the Turkiſh Sultans: and that now he was of nothing more deſirous, than to ioine in a perpetual league and amity with his Maieſty, that ſo in a moſt ſtrong confederation combined together, they might neuer afterward be diſſeuered, or euer make peace with the Sultan, without one anothers knowledge and conſent. And further, That for his part he was minded neuer to giue ouer the warre ſo happily by him begun, vntill he had driuen him euen into his Imperiall city of Conſtantinople, ſo that his Maieſty ſhould on his part do the like, by continuing I of his preſent wars; it being not poſſible for the Turke to hold out againſt them both, and the only means to abate his greatneſſe, and to aſſure them in their eſtates: requeſting him withall, to ſend backe with him ſome graue man his Embaſſador, with ſufficient authority and inſtructions to conferre about theſe matters with him; that ſo knowing and vnderſtanding one anothers minde, the league and confederation betwixt them might the more eaſily and commodiouſly be made and concluded.

Neither were the Turks buſied with theſe forreine warres only, againſt theſe ſo great and mighty Princes, in places ſo remote and farre off, but vnto theſe were ioyned their owne inteſtine and ciuill warres and troubles alſo; the Rebels being yet vp in the leſſer Aſia, and the Baſſa's of Aleppo and Damaſco, two of the moſt famous cities in Siria, and both of them men K of great place and command, of late vp in armes one of them againſt the other: inſomuch, that they had brought the matter to be tried by the ſword in the plaine field, where the Baſſa of Aleppo in a great and bloudy battell ouercome, and flying vnto his own city, was by the Baſſa of Damaſco purſued thither, and ſo ſtreitly by him beſieged with an army of thirty thouſand men, that in fine he was glad to reconcile himſelfe vnto him, and to make his peace, by yeelding vnto him whatſoeuer the other Baſſa his enemy pleaſed to demand of him; as being thereunto driuen by the extremity of famine, which then reigned in the city; as alſo for that he had loſt a great number of his men, whom he had ſent ſecretly out of the city to ſeeke for victuals, being all ſlaine by the Baſſa of Damaſco his ſouldiers. With which ſo great matters the Baſſaes of the Court (who had the mannaging of the State vnder the young Sultan) were L much troubled, he himſelfe (as was fitteſt for his yeres) in the meane time delighting himſelf with the pleaſures of the Court, and much reioycing at the birth of his firſt begotten ſon, who was about that time borne.

Sultan Achmat his firſt ſonne borne.

The reuolution of time had now thus brought this yeare to an end, the troubles of Hungary and Tranſyluania yet ſtill more and more ſo encreaſing, as if that thoſe moſt miſerable countries had by the iuſt and heauy iudgements of God beene now appointed vnto their laſt and vtter ruine and deſtruction: the cauſes of their ſo great miſeries proceeding not ſo much from the Turks their enemies, as from the naturall inhabitants themſelues; who in minds diuided both in religion and affection, ſome of them continuing in their allegiance vnto the Emperor, and otherſome following the Enſignes of the Rebell Botſcay, did both vnto themſelues M and to their country more harme in a little time, than had the Turks in many yeres before. Of which ſo dangerous a diſſention, and of the harmes thereof inſuing, Belioioſa left by Baſta as his Lieutenant, was reported to haue beene the firſt and chiefe authour: For whereas the yeare

A before the Biſhops and other Clergy men, in an aſſembly of them at Poſſonium, had without the knowledge of the Nobilitie and States of Hungary, publiſhed a Decree by them there made, for the burning or perpetual baniſhing of all ſuch as were of the Reformed Religion in Hungary: and that the States of that kingdome vnderſtanding thereof, and ſolemnly proteſting againſt the ſame, vnder the Seale of the Lord Palatine had publiquely affirmed, with juſt Arms to defend themſelues, if they ſhould for their Religion be called into queſtion or troubled: and had again repeated the ſame their proteſtation at Galſet. Yet Belioioſa neuertheles in the meane time by cunning ſeiſing vpon the reformed churches at Caſſovia, would not ſuffer the Citiſens of the Reformed Religion there, to haue any Sermons in their owne priuat houſes, or ſo much as to reade on the holy Bible. Neither any whit mooued with the former B proteſtations of the Nobilitie and States, had taken vnto himſelfe all the lands and goods of them of their Religion in Caſſovia, not ſuffering them to bury the bodies of their dead within the city, neere vnto the Monaſteries. And requeſting to haue borrowed of Botſcay certaine thouſands of crownes, and thereof by him denied, cauſed his ſouldiers to ranſacke two of his Caſtles, and to ſpoyle him of all the wealth and treaſure he therein had. For which indignities and injuries Botſcay inraged, cauſed open proclamation to be made, That hee would giue vnto euery Haiducke that would ſerue him, four Crownes a moneth pay, with all the booty that they could get. Whereupon ſix thouſand Haiduckes which then ſerued vnder Belioioſa, forthwith reuolted vnto Botſcay, their number increaſing daily. But after that vnto this extraordinary pay, Pallas Lippa his Lieutenant had alſo joined the protection of the Reformed C Religion, it is wonderfull to ſay, how the Haiducks by heaps reſorted vnto him, and how the people in all parts of Hungary generally fauoured him and his quarrell; beeing in all places whereas he came, ready to join hands with him againſt the Imperials. The Turkes and Tartars alſo, both with men and mony furthering him in all his doings, whoſe help he refuſed not.
Whereof proceeded all the aforeſaid miſeries both in Hungary and Tranſylvania, with many other worſe than they, which together with the beginning of this year tooke their beginning and encreaſe alſo. Vnto which ſo great troubles ſtil more and more encreaſing, Baſta not able by force to giue remedy, ſought by lenitie and faire perſuaſions to haue eaſed the ſame: by Letters oftentimes aduiſing euen Botſcay the chiefe Rebell himſelfe, to change his minde, to lay downe armes, to diſ-band his forces, and to perſuade with the reſt of his ſeditious followers, D to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Emperour, and to return againe vnto their wonted obedience.
Whereunto he at length anſwered, That if the gouernment of all Tranſylvania might be left vnto himſelfe alone: If a naturall Hungarian borne might bee ſtill choſen Lieutenant Generall in Hungary: if none but ſuch as were Hungarians borne, ſhould haue the gouernement and commaund of all the garriſons in Hungary: if the Wallon and French ſouldiers might be ſhut out of Hungarie: If the naturall Hungarians borne might from thenceforth be regarded and prouided of their pay: If it might bee lawfull for euery man to haue the free exerciſe of his Religion: If the authors of theſe troubles might be deliuered vnto the Hungarians to be puniſhed: If the Emperour himſelfe in perſon ſhould come and be preſent at the Parliament at Presbourg: If the Germane garriſon ſouldiers ſhould ſtill keepe themſelues E within the places wherunto they were appointed, without making of any incurſions into the towns or villages neer vnto them, or hurting of the poor countrey men; he could then be content to come to ſuch a good agreement for peace. With which offer he ſent two of the Rebels his followers vnto Baſta; who not liking thereof, returned them backe again without concluding of any thing.

The cauſes of Botſcay his rebellion.

But while things were thus in talke, ſome of the Haiducks in the meane time, with a number of Tartars joined vnto them, in ſeeking after booty ſurpriſed Gokara a towne ouer againſt Strigonium: where hauing ſlain certain Germanes who had the keeping of the place, and rifled the town, as they were about to haue ſet it on fire, by the comming ouer of the gouernor of Strigonium with his garriſon, they were inforced to forſake the place, and again to retire.
F This loſſe receiued at Gokara was again by our men requited by the taking of Palantwar, a good fortreſſe of the Turks, after a long and cruel fight taken by Captain Bathian (Commander of the Imperiall troupes on this ſide the riuer of Danubius) whereinto a number of the Turks being retyred, were there together with the garriſon ſoldiers all ſlain, and among them diuers men of great account, who but ſome few daies before were come thither. Which for-treſſe the Captain cauſed to be forthwith raſed, becauſe it ſhould no more ſtand the Turks in G ſtead for the annoying of the Chriſtians.

Vacia ſhamefully betrayed to the Turks.

The Turks about this time had a purpoſe to beſiege Vacia, a city not farre from Vicegrade on the other ſide of Danubius, a place which ſtill did them great harme, and ſtood the Chriſtians in great ſtead. The garriſon of which place was part Germans, and part Hungarians, as the reſt of all the garriſons in the Imperiall towns of Hungary were. Of which the Turks purpoſe for the ſiege, the trecherous Haiducks there in garriſon hauing got vnderſtanding, conſpired to deliuer vnto them the place; and yet not ſo contented, to ioyne thereunto a treaſon more bloudy and treacherous than was the betraying of the towne: for finding themſelues by far too ſtrong for the Germanes in garriſon in the towne with them, they fell vpon them, fearing no ſuch matter, and ſlew moſt part of them, the reſt ſauing themſelues by ſpeedy flight to Strigonium: and ſo afterward, according to their former pretended treaſon, deliuered the H towne to the Turks, joining with them and the Tartars, and directing them for the more eaſie ſpoiling of the Chriſtians and the countrey thereabout.

The taking of this City of Vacia had in ſhort time called together great numbers of the Turks and Tartars out of all places of the Realme; who together with the Haiducks made a great and puiſſant army, to the terror of the Chriſtians, not then able to hold the field againſt them, and the encouraging of the Turks, thus holpen euen by the Chriſtians themſelues, to the deſtroying of one another. With this army they turned from Vacia to Gokara, with a purpoſe from thence to haue paſſed ouer the Danubius vpon the yce, and to haue ſurpriſed Strigonium. Which exploit they had once before attempted againſt the baſe towne, being I then by the Chriſtians repulſed and beaten backe with their great and ſmall ſhot out of the town, as now they were againe. Howbeit that ſeeing the number of their enemies daily more and more to increaſe, they in Strigonium ſtood more in doubt of a ſecond ſiege, than they had done of the firſt; whereof we haue before ſpoken.

The report of theſe ſo great troubles, and of the generall reuolt of the diſcontented Haiducks in Hungarie, much troubled and grieued the Chriſtian Emperor: Who both in reſpect of his honour, and of the ſafety of his eſtate, raiſed what power he might out of his prouinces thereabout, and leuied great ſummes of money from his ſubiects, taking a ducket vpon euery houſe in Auſtria, being then in great feare of theſe miſeries and miſchiefes ſo faſt ſpreading, and ſtill more and more increaſing and approaching that way. Vnto whoſe forces already on K foot, had the aid promiſed from the King of Spaine, the Pope, the Princes of Italy and Germanie, with ſix thouſand footmen and two thouſand horſe out of Bohemia, bin in time joyned, they might haue made a ſufficient army vnder the conduct of Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant, to haue repreſſed both the attempts of the enemy, and the inſolencie of the rebellious Haiduckes. All or moſt part of which aid this yeare failing, and Baſta with his ſmall forces much weakened with wants and the extremitie of Winter, and not able to keep the field, the enemies ſtill increaſing both in number and in ſtrength, and without feare of any to encounter them, at their pleaſure roaming vp and downe, began now to draw neere vnto Vicegrade (a good and ſtrong towne of Hungarie ſtanding vpon the ſide of Danubius, about the mid way betwixt Buda & Strigonium) with a purpoſe to haue beſieged the ſame. Of whoſe comming L the Germans there in garriſon hearing, and warned by the trechery of the Haiducks of Vacia, what to feare from the Haiducks in garriſon with them in Vicegrade, betime retyred themſelues out of the towne into the Caſtle. In which doing they were well aduiſed, being otherwiſe like enough to haue run the ſame fortune that the Germanes their fellowes before had done at Vacia. For the Turks with the rebellious Haiducks were no ſooner come thither, but that the Haiducks in the towne, without more ado, opened the gates of the towne vnto them, as vnto their friends, directing them in beſt ſort they could both for the beſieging and winning of the caſtle. Which while the Turks hardly beſieged, and the Germans therein notably defended, Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa, together with Begedes Baſſa, to perſuade them to yeeld vp the Caſtle, writ vnto them in this ſort. M Vicegrade yeelded vnto the Turks.

Right worthy and valiant friends, it is not to you vnknowne, the Caſtle of Vicegrade of right to belong vnto our moſt mighty and dread Soueraigne, the great Sultan. And therefore ſeeing that it is reaſon that euery man ſhould haue that which of right belongeth vnto him; Wee aduertiſe and re-

A queſt you to yeeld vp the ſame Caſtle vnto our moſt mighty Emperour, and the honorable Lord Stephen Botſcay, Prince of Hungary; and with all your ſubſtance to depart thence. Promiſing you vpon our faith and honor, to ſuffer you quietly and in ſafety, with your wiues and children, bag and baggage, to depart thence, and to prouide you ſufficient ſhipping for the carrying away of your things to Strigonium. And if it ſhall pleaſe you to take part with vs, we promiſe you the ſame pay from our Emperor, that you had from your owne; and the ſame kind entertainment which the Wallons haue before had with vs. But if that you vpon an obſtinat reſolution ſhall refuſe this our friendly motion and grace offered vnto you, blame vs not if we ſhall by ſtrong hand and force of arms ſeek to obtaine our right. In kindneſſe we offer you our friendſhip, and ſo with ſpeed expect your anſwer.

B But the Germanes hearkning not vnto theſe letters, as men reſolued, valiantly ſtood vpon the defence of themſelues, and of the place, vntill that by extream neceſſity forced thereunto, they yeelded the ſame by compoſition.

Baſta in the mean time with his forces much diminiſhed lying at Eperia, and in the country thereabout, ſeeing the general reuolt of the Haiducks, of late the Emperors chief ſtrength in Hungary, and Botſcay the Rebels ſtrength daily to increaſe more and more, with no poſſibilitie for himſelfe with ſo ſmall forces as he then had, to repreſſe the Rebels inſolencie, or to remedie theſe ſo far ſpreading euils, but for want of greater ſtrength he muſt lie ſtil as it were a man beſieged; was therwith exceedingly grieued, and as it were almoſt ouerwhelmed with C the heauy burthen of ſo many great miſeries at once beſetting him. To threaten without power he knew to be but folly; and to ſpeake faire, to be but vaine. Neuertheleſſe hauing procured from the Emperour a generall pardon for all ſuch as hauing taken part with the Rebels, were willing to return again to their allegiance: hee to aſſure all them whom it might concern, of the Emperours gratious fauour, and to put them all out of feare, caused Letters of generall pardon to be publiſhed, for all men to take knowledge of: The purport whereof was this:

We George Baſta, County of Huſt and Marmar, Lord of Sult, Knight, Counſellor to his Imperiall Maieſty, Gouernor of the realm of Tranſylvania, and Lieutenant of the Chriſtian Armies of the D Emperour; To all Faithfull, loue and greeting. Whereas in this ſo troubleſome a ſtate of things, ſome as well of the Nobilitie as others in theſe vpper parts of Hungary, partly of their owne accord, and partly for fear, haue reuolted from his Imperiall Maieſty, and taken part with the traiterous Haiduckes in their rebellion, to the great preiudice of the Emperor his ſeruice, and the ſtaining of their faith: We in the name of his Imperiall and royall Maieſty, whom we know to be greatly inclined, and ready to pardon his ſubiects euen of his owne naturall goodneſſe and clemencie, haue by vertue of the full power and authoritie by his ſaid Imperiall Maieſty granted vnto vs, giuen free grace and pardon to all them which haue withdrawn themſelues from his obeiſance, or forſaken the ſame, of what order, qualitie, or condition ſoeuer they bee: whom we will receiue into our protection as void of all crime: and requeſt them, as much as in vs is poſſible, to make their profit of this grace, and to returne vnto their former duty and obeiſance, vnder all aſ- E ſurance of impunitie for their forepaſſed faults, and without any ſearch or inquiry to be of the ſame hereafter made, as well for matters of Religion as of State: aſſuring them of their liues, goods, fortunes, dignities, franchiſes, priuiledges, and immunities whatſoeuer; as is more at large declared by his Maieſties Letters patents which remain with vs. And if any letted either with their vrgent affairs, or with ſicknes, canot repair vnto vs within the day in the ſame Letters patents nominated, we will accept of their iuſt excuſes. But if any contrary to our hope, ſhall vpon any indurat mind, or obſtinat contumacie, faile to repent, and to make their appearance before vs within the day limited, we denounce them to be Rebels, ſubiect vnto the pain of Rebellion, and ſtained with the note of infamy; pronouncing their liues, their goods and dignities to be confiſcat and deuolued vnto the Emperors coffers: for which they ſhall by vs, the Chieftains and Captaines of his armies, with all rigor and extremitie be proſecuted. Proteſting before F the Maieſtie of God, before the Maieſtie of the Emperor, and before all Chriſtendome, we not to be in any ſort culpable of the euills, calamities, and miſeries, which ſhall enſue of the wars and diſaſters which ſuch their rebellion ſhall cauſe; but to be therefrom exempt and acquitted, the only authors of theſe diſorders hauing deſerued theſe imprecations and calamities: vpon the heads of whom we iuſtly ſhall henceforth lay them, as vpon the miſerable authors thereof; by their wickedneſſe hauing refuſed ſo great grace from the Emperor and vs, vnto all men made known by theſe preſents.

This proclamation ſolemnly by Baſta publiſhed, with the ſound of many drums and trumpets, the ſixteenth of Ianuary, and ten daies libertie giuen for ſuch as would to come in and again ſubmit themſelues; diuers gentlemen of the country neer vnto Eperia, where Baſta with his army lay, for fear of being ſpoiled came in, and accepted of the grace offered: other of the Seditious dwelling farther off, little or nothing at all regarding the ſame. Inſomuch that the Rebels in number daily increaſing, and the rebellion farther and farther ſpreading, Botſcay was was now grown ſo ſtrong, that he diſmiſſed from him moſt part of the Turkes, whoſe ſeruice he had in all theſe troubles hitherto vſed, reſeruing yet certain Ianizaries, whom he mingled with the garriſon of Haiducks which he had put into Caſſouia.

Pallas Lippa beheaded.

Pallas Lippa, before by Botſcay taken priſoner, and vpon his reuolt from the Emperour, by Botſcay made his Lieutenant General, and a great man amongſt the Rebels (as is before declared) was now of many thought to be a moſt fortunat and happy man. But in the middeſt of ſuch his happineſſe, and the greatnes of his command, he was by the malice of ſome, enuying at his eſtate, accuſed to Botſcay, as if he had had a purpoſe to haue made him away; and deliuering the ſtrong city of Caſſouia vnto Baſta, to haue gon ouer again vnto the Emperour, and to haue followed his Enſignes. Vpon which ſuſpition he was by Botſcay's commandement beheaded; with fiue other men more of good place, ſuſpected to haue bin partakers in the conſpiracie with Lippa. In whoſe treaſure, after he was executed, was found an hundred thouſand Hungarian ducats, with ſeuen hundred chains of gold; all which he had ſcraped together in that ſhort time wherin he had bin Botſcay's Lieutenant amongſt the rebels. With which money Botſcay in his rebellion confirmed, became more furious and obſtinat than before; not admitting any talk with Baſta concerning peace, but vpon ſuch vnreaſonable conditions as beſt ſtood with his own good liking.

Now long and tedious it were to proſecute euery particular exploit, with the diuers woful euents thereof during this ſo great and dangerous a rebellion in Hungary; which how heauy ſoeuer they were for the poore Chriſtians there dwelling to endure, as tending all to the ruin and deſtruction both of themſelues and of their countrey (ſometime one of the moſt flouriſhing kingdomes thorowout all Chriſtendome, but now become as it were a large Theatre for all the World to behold moſt wofull tragedies and bloudy maſſacres acted in) yet for all that, vnto ſome nothing is pleaſing, but what is written of the greateſt actions; as of great and bloudy battels, of the conqueſts of whole Kingdomes, and the ruine of moſt mighty and famous Princes; all other things elſe beeing vnto them tedious. In ſome part to eaſe them of ſuch wearineſſe, and to pleaſe their appetites, I will briefly paſſe ouer, and euen lightly touch ſuch things as for the moſt part of this year paſſed in this troubleſome Countrey; not ſtaying but vpon matters of greateſt weight and importance.

Sacmar yeelds to the Haiduks

The Haiduckes ſtill proceeding in their rebellion, in the beginning of February beſieged the caſtle of Sacmar, a place very fit for their purpoſe. Which Caſtle the ſouldiers there in garriſon doubting to be able to hold againſt them, being not paſt threeſcore ſound men left in it, and deſtitute alſo of their neceſſarie prouiſion, couenanting to haue their liues ſpared, at length yeelded vnto them. But in going thence, meeting with certaine other companies of Haiducks neer vnto Tokay, they were by them moſt part of them ſlaine, ſome few of them by ſpeedy flight eſcaping. The ſame Haiducks which had taken Sacmar, immediatly after attempted to haue ſurpriſed the town and caſtle of Tocay alſo: but the Gouernor of the place in good time aduertiſed of their intent and purpoſe, cauſed the ice wherewith the Riuer was hard frozen, to be broken forty paces ouer neer vnto the caſtle, and the ſame to be lightly couered ouer with ſtraw. Whither the Haiducks comming by night, and finding the ice on the other ſide the riuer, whereunto they firſt came, ſtrong enough to beare them; by heapes thruſting one another forward to haue ſcaled the caſtle, the ice breaking vnder them, they there together by heapes moſt miſerably periſhed; many of the reſt which eſcaped that danger, being with ſhot out of the caſtle ſlain alſo. In this caſtle was no great ſtore of victuals: wherof Baſta vnderſtanding, with his army marched from Eperia toward Budac, a town holden by the

A Rebels, in hope with the ſpoile thereof to haue relieued Tokay. But the Rebels hearing of his comming, hauing themſelues burnt the town, had got themſelues with that they had, into the Caſtle, and from thence with their great Ordnance ſo welcomed Baſta at his comming, that diſappointed of his purpoſe, and hauing loſt ſome of his men, hee was glad with all ſpeed (not hauing ſtayed aboue foure houres) to returne againe to Eperia: certain of the nobility of that country, which tooke part with the Rebels, being reported, in his abſence to haue made a road towards Eperia, to the endangering of that City. In which his returne towards Eperia, the troups of County Turon, and of Charles Collonitz, by chance lighting vpon 500 Haiducks in a countrey village, ſet the ſame on fire, and therein burnt moſt of the ſaid Rebels, and ſlew the reſt of them that remained, in ſeeking by flight to haue ſaued themſelues.

B In the mean time one of the great men among the Turks came to Caſſouia, bringing with him a great ſum of money, which being diuided amongſt the Rebels there, much confirmed them, both in their rebellion, and deuotion toward the Turks; which rebellion they ſpared not for any coſt by all meanes to maintaine, as more preuailing thereby, than by the greateſt forces they could vſe for the conquering of Hungary.

Baſta his ſouldiers in mutiny

But Baſta was no ſooner with his army returned againe to Eperia, but that the ſouldiers generally exclaiming, and calling vpon him for their pay, were about in a mutinie to haue forſaken him; for the appeaſing of which tumult, he was glad preſently to make what ſhift he could for money, wherewith hee in ſome meaſure gaue them contentment, and ſo with much ado, agreed with them for ſix weeks ſeruice longer, thereby deliuering the citiſens of Eperia from C a great feare, wherein they were, for being ſpoyled by thoſe mutinous ſoldiers, of whom they ſtood in no leſſe doubt than they did of their enemies.

And now the ſeditious Haiducks after their wonted manner ſtill roaming vp and down the vpper part of Hungarie, the ſecond day of March, about ſeuen of the clocke in the morning came to Neuſoll, a Faire in that countrey, and there by many reaſons peiſuading the citiſens to reuolt, and to take part with them, had parley with them till it was full twelue of the clock; but drawing ſtil neerer and neerer to the town. Inſomuch that Turbelius gouernor of the place, perceiuing a yeelding inclination in the citiſens, and doubting without their help to be able to defend ſo great a city againſt the Haiducks, with ſo weak a garriſon as he then had therein, he with his Coſſacks, for his more ſafety retyred himſelf into the caſtle. Which don, the Hai- D ducks forthwith breaking into the City with ſix companies, ſummoned the caſtle, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto them. Of whom Turbelius ſlew diuers with ſhot out of the caſtle: and the ſame day in the euening couragiouſly ſallying out of the caſtle, with certaine companies of Harquebuſiers, draue the Haiducks againe out of the city: which he afterward better fortified againſt their like attempts. And the next day vnderſtanding by a countreyman, That certain companies of Haiducks and Turks together, were comming to Turtzo, a town not far off, carrying with them a great number of cattel, women and children, which they had got out of the country villages and towns therabout: he preſently ſent forth his lieutenant againſt them, with his Coſſacks (a deſperat kind of horſmen) who meeting with theſe Haiducks and Turks, ſlew of them about 150, and recouered from them all the captiues, the cattell, with 200 hor- E ſes, and a mule loaded with 4000 Hungarian duckats.

Filek yeelded to the Haiducks

Now had Filek (a moſt beautiful caſtle, and as it were the key of that part of the vpper Hungary, which the Chriſtian Emperor yet held againſt the Turks) for certain months bin hardly beſieged by the Haiducks: which although it was ſo well ſtored with victuals, and other neceſſary prouiſion, as that it might haue holden out three months longer ſiege, yet the ſoldiers there in garriſon for want of water were enforced now at length to yeeld the ſame. For the keeping of which caſtle Redeius Ferenſius, captain of the Haiducks which had won it, placed therein a garriſon, part Haiducks, part Turks: as not daring to truſt either of them alone; the Haiducks for feare of their trecherie; nor the Turks, for that he knew them to be deſirous of the place, for the commodious ſcituation thereof, as giuing them a way to enter farther into F the territories of the Chriſtians: which Redeius, though a Rebell, would not yet in any ſort grant them.

This Caſtle of Filek ſo (as is beforeſaid) beſieged, the valiant Collonitz had oftentimes in vain ſought to haue relieued, all the waies being ſo beſet and as it were fortified with infinite numbers of the Turks, Tartars, and Rebels, as that there was no comming vnto it, and moſt of his own ſoldiers being Haiducks alſo, to whom he durſt not wel truſt, for fear of being betrayed by them. Concerning which matters he ſhortly after writing to a certaine nobleman, after he had ſhewed vnto him, That he deſired nothing more of the Emperor than to be diſcharged of his ſeruice, he thus breaketh forth:

I cannot (ſaith he) performe any more faithfull ſeruice unto the Emperor: for being attended vpon by very traitors, I am inforced to haſard euen myne honeſt reputation. I would willingly ſerue with German horſmen, and I could alſo wiſh three thouſand Coſſacks, and two thouſand Polonian Huſſars to bee again raiſed, who would do notable ſeruice in purſuing the enemy: but euery moneth they muſt needs haue their wages payd them. The number of the enemy increaſeth daily, and their ſtrength ſtill more and more; ſo that things canot be in worſe ſtate than now they are. All deuices are directed to the hurt of the Emperor, neither is there any place quiet. What courage I am of, which haue loſt all my wealth and ſubſtance, is eaſie for any man to iudge: all which for all that, I could conceal and diſſemble, ſo that I might faithfully and according to my deſire ſerue the Emperor; which for all that is not poſsible for me to do, without a ſufficient ſtrength of German ſoldiers. But this of all doth moſt comfort me, that I know I haue done my duty, for otherwiſe this miſchiefe had ſpred farther. Many were in hope I would rather haue reuolted from the Emperor, than haue loſt my goods: and ſome there were which doubted not to ſay ſo of me. The enemies are now in my dukedom of Cleve, and there make ſpoil of all. Setchin, Iarmeta, Tregla, Palanka, Samoſchin, Blavenſtein, Ravenſtein, Vacia, Regiomont, Dillena, Pugantſa, Tabra, Libetna, Sitna, Dibina, Sacmaria, Sendra, Onoth, Diſgiora, Zatnar, Calo, Scharoſpotac, Budnoc, Nagibana, Filek, and almoſt all Tranſiluania are now ſubiect to the rebels. So that what will enſue therof, except they ſpeedily be confronted, euery man may right eaſily iudge.

Now if Collonitz, one of the greateſt and beſt commanders of the Emperors forces againſt the Turks in Hungary, was thus beſet and ſpoiled of his ſubſtance by the rebels, as he in theſe his letters complaineth, and as indeed he was, hauing at one time receiued ſo great harm from them as was valued to an hundred thouſand ducats; and not daring to truſt his owne Hungarian ſoldiers, whoſe hearts he knew to be with the rebels: In what ſtate may the reſt of the people of that diſtreſſed prouince be thought to haue bin, being at the ſame time expoſed to the ſame rebels as a prey and ſpoil, and their country laid open for the Turkes and Tartars to forrage at their pleaſure.

But in briefe to run along with the Haiducks: four thouſand of them attempting to haue ſurpriſed Wiglaſe, were ſo from thence repulſed, as that many of them being there ſlain, thirtie fiue wagons were ſcarſe ſufficient to carry the reſt of the wounded ouer the mountaines, of whom an hundred died by the way. But going from thence they brake into Turſons country, where hauing rifled all the towns and villages, they commanded all the States of the country, within three daies after to ſubmit themſelues to Botſcay, & to ſwear vnto him fealty; or otherwiſe to expect all extremities: who with fear diſmaied, promiſed to ſubmit themſelues vnto Redeius, Botſcay's Lieutenant.

Embaſſadours ſent to Botſcay

Now for remedie of theſe euils, Napragius and Forgatius, two graue Counſellors, were diſpatched in the Emperours name to entreat of peace with Botſcay. Who the ſeuen and twentieth day of March departing from Eperia, with fourſcore harquebuſiers towards Caſſovia; before they came thither ſent before them an herauld to aduertiſe Botſcay of their comming. Which meſſenger ſo ſoon as he was come into Caſſovia, the Turks ſo ſtreightly kept, as that no man might ſpeake with him but Botſcay himſelfe, and not he alſo, but in open place, and that in the hearing of the Turkes. Who at his firſt meeting with him told him, That if the Embaſſadors from whom he came were ſent from the Nobilitie and States of Hungarie, they ſhould be right welcome vnto him, and haue audience: but if they came from the Emperour, as had Rogatſius and Ciaccius before them, ſent from Botſcay, they ſhould then ſpare their labours and come no farther, for that all matters had with him beene often enough talked vpon: it being now more than time, that things ſo often conſulted vpon, ſhould bee no more talked

A talked of, but indeed performed. Which meſſenger returning vnto the Embaſſadours, told them what Botſcay had ſaid, and that the Haiducks had in Caſſouia built a bulwarke of a wonderfull height, beſet the gates with ſtrong gards, and ſo filled the trenches with ſouldiers, that a man could hardly enter into the City; howbeit that euery man might ſafely come and goe thither about his trade and buſines. He told them alſo, That Botſcayes lieutenant had called together all the gouernors of the places therabouts, and aduiſed them for the ſpace of fourteen daies to beware of the excurſions of the Haiducks; and in the mean time for their more ſafety, to bring their wiues and children, with ſuch other things as they made moſt reckoning of, into the city; for that he could not as yet (as he ſaid) repreſſe the vnruly and headſtrong Haiducks, being yet in their rage and fury, as the maner of the diſcontented multitude is. Of the B which Haiducks, ſome going forth toward Neuhuſe, and bringing home a great booty of cattel, were by Collonitz and Trautmanſtorf, purſuing them with their horſmen, ouerthrowne, and all the booty again recouered.

Botſcay about this time, viz. the 29 of March, ſummoned all the Nobilitie and States of Hungary, vnto an aſſembly to be holden at Serentium the 17 day of Aprill; writing to them to this effect:

Botſca's letters to the States of Hungary.

You know (ſaid hee) right worthy and valiant men, into what extreame miſeries our poore afflicted Country (all the antient priuiledges and immunities therof being contemned and trodden vnder foot) is by this comming in of ſtrangers brought: whoſe inſolencie is grown ſo far, that we cannot only not quietly C poſſeſſe our own goods, but ſo much as enioy the liberty of our own conſciences. For which cauſe the Nobilitie of the whole kingdom being the laſt year ſent in embaſſy, and as it were foreſeeing what was to come; the aſſembly of the Empire being ended, openly proteſted before the whole Imperial Dyet, and by their letters oftentimes declared, That they ſhould at length be of neceſſitie inforced to take vpon themſelues the defence of their priuiledges and of their religion. By which their proteſtation for all that, they ſo little preuailed, that forthwith after, ſuch an intollerable Edict was by the Emperors owne commandement publiſhed, as had expoſed vs all and euery one of vs vnto moſt certain death, had we not prouided for our ſelues betime. All which things are vnto you all moſt certainly known, both by the vnlawfull acts themſelues, and the whole proceeding of the Prouoſt generall. All which things conſidered, you met together at Galeſt, and from thence again openly ſignified vnto the aforeſaid Prouoſt General (vnto whom his Im- D periall Maieſtie had committed the ſhedding of our bloud, the aboliſhing of our priuiledges and religion, viz. the execution of this cruell Edict) that if he proceeded to go forward in that buſines, you would put in execution what you had before openly proteſted in the generall Aſſembly of the whole Empire at Preſburg. But what anſwer you receiued from him, forasmuch as it is not vnto any of you vnknowne, it is not needfull here to rehearſe. Wherfore when as he going about the execution of the aforeſaid Edict, did in forcible maner with certain pieces of great ordnance impugn the army of his Imperiall Maieſty, both his and our dread Lord and Soueraign, and by force took from vs ſome of our caſtles, and beſieged ſome other; we found no other remedie againſt theſe ſo great euills, but that which God himſelfe euen then ſhewed to vs, which was, by force of arms to defend our ſelues ſo far as we might. In which our purpoſe, ſeeing the grace of God, and the good ſucceſſe which we haue hitherto had, will vs to continue, although we haue ſuf- E fered no little harm from the Germans and Haiducks (which for all that, is for the recouery of the libertie of our countrey patiently to be born) to the intent that we vnited with other our brethren thorow Hungary, may the better withſtand our enemies, and fight againſt them, it is moſt neceſſarie we ſhould meet together, and all matters ſet apart, enter into conſultation how herafter to reſiſt our enemies, and ſet our Country in peace and quietneſſe. Wherfore ſeeing that we haue determined to hold an aſſembly at Serents, the ſeuenteenth day of Aprill, wee by theſe Preſents doe warne and charge you all, there at the aforeſayd 17 day of Aprill to make your perſonall appearance, to ioyn in amitie with vs, and after Gods name called vpon, to conſult and conclude vpon ſuch things as may be both acceptable and pleaſing vnto God, and moſt profitable and neceſſarie for the good of our afflicted country in generall. But if there ſhall be any which vpon a preſumptuous and careleſſe contempt, ſhall not at the time appointed come, nor ſeem to regard ſuch F things as ſo much concern the Common good and welfare of their natiue Countrey; let them aſſuredly know, both themſelues to be therfore to be accounted for enemies vnto their country, and their goods alſo ſo to be diſpoſed of, as ſhall vnto the Nobilitie and States then and there aſſembled, be thought meet and conuenient.

Much about this time a great tumult was raiſed amongſt the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court at Conſtantinople, at which time a great fire aroſe alſo in the city (as oft times the like hath before done through the Ianizaries inſolencie, who in ſuch confuſion of mens minds uſe to make their own gains) wherein many both men and women periſhed, with aboue fiue hundred ſhops and ware-houſes full of rich merchandiſe, moſt part whereof belonged to the Iews, of whom almoſt two hundred are ſaid to be there burnt. The deformitie and ſpoile made by which fire in the city remaining long after to be ſeen. Theſe troubles much feared the yong Sultan, who firſt therewith halfe diſmaied, and ſeeing the like to ariſe in Pera alſo on the other ſide of the hauen, about a mile from the Seraglio, could not but thinke that the ſoldiers were about ſome dangerous treaſon. Which ſuſpition two meſſengers newly come from Cicala Baſſa encreaſed, who earneſtly by them deſired new ſupplies to be forthwith ſent vnto him, proteſting, That foraſmuch as he had not long before in a great battel loſt a number of his men, if he were not with new ſupplies ſpeedily relieued, he muſt of force retyre, and leaue all to the Perſian. Howbeit the fire quenched, and the Ianizaries and other ſouldiers with the ſpoil they had gotten by others loſſes ſatisfied, the tumult was without much adoe again quieted.

Now beſides the aforeſaid troubles from the rebels in Tranſylvania and the vpper Hungary, that nothing might be wanting vnto the miſeries of thoſe ſo miſerable countries, the Emperours ſouldiers which ſerued vnder Baſta, hauing of long from day to day in vain expected their pay, and ſeeing neither their pay nor other reliefe to come vnto them, roſe vp in mutiny, and ſo in great rage brake into Baſta the Generals lodging, where hauing heaped vpon him many vnworthy and deſpightfull reproches, with their pieces bent againſt him, and taking the ſpoil of many cariages loden with very rich commodities, they departed from him, and ſo marching thorow the country toward Presburg, by the way vſed ſuch inſolencie and cruelty, by rifling and ſpoiling whatſoeuer came to hand, as that they ſeemed vnto the people as they went, worſe and more inhumane than the very Turks and Tartars themſelues: where amongſt other prey by them taken, which was very great, they carried away with them toward Presburg aboue ten thouſand oxen and two thouſand horſes; threatning as they went, to burn the ſuburbs of the city ſo ſoone as they came thither, if they were not forthwith paid their pay. Whereupon many of the Citiſens for feare forſooke their dwellings and remooued vnto Vienna.

But the rebels on the other ſide (as is before declared) hauing in vaine attempted Newſol, being forthwith driuen out of it again; aſſembling themſelues in great number came now again and beſieged it, and the 16 of April took it, to the great and incomparable loſſe of the citiſens. Others of their fellowes in other places hauing but the day before taken Cibinium, Portfeld, Schemnitſe, with ſome other places alſo.

Thus while the Haiducks at their pleaſure on the one ſide ſpoil the vpper part of Hungary, and the Emperors ſoldiers on the other ſide for want of pay doe therein no leſſe harme than they, as enemies rifling and ranſacking euery corner of the Countrey as they went; the poore husbandmen dwelling here and there, diſperſed abroad in the country, for feare leauing their homely dwellings with ſuch things as they had, fled ſome of them into Polonia, other ſome into the mountains, where many of them periſhed with hunger: the poor husbandman not daring now to go forth to till his land, neither the ſhepheard to feed his flock, all places beeing filled with miſerie, mourning, and heauineſſe; the Turkes and Tartars, the common enemies of the Chriſtians, beeing not the cauſers thereof, but euen the Chriſtians themſelues, one of them euen with greedineſſe ſeeking the ruine and deſtruction of another: as it commonly happens in kingdoms and ſtates diuided.

Neither did theſe ſo great troubles, the ground of ſo many miſeries, containe themſelues within the bounds of Hungary only, but brake out into other countries and prouinces thereunto adjoining alſo; but eſpecially into Moravia, into which Countrey the Haiduckes breaking, miſerably ſpoyled the ſame, by force took certaine townes, which they robbed and rifled, carrying away with them euen the very little children, taken from their heauy parents, to be ſold afterwards vnto the Turks: a miſerable kinde of merchandiſe, and of all Chriſtians to

A he deteſted. For remedy of which miſchiefs, by ſufferance ſtil more and more increaſing, Lichtenſtein gouernor of the country hauing raiſed all the power he was able to make, went againſt them, and with much ado draue them out of the Countrey, with fire and ſword now by them moſt grieuouſly ſpoyled. They for all that carrying away with them a great part of the wealth of that Country, with foure thouſand captiues, all by them appointed vnto the Turks ſlauery.

About this time alſo Baſta lying at Presbourg, and vnderſtanding that fourteen thouſand Turks and Tartars being come to S. Georges, ſix thouſand of them were gone ouer the Danubius, about a mile beneath Presburg, to the end that whilſt they were making a rode into Auſtria, the reſt in the mean time might proue their forces vpon Presburg; with his horſemen B followed after them himſelf, to cut off ſuch ſtragling companies of them as otherwiſe might haue don great harm abroad in the country: leauing behind him in Presburg but three hundred Wallon horſmen, with certain companies of footmen for the keeping of the city: which three hundred horſmen being very good and expert ſoldiers, and deſirous to be doing ſomething, by night made a road out of the city toward S. Georges, where the reſt of the Haiducks and Turkes in great ſecuritie lay: vpon whom theſe reſolute men vpon the ſudden falling, brought a great fear vpon the whole camp; and hauing ſlain of them aboue fiue hundred before the reſt could arm themſelues, returned with a great victory, though but with ſmal prey, carrying with them ſome few horſes of ſeruice to Presburg: where by that they had done, it was reaſonably thought, that had they bin but a thouſand ſtrong, they had diſcomfited the C enemies whole camp.

In the mean time they of the gariſon of Comora vnderſtanding that Begedes Baſſa was determined with a notable conuoy to go from Buda with ſeuenteen wagons loded with money and other things of great value, to Botſcay the Rebel, and the Tartar Cham his ſon, who with certain thouſands of Tartars was come to Solnoc, to the aid of Botſcay and the rebels: they in hope of ſo great a booty lay in wait for him vpon the way whereby he muſt needs paſſe, and at his comming ſet vpon him and ſlew a number of his men; amongſt whom it fortuned the Baſſa himſelf to be ſlain, ſhot in the breſt with a ſmal ſhot whileſt hee was mounting vp his horſe: whoſe dead body the Turkes about him hauing taken vp, and therewith about to flie, were there ſome of them ſlaine, and ſome of them taken priſoners, the reſt by ſpeedy flight eD ſcaping. Here were alſo all the aforeſaid wagons taken, with an exceeding rich bootie. All which the garriſon ſoldiers, well worthy therof, carried away with them to Comora, together with the Baſſa's head, ſtruck from his body with his own ſcimiter: which ſcimiter, with the Baſſa's rich coat, Pogranus Gouernor of Comora afterward ſent as a preſent to the Emperour at Prague. This Baſſa whilſt he liued was a moſt crafty and ſubtil man, the chiefe plotter and author of all the late troubles in Hungary, hauing before put all Tranſylvania into moſt dangerous ſtirs and tumults, and greatly confirmed Botſcay in his rebellion. He ſpake the Hungarian language naturally, and was therin very eloquent, which ſerued him to great purpoſe both for the raiſing and maintaining of the rebellion both in Tranſilvania and in Hungary. Which ſo dangerous a man taken out of the way, many were in good hope of ſome good end to bee E made of theſe ciuil wars, more dangerous vnto the ſtate of both theſe afflicted countries, than were the great and puiſſant armies of the Turks, which were almoſt euery year in the heart of one or other of them to be ſeen.

Begedes Baſſa ſlain.

Now was the rebellion grown ſo great in Hungary, and the rebels ſo ſtrong, that euen the very name of the Germans was become vnto the Hungarians both odious and contemptible: inſomuch that Baſta offering to haue put new ſupplies of German ſouldiers into the City of Tyrna, then in danger of the Haiducks, the Gouernours of the place not onely refuſed to receiue them, but alſo to let them haue any thing of them for their ready money; ſaying, That they had citiſens ynow in the city to defend the ſame againſt their enemies, and that therfore as they needed not the helpe of the Germanes, ſo they would haue nothing to do with them. F And yet as ſoon as Redeius, Botſcay his lieutenant, was with his army come thither, they without more ado opened vnto him the gates of the city, and receiuing him in, were about to haue ſlain all the Germans there dwelling amongſt them, being wel neere a third part of the inhabitants; & had ſo done, but that ſome wiſer than the reſt, conſidering that the Germans hauing there long dwelt, were by often mariages joined in affinitie with the Hungarians, and the Hungarians with them, otherwiſe perſuaded them, leſt in ſo doing they might ſeeme to bee G cruell againſt their owne bloud. And ſo the matter being referred to Redeius himſelfe, it was by him (by the counſel of one of the greateſt men of the Turks) ordered, That the Germans ſhould be ſpared their liues; ſo that from thenceforth they ſhould no more vſe the Germane, but the Hungarian apparel and attyre; only the German attyre being taken away for the Germans themſelues.

The Rebels proceedings in Hungary.

But to proceed with theſe troubles according to the courſe of the time and of the yeare, about the foure and twentieth day of May, the Turks and Tartars joyning their forces with the Rebels, burnt fourteen countrey Villages about the lake of Neuiſdier, and as many more in other places alſo towards Newſtat; leauing behinde them moſt lamentable remembrances H and teſtimonies of their barbarous and inhumane crueltie, hauing put moſt of the women and children to the ſword, and impaled diuers vpon ſtakes, carrying the men away with them as Captiues, and the beaſts and cattell as a prey; and ſo leauing the country as they went almoſt deſolate, ſcarſe any being therein left to bewail the miſeries thereof. And about the end of this ſame moneth the Rebels ſurpriſed Simega, Grotta, and Coppernacum, and a little while after Gintium: all which places they rifled and ſpoiled, as they did alſo Hogengoa, a great towne of the Lord Lichtenſteins; and Niderſprunga a towne of Collonitzes, which they first rifled, and afterwards burnt: and with the terrour of this their dealing enforced all the Countrey thereabout both farre and neere to yeeld vnto them: onely Altſoll and Cremnicz, who continued in their loyaltie, and ſtanding faſt for the Emperour, did the Rebels very much I harme.

About the beginning of Iune, certaine companies of Turks and Haiducks mingled together, came againe as they had before done, to Presburg. Of whoſe comming the Gouernour of the City hauing aduertiſement, with three troupes of Wallon horſemen, and certain companies of harquebuſiers, breaking out of the city, cauſed them forthwith to retyre. Which the Wallon horſemen ſeeing, to preuent them in their retreit, fetching a compaſſe about, met with them when they thought themſelues paſt al danger, and falling vpon them, ſlew of them fiue hundred, and draue the reſt into Danubius: ſo that of all thoſe Turks and Haiducks none eſcaped but only fourteen, amongſt whom three Turks and one fugitiue Citiſen of Presburg were found, whom together with a great ſpoil the garriſon ſoldiers carried backe with them K into the city.

At the ſelfe ſame time the Citiſens of Veſprinium fauouring the proceedings of the Haiducks, roſe themſelues in rebellion alſo, and taking the Captaine of the Caſtle, together with his Lieutenant and the keyes of the Caſtle, cauſed them to be carried to Redeius, Botſcay his Lieutenant; yeelding themſelues into his protection. Of which reuolt of the city the Turks tooke exceeding pleaſure, and forthwith ſent newes thereof vnto the Sultan, wiſhing him to haſt the comming of his Army; for that the paſſages were now layd open vnto his further conqueſts. And further aduiſing him, ſtill more and more to encourage Botſcay in his rebellion.

And now was Hungary too little, or elſe too bare, to contain and ſatisfie the ſtil increaſing L Rebels, who in great number breaking into Stiria (as they had before done on the other ſide of Hungary into Moravia) did therin great harm, waſting and ſpoiling al before them as they went: inſomuch that County Serin, the lord Nadaſti, and Budian, all right worthy men, & ſuch as hertofore had don great things againſt the Turks, for the Chriſtian commonweale, ſeeing themſelues and all that they had in danger to be ſpoiled, being not able to withſtand the Rebels, nor hauing any other ſtay wheron to reſt, ſubmitted themſelues vnto Botſcay, as did many other noblemen of that country alſo. Out of Stiria the rebels made head into Auſtria, and there roming vp and down the country, did like harm.

Thus was the ſtate of Auſtria and Hungary at this time moſt miſerable: which for that it is ſo wel ſet down in certain letters by a graue and vnderſtanding citiſen of Vienna, who was M himſelfe an eyewitneſſe of moſt part therof, as that it cannot well be better expreſſed, I haue thought it good to refer the report therof vnto the letters themſelues.

A letter ſhewing the miſerable troubles of Hungarie and Auſtria.

A All Auſtria (ſaith he) is full of miſery and calamitie. From out of the Caſtle and Bulwarks here at Vienna, a man may ſometimes at once behold fifteene Townes and villages all on fire in the Countrey hereabout, kindled partly by the Rebels and Turkes, and partly by our owne mutinous ſouldiers. Odenburg is yet beſieged, and the Haiduckes haue forraged the Countrey as farre as Hinberg: whom had not the Regiment of Collonitz repreſſed, theſe our ſuburbs of Vienna had now beene taken, ranſacked, and burnt. Newſtat is on euery ſide beſieged by the Enemy: all the Villages about Vienna, as far as Dreſſkirc are with fire deſtroyed. They of Newſtat went about to haue cut off ſome part of the Enemies Forces, but with euill ſucceſſe, hauing loſt aboue fifty of their owne men. Brunna and Entzendorſe are alſo with fire conſumed. The Wallons lie incamped at Miedling, moſt miſerably ſpoiling the Countrey people B of all that they had. The Haiduckes hauing by night ſurpriſed the great towne of Altenbourg, and from thence carrying a great prey, haue burnt it. The Caſtle had endured the like fortune, had not an hundred Harquebuſiers that were by chance come thither, holpen to defend it. Six thouſand of the Enemies lie about Wiſſelbourg, but whether the Wallons will attempt any thing againſt them or no, is greatly doubted. Presbourg is alſo in great danger; for the Garriſon ſouldiers there doe threaten the cruell ſpoyle of the Citiſens, with all extremities, if by a certaine day they receiue not their pay. Who if they ſhall depart thence, there is no doubt but that the Haiduckes will forthwith ſucceed them in their places.
Theſe men indeed doe pretend Religion; but what louers they be thereof, the late example of a Miniſter by them moſt cruelly tormented, not farre from Cobbelſdorffe, doth manifeſtly ſhew. The report is, That the Vayuod of Valachia doth fauor neither part: into which prouince a great number of Tartars are C come in the aid of Botſcay. All the Market places and ſtreets here in this City, lie full of poore fugitiue creatures of all ſexes and ages, a moſt miſerable ſight to behold. Our owne mutinous ſouldiers beſet all the wayes to the City, and exclude vs from all manner of victuall; and not to vſe many words, in cruelty and hoſtilitie almoſt exceed the very enemies. The Hungarian Rebels, who of late forraged Auſtria, haue carried away with them aboue eight thouſand head of Cattell, which together with the priſoners by them taken, they haue ſent into Turkey. The little boyes and children, which cannot by reaſon of their tender years go, they carry along with them vpon horſes; whoſe pittiful mourning and lamentation might mooue euen the very ſtones; and yet are they (inhumane men) no whit mooued. Yea many of theſe poore ſoules are here and there by the way found daſhed againſt the ground with their braines beaten out.
And theſe Rebels in their behauiour ſhew ſuch cruelty, as whereat the very Turkes themſelues were amaſed.
D All things abaut Iſenſtad are by the Enemies taken and carried away. They of Newhuſe, beſieged by thirtie thouſand of their Enemies, haue hitherto played the men, and of late repulſed the ſecond aſſault, with much ſlaughter of their enemies. They ſay, That two thouſand Tartars, as many Rebels, and thirteen thouſand Turkes, are to be yet expected to come vnto the camp at Newhuſe. who if they ſhall chance to come, it can ſcarce be that they of Newhuſe can long well hold out againſt them; eſpecially being not well appointed of neceſſarie prouiſion. The report is, That hauing taken Newhuſe, they will remoue to Strigonium. It is alſo ſaid, twelue thouſand Turkes to haue now paſſed ouer the bridge at Eſſec; and great ſupplies both of men and money to come to Botſcay, who lieth incamped about Eperia, and is ſaid to haue made a couenant with the great Sultan, That what place ſoeuer either of them ſhould firſt take, he ſhould hold the ſame wholly vnto himſelfe. Tanhuſer, who of late was Gouernor of Fileck, is E now (as the common report goeth) of counſell with Botſcay. Germenchius hath put in three moneths victuall into Huſt in Tranſyluania. God in his mercy behold our poore afflicted and diſtreſſed Countrey.

Thus far he. Whereby the Reader (as I ſuppoſe) may eaſily gather the miſerable eſtate of both the countries of Hungary and Auſtria; the Chriſtians themſelues being the chief authors therof.

The rebellious Haiduckes had hitherto moſt ſtreightly beſieged the city of Odenbourg, hauing aſſaulted it in fiue ſundry places at once. Vpon whom Trautmanſtorffe, who was General F of the garriſon there, cauſing part of his horſemen to ſally forth, skirmiſhed with them from eleuen of the clocke in the forenoon, vntill two of the clocke in the afternoon, at which time the Haiducks beginning to preuaile, the Gouernor with the reſt of his horſmen, certain enſignes of footmen, with ſome of the citiſens, with three field peeces vpon the ſudden breaking out of the gate, diſcomfited the Haiduckes, put them to flight, and ſlew many of them, hauing taken from them twelue enſignes, with many priſoners, whom he carried with him into the city. Of which ouerthrow the Haiduckes deſirous to be reuenged, with their renewed forces ſhortly after returned againe vnto the city, burnt the ſuburbs of the ſame, and ſpoyled the villages thereabout. But whileſt they thus lay about Odenburg, Baſta but with a ſmall power drawing neere vnto them, they preſently roſe, and paſſing ouer the riuer Dranus carried away with them two thouſand heads of Cattell, with a great number of Chriſtian captiues.

The Turks being not to learne to make vſe of the diſcord of the Chriſtians among themſelues, had oftentimes been in hand with Botſcay, to deliuer Caſſouia wholly into their hands. Of which ſtrong city, being the beſt that the Chriſtians now held in the vpper Hungary, the Turkes were moſt deſirous, both for the commodious ſcituation thereof, and alſo for that they deemed themſelues partly thereof already poſſeſſed, ſome good part of the garriſon therein being Turkes, as well Ianizaries as others. The full poſſeſſion of which ſtrong City the better to obtaine from Botſcay, and to get it into their owne hands, they ſent vnto him three waggons loaded with mony and other rich commodities for a Preſent, and to ſupply his wants, by a good conuoy of foure hundred Haiducks and ſome Turks joyned vnto them. Which Haiducks as they were by the way to Caſſovia, to paſſe by Tocay a ſtrong town holden by the Chriſtians, gaue ſecret knowledge vnto the Gouernour of the place, of their comming that way; and that if he would receiue them into the towne, and ſo into his protection, they would with ſome ſmall helpe from him, deliuer into his hands that ſo rich a booty, and ſo continue with him as his faithfull and truſty ſouldiers. Of whoſe offer the Gouernor well aſſured, forthwith ſent out foure hundred of the ſouldiers of his garriſon to meet them; who joyning with the aforeſaid Haiduckes which came with the Conuoy, ſet vpon the Turkes which came with them, and ſlew them euery mothers ſonne, and ſo with the rich booty were by the Gouernour receiued into the Towne, and by him courteouſly welcommed and entertained. Where they had not long lien, but that after their woonted manner looking abroad into the Countrey, they chanced to meet with certain Companies of Botſcay his men; with whom they encountering, and hauing ſlaine of them neere about fiue hundred, tooke from them ſeuen Waggons loded with good prouiſion, and thirty horſes, beſides much other rich ſpoile.

Totiſa yeelded to the Turks.

But the Rebels, notwithſtanding theſe and other ſuch like loſſes, increaſing both in number and ſtrength, ſtill more and more in all places preuailed, but eſpecially in the vpper part of Hungary, the townes there one after another daily reuolting vnto them; as amongſt the reſt the ſtrong towne of Totiſa did; whereinto the Rebels entering, ſent from thence part of the great Ordnance, together with Relinger a Germane Captaine Gouernour of the Towne, and certaine other Germane ſouldiers there taken, vnto Redeius, Botſcay his Lieutenant, then lying with a great army of thirty thouſand Hungarian Rebels and Turkes, at the ſiege of the ſtrong towne and Caſtle of Newhuſe. Which as it had oftentimes by him been fiercely aſſaulted, ſo was it by the ſouldiers therein moſt notably defended; proteſting neuer to yeeld the ſame, but to hold it out euen to the laſt man therein to bee left aliue. Which cauſed Redeius for the encouraging of his ſouldiers (who had now lien there certaine moneths at the ſiege thereof) to promiſe vnto them the whole ſpoile of the towne, and of all that therin was. And yet for all that, oftentimes kept backe the Turkes from aſſaulting the ſame, for feare leſt if they ſhould by force haue taken it, they would by force alſo haue holden it vnto themſelues, as a place for them moſt commodious for the conquering of that which remained of the vpper part of Hungary. Which hee, although one of the greateſt Rebels, was yet loth to haue it fall into their hands; and yet himſelf, with the Haiducks the Hungarian Rebels, afterward, viz. the 25 of Iuly, gaue thereunto a moſt furious aſſault; inſomuch that hauing aduanced ten of their Enſignes to the top of the Rampiers, they were in great hope euen preſently to haue taken it, but yet were by the reſolute valour of the defendants notably repulſed, and inforced againe to retyre, leauing behind them aboue ſeuen hundred of their moſt forward men

A dead in the trenches. Vnto which ſiege the Baſſa of Agria came alſo afterward with three thouſand horſemen and a number of Ianizaries; ſo that the beſieged, partly with ſhot and often aſſaults diſtreſſed, were ſo waſted and wounded, that there were ſcarcely two hundred whole and ſound men left in the whole garriſon: beſide that, both victuals and pouder begun now to grow ſcarce alſo, ſo that they were brought vnto ſuch extremity, as that well they could not be in worſe caſe: and yet armed with a conſtant reſolution, they ſeemed not to be any thing therewith danted or diſcouraged, but ſtill valiantly held it out.

The Hungarians dwelling in the Iſle of Shut in the riuer of Danubium, hauing before ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Rebels, did with their helpe much trouble the paſſages vnto the towne of Rab and Comara, and the City of Strigonium; vnto whom certaine meſſengers B were ſent on the Emperours behalfe to perſuade with them to forſake the Rebels and to returne againe vnto their antient obedience. Who ſo well vſed the matter with them, that taking a truce for eight daies, they in the meane time ſent fiue of the chiefe men amongſt them by ſhip to Presburg, offering vnto the Gouernour there, That if they might be ſecured of their goods and ſafety, and that the Haiduckes that were with them might be entertained in pay, they would be ready againe to take the oath of allegiance and faithfulneſſe to ſerue him as became his loyall ſubjects and valiant ſouldiers: and for the aſſurance thereof, to leaue their wiues and children as pledges at Presburg. Which their offer was vnto the Gouernour very acceptable and welcome, who yeelding vnto their requeſt, in friendly ſort diſmiſſed them.
But they being returned home, and hauing declared vnto the reſt of their fellowes what they C had done; it was by generall conſent agreed, that foure thouſand of them ſhould ioyne themſelues vnto the Emperours power vnder the Regiment of Collonitz, who to be knowne from others, wore in their creſts certaine ſpeciall feathers; their wiues and children being carried to Presburg as pledges of their faith: but this agreement by them made with the Gouernour of Presburg being once knowne, the reſt of the Rebels in the Countrey thereabout together aſſembled with the Turks, inuaded the Iſle, in hope vpon the ſudden to haue ſurpriſed them: but deceiued of their expectation, were by the inhabitants of the Iſle, and by the helpe of certaine Germane troupes ouerthrowne and put to flight, and three thouſand of them there ſlaine.

The Rebels in the Iſle of Shut ſubmit themſelues againe vnto the Emperour.

About the beginning of Iuly certaine Commiſſioners were ſent on the Emperours behalfe D to Coſſouia, to intreat with Botſcay concerning a pacification to be made, who being by him there honourably entertained, and hauing with him ſtaied almoſt a whole moneth, were at length the nine and twentieth of the ſame moneth againe diſmiſſed. Now the articles which Botſcay propounded vnto theſe Commiſſinners to be conſidered of for the making of a peace, and which for the moſt part were agreed vpon in the peace afterward concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperour, were theſe.

Firſt, That it ſhould be lawfull for all ſuch as would, to haue the free exerciſe of the reformed religion. For although (as he ſaid) he was not ignorant that there was an antient decree amongſt the Hungarians, whereby all that profeſſed not the Catholicke Religion, or that reuolted from the ſame were to be burnt, and that he deſired not to haue that article repealed; E yet that his requeſt was, That the Emperour hauing regard vnto the troubles of the preſent time, would promiſe and aſſure, That from thenceforth no man ſhould be troubled for his Religion, or called in queſtion for his conſcience and Beliefe. Beſides that, he requeſted to haue the Principality of Tranſyluania during his life; yet with this condition, That after his death it ſhould againe returne vnto the Emperour, ſo that the Emperour in his abſence ſhould appoint a naturall Hungarian to gouerne the ſame, as alſo to haue the chiefe gouernment in Hungary. That there ſhould no more Biſhops ſit in counſell but one, and that he, if it ſhould be ſo thought meet, ſhould beare the office of the Chancelour. That the liberty and priueledges of that Kingdome ſhould be kept whole and inuiolate. That it ſhould be lawfull for him only to make choice of the chiefe Palatine of the Kingdome. That goods confiſcated F for any offence committed, ſhould not be diſperſed or ſold, but giuen to men of diſert. That all offenders againſt the State from thenceforth ſhould be iudged by the Counſell of Hungary.
That none ſhould be preferred to Biſhopricks in Hungary, but ſuch as were of the noble Hungarian bloud. That all iniuries heretofore don ſhould be abſoltely pardoned, forgiuen and forgotten. All which things if they might be granted, he promiſed to labor to the vttermoſt of his power, vpon the beſt conditions he might to procure a peace betwixt the Great G Sultan and the Emperor. Laſt of all he requeſted, That the charters of peace containing theſe articles thus agreed vpon, might be ſubſcribed and confirmed by the Biſhop of Rome, the Emperor, the King of Polonia, and all the Imperiall Kingdomes and Prouinces.

The great Sultan loth that Botſcay ſhould come to a peace with the Emperour.

The Turkiſh Sultan vnderſtanding of this treaty of peace betwixt the Emperour and Botſcay, by a meſſenger ſent in haſte to Botſcay, ſought by great offers and promiſes to hinder the ſame: putting him withall in remembrance, that a little before this treaty made, he had not onely by words but by letters alſo ſubſcribed with his owne hand, promiſed vnto Botſcay his Embaſſadors ſent to Conſtantinople, That hee would bring to paſſe, that Botſcay rewarded with ſuch priuiledges as King Iohn in former time enjoyed, ſhould in ſhort time be proclaimed H and crowned King of Hungary, and that to that purpoſe he was euen now ready to ſend a ſcepter and a crowne, the ornaments of a King, to Alba Regalis. But for the preſent, he by theſe meſſengers ſent vnto Botſcay two goodly horſes, with furniture of gold, gliſtering with pretious ſtones. He ſent him alſo a rich ſcimiter, a paire of golden ſpurs, and a long horſmans coat garniſhed with gold and pretious ſtones of great price; perſuading him valiantly to perſiſt in his former courſe and purpoſe. Which he failed not to doe: for immediatly after, he with a gallant traine went from Caſſouia into Tranſyluania, there to take of the Nobility of that Prouince the oath of their fidelity vnto him; accounting no paines or labor great, which he tooke to turne the people from their obedience vnto the Emperor, and to ſtrengthen himſelfe.
At which time he alſo ſent Redeius his Chancellor, with ſome others into Polonia, to I renew the confederation which was ſometime betwixt the Polonians and the Hungarians: who being admitted vnto the Kings preſence, and audience giuen him, firſt declared the cauſes of the diſcord and ciuill war that then was in Hungary, which he imputed chiefly vnto the oppreſſion of Religion, the free exerciſe thereof being forbidden them; and to the inſolency of the Germans, who there at their pleaſure commanded ouer them. Vpon which two points he ſtood much, labouring with many words to perſuade the King thereof: and afterwards requeſting him of his gratious goodneſſe, and of the care which he, together with other Chriſtian Princes, had for the common quiet of the Chriſtian common-weale in generall, and eſpecially of thoſe two diſtreſſed countries, lying as it were euen in the enemies mouth, to enter into conſultation how the ſame euils might be remedied, and thoſe ſo great troubles again appeaſed, K and to the effecting of ſo good a worke to put to his helping hand. Whereunto the King anſwered, That the friendſhip wherein Botſcay offered to joine with him being but the renuing of the antient amity betwixt the countries of Polonia and Hungary, to be vnto him pleaſing; howbeit, he could not for all that (as he ſaid) well like of Botſcay his reuolt from that houſe and family, whereunto he was himſelfe ſo neere joyned in affinity; promiſing yet neuertheleſſe, That he would propound the matter vnto his Nobility, to be further conſidered of: which when he had indeed done, it was by common conſent agreed, That no aid ſhould be giuen out of Polonia vnto Botſcay or the Rebels; and that whoſoeuer ſhould from thence affoord him any aid, ſhould therefore loſe his head. With which anſwer the Embaſſadours returned to Botſcay much diſcontented, being now with a great power againe returned out of Tranſyluania to L Caſſouia.

The Lord Ruſſworme beheaded.

About this time the Lord Ruſſworm (ſometimes Generall of the Emperours army againſt the Turks in Hungary, a man of great note and valor, and of whom we haue before much ſpoken) at Prague falling into words, and from words to blowes, with Francis Count Beliojoſa his brother, and their men taking their parts on both ſides, it fortuned the ſaid Francis, the Earles brother, being grieuouſly wounded, to be there ſlaine; Beliojoſa himſelfe being alſo in fiue places dangerouſly hurt: who ſo hardly proſecuted the death of his brother againſt the Lord Ruſſworm, that within a while after, hee was therefore by the Emperour condemned, and at Prague beheaded, and diuers of his men hanged, with ſuch weapons hanging at their heeles, as wherewith they had ſlaine the ſaid Francis the Earles brother. M

Now was the time of the yeare come, when as the Turks great armies were wont to bee ſeene euen in the heart of Hungary: howbeit, ſuch were their troubles in Aſia, both with the Perſian and their owne Rebels, that they were not at leiſure now to ſend ſuch great forces

A as they had before vſed, into Hungary: neither could the Chriſtian Emperour on the other ſide now raiſe ſuch a power as he had in former times don to oppoſe againſt them, and to hinder their proceedings. The Hungarians themſelues (his greateſt ſtrength in thoſe wars) were now generally reuolted from him, and for moſt part followed the Enſignes of the Rebell Boiſcay. The Princes wont to ſend him aid both out of Italy and out of Germany, now affoorded him little or none at all: and his mercenary ſouldiers for want of pay were now almoſt euery where vp in mutiny ready to forſake his ſeruice, and to pay themſelues with the ſpoyle of his Countries euen to the gates of Vienna. So that had not the Turks beene ſo buſied in the Eaſt, but at leiſure to haue turned their whole power into Hungary, as oftentimes they had before done, it is hardly to be imagined, what ſhould haue letted them to haue ouer-run B not onely that which remained of Hungary, but euen all Auſtria, with ſome good part of Germany alſo; the Emperours preparations being then ſo ſmall, and his forces ſo weake, as that they were not able to hold the field againſt his owne rebellious ſubjects, much leſſe againſt ſo puiſſant and dreadfull an enemy. But God which with his word hath ſet bounds vnto the raging ſea, beyond which it cannot paſſe, and by whoſe power Kings do reigne and Princes beare rule, had by other meanes auerted the greateſt part of the Turks forces Eaſtwards: ſo that Serdar Baſſa, Sultan Achmat his Lieutenant Generall for his wars againſt the Chriſtians, came this yeare but with a right ſmall army (in compariſon of thoſe which the Turkiſh Sultans were wont to ſend) into Hungary. Howbeit, with ſuch forces as hee brought, and with ſuch ſupplies of the Rebels in Hungary as came vnto him, hee being growne fifty thouſand C ſtrong, and out of feare of the Emperours forces, came the nine and twentieth day of Auguſt to Strigonium, and with his army (part Turks, part Tartars, and part diſloyall Chriſtians) encamped in the ſelfeſame place where the Turks army had but the yeare before lodged; hauing brought with him forty great pieces of battery, with all things elſe neceſſary for the ſiege. Neither were the Turks ſooner encamped, but that the Tartars which came with them to the ſiege (after their wonted manner) more deſirous of prey and booty, than of honor and victory, paſſing ouer the riuer of Gran into the territory of the Chriſtians, there ſpoiled and burnt all before them as they went.

The Turks in the meane time to depriue the beſieged of all reliefe to be ſent vnto them down the riuer of Danubius, made a great bridge of boats ouer the riuer, well fortified at both D ends thereof on each ſide the riuer with a ſtrong Corps de guard for the defence thereof, ſo that nothing could that way paſſe to or from the beſieged city. Which things much diſmaied them in the city, ſeeing no preparation to be made on the other ſide for their defence or reliefe: yea, Baſta himſelfe, Generall of ſuch ſmall forces as the Emperour had then, ſeeing the enemy ſo ſtrong, and himſelfe ſo weake, began greatly to doubt of the euent of this ſiege and yet neuertheleſſe reſolutely ſet downe to employ both his valour and his wiſedome for the ſafegard of the place, he, during the time of the ſiege failed not to the vttermoſt of his power to ſhew the effects both of the one and of the other.

And now the Turks aſſiſted with the Hungarian Rebels, had performed an exploit vpon the Iſle of Strigonium, aſwell to take the ſame from the Imperials, as for the ſpoile and pillage E thereof. The inhabitants there had ſtill remained faithfull vnto the ſeruice of the Emperor, whom the Rebels for all that had oftentimes ſought both by force and by perſuaſion to haue remoued from this their loyalty and juſt deuoire. Within this Iſle were 200 Haiducks, returned againe to the Emperors ſeruice, who were joyned vnto the Iſlanders, for the better defence both of them and of the Iſland. But the Rebels knowing well the paſſages and entrances into the Iſle, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the ſame, and in it theſe poore Haiducks, whom they cut all in pieces: which loſſe cauſed Baſta to reſolue to ſend the Wallons he had in his army into the Iſle for the defence thereof. Which they of the Iſland vnderſtanding, made requeſt vnto the Generall, That he would not in any wiſe ſo doe, for that they greatly feared leſt the Wallons, being men altogether giuen to the ſpoile, not finding the Rebels to prey vpon, ſhould F after their wonted manner pray vpon them, the Emperours faithfull ſubjects. At whoſe inſtance the former purpoſe for the ſending of the Wallons beeing changed, Collonitz himſelfe was appointed vnto that ſeruice; with whom Mounſieur de Laual, a noble young Gentleman of France (who but a few dayes before was newly come vnto the campe for the

the honourable deſire hee had to ſee ſeruice, and to ſerue himſelfe, with his troupe of horſemen whom he had brought with him out of France) went ouer into the Iſland alſo. Whereinto when as the Rebels ſhortly after againe entered, they were by Collonitz ouerthrowne and driuen out of the Iſle, two hundred and fifty of them being ſlaine, and aboue fifty moe of them taken priſoners. In which conflict the noble young Gentleman Mounſieur Laual, ſo brauely behaued himſelfe, as that he gained vnto himſelfe much honour and renowne, euery mans mouth being full of his prayſes, and wondering to ſee ſo great courage in ſo young yeares, he being then ſcarce nineteene yeares old. With which loſſe the Rebels rather enraged than diſcouraged, ſhortly after returned againe, in great number and better reſolued; where betwixt them, and them that were left for the defence of the Iſland, was fought a more ſharpe and bloudy fight than was the former; yet ſo, as that the Rebels were enforced againe with loſſe to retyre. In which ſo hot and bloudy a skirmiſh, Mounſieur Laual, hauing moſt valiantly borne himſelfe againſt the enemy, and done enough for his honour, but not ſo contented, but carryed away with the heat of youth, and the deſire of glory, and not otherwiſe to be perſuaded, but ſtill aduenturouſly preſſing on the retiring enemy, was there with a ſmall ſhot ſlaine; all they which knew him much lamenting his vntimely death. But the Rebels not ſo diſcouraged, but ſtill in one place or other inuading the Iſland, and threatening the Iſlanders with all extremities, except they would take part with them; what by force, what by perſuaſion, ſo much preuailed with them, that the moſt part of them reuolting from the Emperour, vpon the ſudden ſet vpon the Count of Rhene, beeing then in the Iſland, and hauing ſlaine three hundred of his men, grieuouſly wounded himſelfe alſo. For the ſpeedy appeaſing of which multitude, Baſta ſent ouer into the Iſland certaine companies of Ratzians and Wallons, who not regarding that the Iſlanders were dayly damnified by the Rebels, moſt miſerably ſpoyled them of whatſoeuer the Rebels had yet left them.

S. Thomas Fort battered and aſſaulted by the Turks.

The Turks encamped before Strigonium, firſt planted their battery againſt the ſtrong fort, ſtanding aloft vpon S. Thomas hill: for that from thence they ſhould haue receiued infinit harme, if they ſhould before the winning thereof haue attempted to haue woon the City; it ſtanding on their backes, and all the plaine betwixt the hill and the city wherein they were to plant their battery being ſubject vnto it. Which fort, though very ſtrong, they with continuall battery by the ſpace of almoſt three weekes, hauing with infinit charge, and the loſſe of a number of their men, made ſaultable, the foure and twentieth day of September mounted the hill to aſſault the ſame. Vnto which aſſault they went vp the hill ſo thicke one thruſting another forward, that the hill ſeemed now to be nothing but a mount or heape of armed men, ſcarce any part of it being to be ſeene, it was ſo couered with them. Vpon whom ſo ſwarming vp, the Chriſtians in the fort, hauing repoſed all the hope of their welfare in their valour, and reſolued thereby to die or liue, couragiouſly diſcharged their murthring ſhot both great and ſmall, ſcarce any of their deadly bullets falling in vaine. Howbeit the Turks, reſolutely ſet downe for the performing of that they had taken in hand, without reſpect of death or danger, came ſtill deſperatly on, vntill that they were come to the puſh of pike, and ſo to handy blowes euen in the very breaches, which the long fury of the Turks cannon had made very ſaultable. Fiue houres this furious aſſault was by the Turks maintained, and by the Chriſtians with inuincible courage and reſolution endured, many braue and valiant men falling on both ſides: and thrice the Turks repulſed, were enforced to retire, but were ſtill by their commanders brought on againe. The loſſe was to both ſides common, many worthy men there ending their daies, worthy of eternall fame. The Chriſtians fell dead vpon the Turks ſlaine by their valor, and the Turks vpon the Chriſtians ſlaine by their multitude. But what ſhould we ſay? The Turks by numbers died, but not their force, that being by their great numbers ſtill maintained euen in deſpight of death, and alwaies liuing in their great multitude, yet left aliue. Which was not ſo with the defendants, but euen quite contrary; who could not loſe one onely man, without diminiſhing of their forces, and means of reſiſtance: ſo that they ſtill loſt without hope of ſafegard, and yet could not be in ſafety, without continuing of their ſo great loſſes. But he that ſtill fighteth only for to ſaue his life, without hope of killing of his enemy, being too mighty for him to ouercome, muſt needs at laſt die ouercome, if it were but

with

A with very wearineſſe. So in the end of this long and furious aſſault, nine hundred of the Chriſtians being ſlaine, together with the Count Oetingen, their Chiefetaine, and his Lieutenant mortally wounded, and nothing now more left but a few ſore hurt men, and the dead wals for the Turks to ouercome, they entered the place, ſlew thoſe few whom they found yet breathing, made booty of their death, bloud, and armes; and by the infinite price of their owne bloud, gained that place which had now no more bloud or life left in it. From whence they carried certaine great pieces, to helpe to batter the city withall, and to vanquiſh them, for whoſe defence they were but a little before appointed.

S. Thomas fort woon by the Turks.

The Turks hauing thus gained S. Thomas fort, euen as they were yet embrued with bloud, and prickt forward with fury, forthwith planted thirty great pieces of battery againſt the B baſe towne of Strigonium, ſtanding low by the ſide of Danubius, and commonly called the Water-towne; which they with all their force and fury moſt terribly battered. This baſe towne was inuironed with a palliſado of wood, to defend it againſt all ſudden ſurpriſes, as almoſt all the townes of Hungary are: Whereunto the confuſed multitude of the Turks carried a number of bruſh faggots, ſtuffed with gunpouder and brimſtone, which being ſet on fire, preſently ſet fire vpon the palliſado alſo, and burnt it downe to the ground, making a way for the Turks to come euen to the wals of the city; which they with their great ordnance both night and day inceſſantly moſt terribly battered, vntil that by the fury of the cannon they had therein made a faire and large ſaultable breach. A great ſhame for our men to ſuffer the ſame ſo to be made, and not againe repaired: whereas the Turks before in the ſame place, had made C it good againſt the great army of the Archduke Matthias, being neuer to be driuen and forced out of it by the Chriſtians valour, vntill they were therein ſlaine; and to be now by our men through their cowardiſe not to be able to be made good. For why, it was euen the ſame place of battell, the ſame men, the ſame armes, and the ſame forme of fight, but not the ſame courages. The Turks can very well learne of vs that which is for them profitable, and make vſe thereof to their owne aduantage; whereas we can borrow nothing of them to ſerue vs againſt them, and ſo profit our ſelues by their example. Beſides that, the confidence they haue in their multitude carrieth them vnto ſuch aduantages, as from which the deſpaire of being ſeconded and relieued keepeth vs: whoſe boldneſſe alſo firmely grounded vpon a reſolution to die, paſſeth our reſolution far, in fighting only to ſaue their liues.

The baſe towne of Strigonium battered.

D The breach ſo made, the Turks in good order, ſtaied vpon a firme reſolution, came brauely marching on, one of them thruſting another, and as it were ſtriuing among themſelues who ſhould haue the honour to giue the firſt charge; their haughtineſſe of minde animating of them to ſeeke for honour euen where perils were rifeſt; ſo to haue the honor to die amongſt the moſt forward and valiant men of war, rather than to liue among cowards of no reputation or valor. During the heat of which their ſo great and firme a reſolution, they regarded not the ſhowers of deadly bullets falling amongſt them as thicke as haile, as too weake to dant their haughty courages; but thruſting one another amiddeſt ſo great dangers, came vnto the breach, there to try the matter hand to hand with our men. The Ianizaries were the men eſpecially appointed to this ſeruice, and had taken the ſame vpon them; who with their great E muskets on their reſts cruelly gauled our men, expoſed to the danger of their deadly ſhot vpon the brinke as it were of their own graues. The great Baſſa himſelfe was there preſent at the aſſault, encouraging his ſouldiers with ſpeeches full of terrour and of comfort, as he ſaw occaſion for either to be vſed, wherewith he ſtirred vp their valor as is a ſhip with a faire or rough gale of wind. Death it ſelfe could not ouercome theſe miſcreants, their number ſtill repairing in a moment what death had taken away in an houre: whereas our men ſlew others but to be ſlaine themſelues, and fought not, but to become ſacrifices vnto death themſelues, and not by their reſiſtance to carry away the victory againſt inexorable deſtiny. The fight was great and terrible, and the bullets ſtill flew, few of them falling in vaine amongſt ſuch a multitude and preaſe of men. They of the high towne, who themſelues expected the like danger where- F in their companions now floated betwixt life and death, ſtood aboue looking on, not daring to giue them aide, or to remooue out of their ſtrength, but reſeruing themſelues with all their forces for the ſole ſafegard of themſelues and of their owne defence. Howbeit all this while the enemies forces ſtill encreaſed, and the Chriſtians diminiſhed; for death could not weaken theirs, whereas it ſtill deſtroyed ours, who failed but in number, not in valour, and G gaue place but vnto the force of death, and not vnto the force of men. All the deadly blowes appointed to be giuen for the defence of a breach, had been by our men giuen; all the armes neceſſary for ſuch a purpoſe had been employed, all reſiſtance that could be deſired had been made, and all the duties of valiant and worthy men performed; ſo that nothing here wanted but number, and not valour. But in all ſuch actions there are two things neceſſary, the one for the helping of the other, for the correſpondency of their power; which both joyned in one body, may doe all things, but being diuided, can neither of them doe any thing againſt him which is poſſeſſed of both.

The baſe towne of Strigonium woon by the Turks.

The vpper towne of Strigonium in vain by the Turks aſſaulted.

Strigonium vndermined.

In fine, after foure attempts in this aſſault, moſt of the Chriſtian defendants being ſlaine, the Turks forced the reſt, and gained the breach, treading vnder foot the dead bodies both H of the Turks and of the Chriſtians, to get into the City. This place thus woon, and thoſe that were left, put to the ſword, and the towne rifled; the Turks yet in breath, and all embrued in bloud, gaue an attempt vnto the high Towne, in ſome hope euen at that time in ſo great a confuſion of the defendants to haue carried the ſame alſo. Howbeit, the defendants beholding their weapons yet dropping with the bloud of their friends and companions, and ready to ſhead theirs alſo, for the preſent notably repulſed them. Who ſo diſappointed of their purpoſe, and deſiring to gaine the place with the leaſt loſſe they might, reſolued to take the ſame by vndermining of it, repoſing more truſt in the ſpade and the mattocke, than in their ſwords and harquebuſies; beeing by experience of their former ſieges taught, how hard and dangerous a thing it was by battery and aſſault to obtaine the I ſame. This trauell in the mynes tooke ſucceſſe according to their deſire: for within a few dayes the mynes (with much labour) beeing brought to perfection, and fire put vnto them, they fayled not to worke their effect, but with great violence blew vp the walls, their rampiers, men, and munition, altogether, caſting forth ſuch ſmoakes and flames, as wherewith a number of the defendants were ſmothered and burnt. Which breaches ſo made, and the defences of the City blowne vp, in ſuch ſort, that the Chriſtians lay open to the enemies deadly ſhot, beeing not able any more to ſhew themſelues without danger of their liues, the Turks in order forthwith came to aſſault and force the ſame. Which the Captaines of the Chriſtians beholding, prepared themſelues to withſtand them, and to that purpoſe would haue giuen order vnto their ſouldiers for the defence both of the breach and of the walls, K whom they found ſuch as Eumenes at his greateſt need found his, not willing in any wiſe to fight, and in the moſt aſſured perill of death, without courage, either to vanquiſh their enemies, or defend themſelues,; in ſuch ſort, that not one of them would put themſelues in order, ſhew themſelues vpon the breach, or come neere the walls. Lazie cowards, chuſing rather to attend an aſſured death in their cowardiſe and want of courage, than to aduenture their liues into the danger of armes, well deſeruing to endure the ſame with diſhonour, ſeeing that they refuſed by honourable reſiſtance to preſerue their liues. The Captaines for all that by faire ſpeeches and by threats ceaſed not to ſtirre them vp, praying, exhorting, and ſometime with death theatening them, if they thus refuſed to doe their duty, and with their naked ſwords in their hands would haue enforced them to the breach. L Bnt all in vaine; their dead courages beeing not to be reuiued or ſtirred vp in their ſo great a feare of death: Which much diſmaied the Captaines, ſeeing their liues and honour, together with the place (through this tumult and cowardiſe of their ſouldiers) to be in extreame perill. During which time the Turks comming on, had without any great reſiſtance gained the foot of the breach: whom the ſouldiers now ſeeing ſo neere vnto them, and out of hope to be relieued, and deſtitute of courage alſo, in ſtead of truſting vnto their armes and valour, betooke themſelues vnto the refuge of their ſhame and cowardiſe. For compaſſing in the Count Dampierre, Gouernour of the place, they would by reaſons haue perſuaded him to haue yeelded, and by threats haue feared him from further reſiſting of the enemy. Their fury emboldened them, proceeding not from their valour, but from their feare; M ſtorming againſt their Generall for not beeing a coward, as they themſelues were; trembling for feare of their enemies, and inſulting againſt him. They had but one man of him to fight againſt, which made them furious and hardy: hardy with cowardiſe againſt one,

A not daring to hold vp their weapons againſt their enemies being many. Howbeit the Count in the middle of theſe feares enraged, continued firme in his reſolution, his courage encreaſing in this ſtorme of mutiny, wiſhing rather to die by the hands of his owne ſouldiers, in the performing of his duty, than to be ſaued by the Turks in the bottome of his diſhonour.
Which his ſo braue a reſolution cauſed him euen in the middeſt of theſe furious and tumultuous companies, to put them in minde of their duties, and to perſuade with them: That the perill they ſo much feared, was greater through their owne feare, than indeed it was: that onely their fearefull apprehenſion made the danger, and not the action that was by them to be performed; ſeeing that it was impoſſible for the enemy to ouercome them, if they would but reſolutely ſtand vpon their valour to reſiſt him. That all things reſting but B in opinion, were by themſelues to be ſubdued, if they had but the deſire to ouercome them, and yet of power to ouerthrow them, if they would yeeld to their diſhonour. That therefore they ſhould propound vnto themſelues the honor and the ſhame that was to enſue vnto them, by the different deportment of themſelues in this action, how much the deformity of the one differed from the beauty of the other, and aſpire vnto the honour which their enemies had ſometimes got in the ſame place, and in the very ſame action wherein they were now, for hauing with leſſe appearance of their ſafety ouercome the like danger, wherein their holding out had made them victorious with honour, without any great fight at all. That it ſhould be an eternall infamy vnto them, that the Turks ſhould ſurmount them in their reſolution, in an action wherein they ought to ſhew themſelues moſt valorous; and by their cowardiſe C become ſubject vnto them, whom at other times they had accounted vnworthy to be compared with them in valour. That they ſhould lay their hands vpon their hearts, and remember their eſtate and faith; bound vnto the firſt by their honour, and to the ſecond by their duty. That they were men of Warre, liuing by their pay, which bound them to the ſeruice of him from whom they receiued it, euen vnto death; hauing before obliged their liues vnto their pay: and that they were Chriſtian ſubjects, bound to keepe their promiſe giuen by oath before God. That forgetting either the one or the other of theſe things, they depriued themſelues of the pay promiſed to them which performed their ſeruice; and loſing their renowne in this world for their cowardiſe, and in the World to come for breaking their faith. That therefore they ſhould continue conſtant in the performance of their duty, reſol-D uing with themſelues rather to endure an honourable death, vnto which belonged the recompence of an eternall fame for their valour and fidelity; than to prolong a miſerable life with perpetuall infamy for their cowardiſe; whereof for all that, they could no more aſſure themſelues by the yeelding vp of the place, than by the defending thereof, for as much as the Turks were oft times euen as cruell vpon them that yeelded, as thoſe that reſiſted; keeping no faith with the Chriſtians, but as beſt ſtood with their profit and their pleaſure. And that therefore for his part he was reſolued, rather to die with honour in the place, than to be beholden to his enemies for an infamous and miſerable life. And that therefore he beſought them to follow him in this laſt action of their deuoire, which carried with it all the trophies of their precedent actions, wherein they had oftentimes aſſiſted him in many actions of leſſe worth, and of E much greater perill.

Moſt ſhamefull cowardiſe.

This diſcourſe grounded vpon ſo good reaſons, and proceeding for ſo great valour, might haue preuailed with any other generous mindes, except with theſe degenerate ſouldiers, who by their cowardiſe had hardened themſelues againſt all the points of honour which might any way mooue them; in ſuch ſort that they ſtood as faſt in their baſe cowardiſe as did their Generall in his valorous and conſtant reſolution. They ſtood with their hands behinde them, without any weapons in them, as was their minds without any courage at all: and as men appointed to be ſcrificed vpon the altar of death, attending without moouing, but the hands of them that ſhould ſacrifice them. Great and ſhameleſſe cowardiſe, not daring by reſiſtance to withſtand the violence of their enemies, for feare of hindering them in their deſires, being F indeed ſuch as had vowed their death to ſatisfie their owne fury. Meanewhile ſome of theſe ſouldiers ſeeing their ſpeeches to be but vaine, and not able to mooue their Gouernour to ſatisfie their deſire, conceiued the ſame their requeſts, with the reaſons thereof, into writing, which they ſent vnto him. Which the Gouernour hauing read, in their ſight tore the letters ters in pieces, and trode the ſame vnder his feet; rejecting as well their demands by letters, G as he had done their requeſts by words. In briefe, hauing forgotten nothing of the duty of a worthy Generall, and valiant Captaine, joyned now thereunto the office of a ſimple ſouldier, going himſelfe vnto the breach, with ſome few to defend the ſame. But the more the Count ſtood vpon this his ſo great reſolution, the more theſe cowardly and mutinous villaines proceeded in their baſe obſtinacy, in ſo much that they fell from prayers, to fury and rage, threatening to deliuer him their Gouernour, together with the place, vnto the Enemy, to ſaue their liues, if he himſelfe would not by treaty ſaue them from the imminent perils. If theſe baſe cowards were before deafe vnto the juſt remonſtrances of their Gouernour, which might haue preſerued them from death and infamy, he was alſo as deafe as they, to conceiue their requeſts, or to be mooued with their threats; knowing that he had more reaſon on his H ſide, by conſtant valour to withſtand the wicked and ſhamefull reſolution of his ſoldiers, than they had with diſhonour to enforce him, or to offer him violence, to their eternall ſhame and infamy.

The conditions wherupon Strigonium was deliuered to the Turks.

In the meane time theſe obſtinate and enraged cowards proceeded from words to deeds, and from requeſts to violence, as did oft times the diſloyall ſouldiers of Rome, in ſlaying the good Emperors. For they in cruell manner without reuerence, by force layed hands vpon the Gouernor, put him in priſon, and afterwards crauing parley, fell to treaty with the great Baſſa about the deliuery vp of the place. Wherewith the Baſſa well contented, ſent in vnto them Haly Baſſa, to conclude the matter. Where after ſome little talke, it was agreed, That they ſhould deliuer vp the place (which was not indeed theirs to diſpoſe of) and that the Baſſa I ſhould therefore promiſe and ſuffer them with bag and baggage in ſafety to depart whither they would, with their enſignes frilled vp, and fire in their matches; leauing behinde them their great ordnance, with all their other munition and warlike prouiſion. Which only compoſition by the perfidious ſouldiers made in the abſence and indurance of their Generall, was by the Turks faithfully kept, amongſt a thouſand others like before by them broken whether it were in reſpect of the eaſie conqueſt of the city, (being one of the chiefe and principall places of all Hungary) or for that they being ouer-joyed with the gaining of that which they had ſo long deſired, and now ſo little hoped for, they forgat their wonted cruelty and breach of faith, is doubted.

This city thus yeelded the third of October, and the Turks forgetting their wonted cruelty, K according to their faith and promiſe before giuen, in ſafety conducted theſe cowardly ſouldiers within a league of Comora, helping them by the way to carry their ſicke and wounded men, together with their fardles, which the Turks oft times carried vpon their own ſhoulders. Theſe cowards which thus went out, with their Gouernor ſent out alſo with them, were in number a thouſand whole and ſound men, fitted whilſt they were in the city, with all things neceſſary for their honour, and defence of the place; but themſelues deſtitute and void of all honour and courage. A thouſand, which all together were not worth their Gouernor alone, ſeeing that in him alone there remained more valour than in all that whole multitude. Many of the Inhabitants which had there long dwelt, would not forſake the place, but by the leaue of the Turks there remained ſtill; the reſt which would not, hauing leaue in ſafety to depart L whither they would.

Thus this famous City of Strigonium, one of the ſtrongeſt bulwarkes of Chriſtendome againſt the Turks, which the Chriſtians had now holden by the ſpace of ten yeares and one moneth, after that it was by Count Charles Mansfelt won from the Turks, when as it had long time before beene in the Turks poſſeſſion, woon from the Chriſtians by Sultan Solyman, now againe (as is before ſaid) fell into the power of the Turks, with threeſcore and ten peeces of great ordnance, and a wonderfull deale of other warlike prouiſion.

Baſe cowardiſe worthily puniſhed.

Theſe baſe and cowardly Souldiers, together with the Count their Gouernour, being come to Comora, were juſtly deſpoyled both of their honour and of their armes, and ſent backe againe to Presburg, where curſed and deteſted of all the World, and eſpecially M of the Hungarians themſelues (who although they were reuolted from their allegeance toward the Emperour, yet could they not but much deteſt their ſo ſhamefull and notable cowardiſe) were there the chiefe of them committed to priſon; where after they had for a cer-

A a certaine time lien, and being brought to iudgement, and conuicted of treaſon, in deliuering vp the city of Strigonium vnto the Turks, & in ſo doing to haue greatly damnified the Chriſtian commonweale, they were therefore condemned, and according to the quality of their offences, diuerſly in this manner executed. Captain Leonard Fredericke Schleker had his iudgement, firſt to haue his right hand cut off, and his tongue drawne out behinde in his necke, and both of them nailed to the gallowes, and afterwards to bee hanged; howbeit through the interceſſion of many of his friends he was not hanged but beheaded. Iohn Michael Scorer, Iohn Hopſi, Adam Lindawar, Philip Dur, and Caſper Lielharter, all Captaines, were adiudged to haue their right hands firſt cut off and nailed to the gallowes, and afterward hanged, but through the interceſſion of County Mansfield, they were hanged, and their hands not cut off. Iohn B Lautenberger was condemned to bee quartered aliue; but was at the interceſſion of County Mansfield, firſt beheaded and afterward quartred. Iohn Diſcoff with eleuen other were only hanged.
Laurence Marſhall was enioyned to ſerue two yeares againſt the Turks as a common ſouldier, without pay; but through the interceſſion of County Mansfield had one yeare pardoned him. Ieremy Strelin, with diuers other, which were either fled, or elſe remained ſtill in Strigonium, were iudged, their names to be ſet vpon the gallows, and being afterwards caught, ſome of them to be quartred, and other ſome their hands to be cut off, and nailed vpon the gallows, and afterward hanged. And thus theſe diſloyall captains, by ſhunning of an honourable death in defence of Strigonium, and performing of their duty, by neglecting the ſame, procured vnto themſelues a moſt ſhamefull death, attended vpon with perpetuall infamy and diſhonour.

C But as the loſſe of this ſtrong place was vnto the Chriſtians heauy and grieuous, ſo was it to the Turks no leſſe pleaſing and ioyfull; it being the place they had of long aboue al others deſired, and whereat they had euer ſince the loſſe thereof, with their great armies in Hungary, for the ſpace of ten yeares ſtill aimed. Howbeit this their ioy endured not long, their proſperitie beeing too hot to hold out without ſome cooling blaſt of aduerſe fortune. For the ſame report of Fame, which with the right hand preſented vnto the Great Sultan at Conſtantinople, the pleaſing newes of the winning of Strigonium in Hungary, euen with the left hand deliuered likewiſe vnto him the melancholie report of the ouerthrow of his great armies in Aſia, with the loſſe of Damaſco the greateſt city of Syria. For, to begin with the greateſt firſt; The King of Perſia, inuaded by Cicala Baſſa, Sultan Achmat his great Lieutenant in Aſia; and D hearing that the Baſſa of Caramania had expreſſe charge, with all ſpeed to come vnto him with a great ſupply of ſouldiers to be taken vp in Caramania and the countries thereabout:
he then hauing a puiſſant army on foot, before prepared for all euents, preſently ſet forward againſt Cicala: whom he comming vpon before he was ready to fight, by his vnexpected comming, and ſudden charge, ouerthrew his army, and tooke from him all his great Ordnance. Cicala himſelfe with three hundred ſouldiers, with much ado eſcaping and retyring himſelfe to Adena; which city the Perſian King, purſuing Cicala, ſhortly after ſtreitly beſieged. With which vnluckie newes Sultan Achmat much troubled, forthwith writ vnto the Baſſa of Trebezond, with all ſpeed to ſend aid vnto Cicala: who taking vnto him ſome other of the Turks Commanders, with a great army ſet forward on his journey. Of whoſe comming Cicala hearing, E the better to direct the Baſſa in his proceeding, cauſed himſelfe with ten of his ſouldiers whom he beſt truſted, ſecretly by night to be let downe ouer the wals of the city. And ſo comming to the Baſſa, together with him kept on his way to joyne battell with the King as neere vnto the city as he could, for that he had taken order before he came out of the City, that ſo ſoone as they ſhould perceiue the battell to be ioyned, they ſhould forthwith ſally out vpon the backs of the Perſians, and ſo by holding them with a doubtfull battell, to further the victorie.
All which the Perſian King, hearing of the Baſſaes comming, wiſely doubting, and not willing to forſake the ſiege, diuided his army, and leauing one part thereof to continue the ſiege, went himſelfe with the other to meet the Baſſa. Wherein hee vſed ſuch expedition and ſpeed, that with all his power falling vpon him before he could put his men in order, or range F his battell, he made of the Turks (now confuſedly and without all order fighting more for the ſafegard of their liues, than for any hope they had of victory) ſuch an exceeding great ſlaughter, that few of them eſcaped, but were there almoſt all ſlaine. Cicala himſelfe but with two or three moe, hauing much ado by getting into a little boat, and ſo by paſſing ouer the riuer, to eſcape

Cicala Baſſa with his army ouerthrowne by the Perſiā King.

The Baſſa of Trapezond diſcomfited.

eſcape the danger. After which victory ſo eaſily gained, the King returning againe to the G ſiege, after many ſharpe and great aſſaults thereunto giuen, and many men on both ſides loſt, had the ſame at length yeelded vnto his mercy.

The Ianizaries mutiny.

Now with this news of the loſſe of his armies, and of the victories of the Perſian King, Sultan Achmat enraged, cauſed Cicala Baſſa his houſe at Conſtantinople, ful of treaſure & wealth, to be rifled; after the manner of the world, deeming of the doings of him ſo great a Captaine, according to the euent and euill ſucceſſe thereof, though not in his power to haue been remedied: neuertheleſſe ſhortly after, he cauſed great ſummes of mony to be deliuered out of his treaſures, and new forces raiſed for the renewing of the warre againſt the Perſian King. Vnto which ſeruice (now become vnto the Turks dreadfull) when as many of the Ianizaries were to be appointed, they after their proud and inſolent manner, all ariſing vp in mutiny, ſaid flatly, H That they would not ſtirre one foot out of Conſtantinople, except they were both before hand payed, and aſſured alſo to haue their wages encreaſed: complaining grieuouſly withall, of the Baſſa of Damaſco, the Great Sultan his high Treaſurer, that he conuerting the Sultans treaſures to his owne vſe, did not pay the ſouldiers their wages due. For the appeaſing of which mutiny and tumult, the Sultan cauſed the ſame Baſſa to be apprehended and his head ſtrucken off, and ſo with the price of his bloud againe appeaſed them.

The Baſſaes of Damaſco, Tripolis, and Gazare, ouerthrown by the Baſſa of Aleppo.

Damaſco taken & rifled by the Baſſa of Aleppo.

But leauing the Perſian King triumphing in his victories, and the Great Sultan grieuing at his loſſes, let vs turne aſide into Siria, to ſee the troubles the Turks had euen among themſelues, to the weakening of their State, and the encreaſing of the Great Sultans cares & griefe. The two Baſſa's of Damaſco and Aleppo had (as is before declared) been at great diſcord and I variance betwixt themſelues, and the Baſſa of Aleppo in field ouerthrowne, and in his city beſieged, glad to make peace with the other Baſſa, by yeelding vnto all ſuch things as it pleaſed him to demand. Which two Baſſa's for all that being diuerſly affected vnto the Sate, long agreed not, he of Damaſco continuing faithful in his allegiance towards the Great Sultan, and the other of Aleppo ſecretly inclining vnto Rebellion. Which the Baſſa of Damaſco perceiuing, and joyning vnto him the Baſſa's of Tripolis and Gazare, with their vnited forces went againſt the Baſſa of Aleppo, leading with them 60000 good men, with purpoſe to haue beſieged the Baſſa of Aleppo his enemy, in his city. But he betimes aduertiſed of this his deſigne, and not vnprouided for his comming, quickely called together his Forces, and had in very ſhort time raiſed an army of thirty thouſand valiant men, whom he encouraging, and finding K them willing to follow him whitherſoeuer he would lead them, marched directly towards his enemies; with whom he meeting, readily joyned battell with them, which was fought with ſuch fury and hideous noiſe, as if it had been two thunder claps oppoſing each other in one cloud, ſtriuing of themſelues, which ſhould burſt out firſt, being like people, like armes, and like order of fight. The medley for a great time continued ſharpe and furious, the number of the one ſide counteruailing the valour of the other, and the others valor ballancing the others great number: howbeit in the end the lone Baſſa ouercame the other three, and the ſmaller number the greater, and putting them to flight, remained ſole victors of the field. Now the victorious Baſſa, as wiſe to vſe the victory, as hee was valiant to obtaine the ſame, ſo eagerly purſued them, that without giuing them leaue to breathe, hee beſieged Tripolis, the Baſſa L whereof at his comming abandoned the ſame, and carrying with him all his treaſure, fled into Cyprus; which made the taking of the place vnto the victorious Baſſa eaſie, who rifled and ranſacked the ſame: and not content with this conqueſt, forthwith beſieged the great and ſtrong city of Damaſco, reſolued to die in the plaines thereof, or to become victorious within the walls of the ſame. During which ſiege, the Baſſa of Tripolis had out of the prouinces and countries of the Turks thereabouts, raiſed another great army, and was comming to raiſe the ſiege, and to reſcue the City. Whereof the Baſſa of Aleppo hearing, roſe with the greateſt part of his army, and meeting with him, gaue him battell, and therein the ſecond time ouerthrew him and put him to flight. Which misfortune ſo diſmaied the minds of the beſieged, that deſpairing of all ſuccour and reliefe, they by conſent of their Gouernor fell to parly M with the enemies, and ſo vpon certaine capitulations yeelded vnto him the place. Whereinto the Baſſa entering, found therein great treaſure, raiſed of the Turks tributes, whereupon he ſeiſed, and by the meanes thereof reſolued to make himſelfe Maſter of all Syria, the chiefe

A city whereof he had now in his owne power; whereunto he gaue free acceſſe and traffique vnto all the Merchants of Perſia and of the Indies.

Now in the time of this his proſperity, newes was brought him, That the Beglerbeg of Natolia had ſent his Lieutenant with a great Army againſt him; who knowing that diligence was the ſpirit of conqueſt, and that to conquer was to little purpoſe, without a vigilant care for the preſeruation thereof, reſted not vpon his former good fortune, but marched directly towards his enemies. Wherein his ſucceſſe was anſwerable to his deſigne, for within the ſpace of two dayes hee had taken all the paſſages which might giue way vnto his enemies to diſtreſſe him: and in the ſtreights of the mountaines, whereby the enemy was to paſſe, layed a great ambuſh of two thouſand harquebuſiers and three thouſand horſe, who, B the enemies being paſſed, and hee charging them a head, ſet vpon them in the rereward, and brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that hauing made a great fight, in fine, they hauing loſt a number of men, were glad to fly, and to leaue the Victory vnto the Baſſa. And to the encreaſing of his good happes, hee intercepted a Ship, caſt by weather vpon that Coaſt, laded with great treaſure, bound from Alexandria to Conſtantinople with the tributes of Ægypt, belonging to the Great Sultan. Of all which things the Perſian King aduertiſed, ſought to joyne with him in amity, highly commending all his valiant acts, and ſending vnto him honourable Preſents; to wit, a Piſtoll, an Helmet, and a Targuet, all ſet with pretious ſtones, eſteemed to bee worth fifty thouſand Crownes. This flame of rebellion ſpread abroad out of Syria, into Caramania, and ſo farther and farther into the leſſer Aſia. C Which was the cauſe that the Great Sultan ſent with all ſpeed vnto the Viſier Baſſa, then in Hungary; commanding him, now that Strigonium was taken, which before had hindered the concluding of peace, hee ſhould now vpon reaſonable conditions conclude the ſame, to the end that his affaires on this ſide of his Empire beeing ſet in quiet and ſecurity, hee might forthwith after turne his Forces againſt the Perſians and the Rebels in Aſia.

But after all theſe great troubles, to returne againe into Hungary. The Rebels there had of long beſieged the ſtrong Towne of Newhuſe, as is before declared: which being hitherto valiantly defended by the German garriſon therein, was now brought to ſuch extremity, as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible to be longer defended, the garriſon ſouldiers therein D being with often aſſaults for the moſt part ſlaine, and the reſt of them that were left, grieuouſly wounded. Of which ſtrong Towne (beeing as it were the Key of that ſide of the Countrey) the Turkes which together with the Rebels beſieged the ſame, were for the commodious ſcituation thereof very deſirous: and the Rebels thereunto as vnwilling, for that it being once in their hand, would hardly euer bee againe from them recouered. For which cauſe Illiſhaſcius one of the Captaines of the Hungarian Rebels then at the ſiege thereof, perceiuing it could not be long kept, to the intent that the Turks ſhould not by force obtaine the ſame, by Letters requeſted of Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant, though then his enemy, That the Towne might be deliuered vnto Humanoius, another Captaine of the Hungarian Rebels, leſt the Turks ſhould by force obtaine the ſame: aſſuring him vpon the perill E of his owne life, and the confiſcation of all his goods to the Emperour, that vpon a reconciliation and peace to be made betwixt the Emperour and the Hungarians his ſubjects, hee ſhould againe deliuer the ſame Towne and Fortreſſe into his poſſeſſion. Whereupon by commandement of the Archduke and of Baſta, the Towne was yeelded vp the ſeuenteenth day of the Moneth of October, vnto the aforeſaid Humanoius, and the Hungarians only receiued into the towne; yet with this condition, That the Germane ſouldiers which were yet left, and who had valiantly thus long endured the ſiege, might ſtill ſtay in the towne in pay, and keepe watch and ward together with the reſt of the Hungarians, Humanoius hauing command ouer them all.

Newhuſe yeelded vnto the Hungarian Rebels.

Wherefore the Turks ſeeing themſelues diſappointed of their purpoſe, for the obtaining F of this ſtrong Towne, riſing by night, and not a little diſcontented with the Hungarians, marched towards Strigonium, at the ſiege whereof the Viſier Baſſa lay. Howbeit within a few dayes after, the Hungarians not liking to haue the Germanes in garriſon with them, turned them with their Captaine Strenius out of the Towne, and yet ſafely conducted them to Comara.

At the ſame time they of Altenſoll, another ſtrong towne of the vpper Hungary, not farre G from Neuhuſe, hauing bin long beſieged by the Rebels, and driuen for want of victuall to eat their horſes for the ſpace of fiue weeks; and hauing now eaten them all but ſeuen, and nothing elſe left, yeelded themſelues together with their towne to the Rebels: as did alſo they of Wiglas, Shemnitz, and Cremnitz.

In the meane time Botſcay with a very great army of his Hungarian Rebels, came to Tyrna, a ſtrong towne about ſixteene miles diſtant from Vienna, attended vpon with a guard of an hundred tall ſouldiers, gallantly apparelled all in blew: a little before whoſe comming, Humanoius, vnto whom Neuhuſe was a little before yeelded, had ſummoned Presburg, requiring the ſame to be yeelded vnto him. Which thing Botſcoy, being now come, by Letters likewiſe required of the Citiſens, threatning otherwiſe moſt ſtreightly to beſiege them. Whereupon Schonberg Gouernour of Presburg, doubting of the faithfulneſſe of the Citiſens, H being almoſt all Hungarians, retired himſelfe with a good part of his ſouldiers into the Caſtle; with proteſtation, to ſpend his life and all that he had for the keeping and defence thereof. With whoſe conſtancy the Citiſens mooued, continued firme in their allegiance vnto the Emperour. Which Botſcay perceiuing, and that the City was not to be got by threats, forthwith remooued and went to Peſth, where he was moſt honourably receiued by the Viſier Baſſa, and by him preſented with a crowne of curious workemanſhip, and threeſcore thouſand duckats, with fiue and twenty moſt goodly horſes: and there hauing receiued from him full power to entreat of peace, and to conclude the ſame with the Imperials, with Haly Baſſa and certaine other of the chiefe of the Turks joyned in Commiſſion with him, againe departed I and went to Kyrpa, vnto an aſſembly of the Hungarians there to be holden: whither but a little before Sigiſmund Forgatt was come with the Emperors reſolution, concerning the negotiation of peace; when as in the meane time other Commiſſioners from the Emperour were come to Comara about the treaty of peace with the Turks, they themſelues ſo requiring. Howbeit Collonitz at the ſame time by letters writ vnto the Archduke, aduiſing him that this treaty of peace might not, together and at one time, be taken in hand with the Turks and the Rebels: but that if it were poſſible, an attonement ſhould be firſt made with the Rebels, and afterward a peace concluded with the Turks; the common good of the common-weale ſo requiring: for that he perceiued the Turks indeed not to be deſirous of peace at all, but only to go about, by keeping the Chriſtians at variance among themſelues, and in ſuſpence betwixt K hope and feare, to do them harme, and themſelues good; which was afterward found to be ſo indeed.

A treaty of peace.

The Perſian King had ſome moneths before ſent three Embaſſadours vnto his Imperiall Majeſty, who being come at diuers times one after another, were all with peculiar letters diſmiſſed from Prague the 29 of Nouember. Vnto the firſt of which Embaſſadours Letters were giuen, of this purport.

The Emperors Letters vnto the Perſian King.

Zinel Chan Beg whom your Majeſty hath ſent Embaſſadour vnto vs, we haue willingly ſeene and receiued, and giuen him audience, in declaring of ſuch things as he had from you in charge. It is vnto vs both acceptable and pleaſing, that your Majeſty hath regard, ſo friendly to ſalute vs, and ſo carefully L to ſeeke to joyne in amity and friendſhip with vs, whereby your Majeſty much bindeth vs vnto the like deſire of mutuall loue and friendſhip; and that we againe on our parts ſhould be ready to performe ſuch things as may be vnto your Majeſty pleaſing: and that we ſhould wiſh for nothing more, than that our friendſhip ſhould dayly more and more be confirmed, and for the common good of vs both, for many yeares preſerued: wherein we for our parts will not be wanting. Whereas your Majeſty with great courage hath vndertaken, and with ſo happy ſucceſſe of victories continued your warres againſt the Turke, whereof you had ſo juſt cauſe, we from our hearts in your behalfe rejoyce as all other Chriſtians worthily doe: and we our ſelues are thereby much animated valiantly and conſtantly to proceed in our warres, which we now ſo many yeares haue made with the ſame enemy, nothing doubting but that God the reuenger of wrong will ſo proſper the honourable endeauours of your Majeſty, as that you ſhall M not onely recouer ſuch things as haue beene wrongfully taken from you, but alſo weaken and deſtroy the power of that perfidious enemy. Which that it may the better bee brought to paſſe, wee alſo renew our warres, raiſe greater forces, and by our Embaſſadours and Letters exhort and incite the greateſt Chriſtian Princes and Potentates to extend their power againſt this our common enemy: and

A thereby to giue fitter opportunitie and occaſion vnto your Maieſty for the better proceeding of your affairs in Aſia. The courſe of our notable victories which wee haue in few yeares paſt obtained againſt the Turkes, the tumults and troubles which the Turks haue by ſecret deuices raiſed in Hungary, haue ſomewhat hindred: howbeit we hope by Gods permiſſion, that all things ſhall ſhortly be again reſtored to their former eſtate, ſo that we may wholly without let turn our ſelues with our power againſt the Turkes. Yet in the mean time we haue thus much preuailed with the King of Spaine, as that hee hath already ſet forth a fleet vnto the borders of his territories, to diſtract his forces, the proſperous ſucceſſe of which Fleet we daily expect. We haue alſo mooued the Pope, that he ſhould alſo giue aid in this common Cauſe, and excite other Princes alſo to do the like; which he with great endeauor doth. But concerning ſuch things as ſhall hereafter happen, we ſhall by Letters and Embaſſadors certifie your Maieſty as occaſion ſhall require: B as at this preſent we had appointed to ſend vnto you the Baron of Dobna, a famous and noble gentleman, who (all things being ready for his iourney) ſuddenly died. And would now haue ſent another, had not the vnexpected change of the affairs of the Moſcouits otherwiſe diſſwaded vs, we hauing no other way but that at this time to ſend into Perſia. For concerning this great Prince which is now reported to reign there, what his minde is, or how he ſtandeth affected, we haue as yet no experience. In the mean time wee ſo deſire a perpetuall and firme friendſhip betweene vs and your Maieſty, with a certain ſecure and free commerce, that if your Maieſty (which we wiſh) ſhall extend your victories vnto the ſea, your ſubiects may haue free acceſſe and traffique vnto all our Kingdomes and Dominions. We alſo thanke your Maieſty, that you ſo kindely entertaine the Chriſtians into your Kingdomes, and grant vnto them to haue the free exerciſe of their Religion. As alſo for that you haue ſent your Embaſſadours vnto the King of C France, although without wiſhed ſucceſſe; whereby we eaſily gather your Maieſties great care and circumſpection euery way. As concerning them whom your Maieſty hath ſent vnto vs, they haue diligently and faithfully performed their duty, ſo that they haue deſerued praiſe and fauour both here and in Perſia: whom we much commend vnto your Maieſty, to whom in all things we offer our greateſt loue and affection.

Vnto the ſecond Embaſſador were alſo giuen Letters from the Emperor, to this effect.

D Whileſt we were yet buſied in the diſpatch of Zinel Chan Beg, your former Embaſſador, in the mean time Methi Culi Beg another Embaſſador of yours came vnto vs, whom we haue curteouſly entertained, and graciouſly heard. By whoſe ſpeech, as alſo by your Maieſties letters, wee haue with exceeding great pleaſure vnderſtood both your friendly greeting of vs, as alſo of the happy ſucceſſe of your affaires againſt the Turks ſince the departure of your former Embaſſador, together with your kinde affection toward the Chriſtians in thoſe parts. One of the ſeruants alſo of our Embaſſadour which died by the way, hath reported vnto vs, how curteouſly our ſaid Embaſſador was by your Maieſty receiued; and how you haue ſhewed your ſelfe affected againſt the common Enemy: which was vnto vs a thing both acceptable and pleaſing. Vnto both which your embaſſies the more ſolemnly to anſwer, we had appointed again to ſend an honorable embaſſage vnto your Maieſty, had not theſe lets and impediments hapned, which in our Letters E giuen vnto your former Embaſſador are declared. But ſo ſoon and as often as may be, we will indeauor either by letters or Embaſſadors, more at large to manifeſt our loue and affection toward you. Wherefore we greatly deſire that your Maieſty may continue in perfect amitie with vs, and valiantly proceed in ſubduing of the common enemy; we on our part being ready to perform all things wherby we may teſtifie vnto you the deſire we haue for the preſeruation of our mutual loue and friendſhip, as alſo of our endeauors in our wars againſt him. God almighty long preſerue your Maieſty in health, and make you ſtill victorious againſt the common enemy.

Vnto the third Embaſſador were likewiſe Letters giuen from the Emperor, of this purport.

F

Whereas Ius Baſſi Haſſan Beg, your Maieſties Embaſſadour vnto the French King, came this way, at the ſame time that other two of your Embaſſadors were heere preſent with vs; wee receiued him with the ſame curteſie wherwith we receiued them, making ſtay of him vntill they might all three be together diſmiſſed. And for that his Embaſſage was undertaken for the furtherance of the common good, though it wanted the wiſhed ſucceſſe, yet we haue thought it good to giue thanks vnto your Maieſtie, and in moſt friendly maner to greet you by this your ſaid Embaſſador, whom we highly commend to you, for that for the time he here ſtaid in our court, he ſo behaued himſelfe, as that he well deſerued both our and your Maieſties fauor, wherof we wiſh him to be partaker. Almighty God bleſſe your Maieſtie with all felicitie, and long to his good pleaſure preſerue the ſame. G

These Embaſſadors with theſe letters thus diſmiſſed, one of them went into Polonia, and there declared vnto the King the great loue and affection of the Perſian King toward him, offering vnto him all loue and kindneſſe: firſt requeſting him, That he would join with his Maieſtie in all friendſhip and brotherly loue: and then, That he would take vp armes againſt the Turks their common enemy: promiſing on his maſters behalfe, That he ſhould not lay down arms vntill that the enemy were vtterly brought to nought and deſtroied, ſo that the Chriſtian princes would on the other ſide likewiſe impugn him. This was a ſtrange meſſage, and not before heard of in Polonia, where for all that the meſſenger was curteouſly and bountifully entertained, and afterwards with good words put in hope of obtaining what he had requeſted, was ſo honorably diſmiſſed. H

But leauing theſe Embaſſadors vnto their long journey, to return again into Hungary. A great number of the Turkes and Hungarian Rebels meeting together at Hidweg, had a purpoſe ſecretly to haue ſurpriſed and oppreſſed the Imperial ſoldiers in their camp. Of which their purpoſe they in good time aduertiſed, and therfore keeping ſtrong Watch and ward, ſo receiued the Turks and Rebels at their comming, contrary to their expectation, as that after a ſmall fight they cauſed them to fly: whom the Imperials ſo hotly purſued towards Caniſia, that they ſlew of them aboue a thouſand, tooke about two hundred more of them priſoners, with fifteen hundred horſes which they caried away with them: and ſo hauing left ſufficient gariſons on that ſide of the countrey towards Caniſia, returned themſelues towards Vienna. In the mean time the Emperors Commiſſioners being met together at Comora, about the treaty of peace with the Turks and the Hungarians, the ſixt of December receiuing letters from the Baſſa of Buda, certaine of them the next day after went by water down the riuer of Danubius to Buda: where they being honorably receiued, and hauing with the Baſſa much and long talke concerning a peace, found little difficultie therin, but that the Turks ſaid they could therof determine nothing, without the preſence and conſent of the Hungarians. With which anſwer they ful of hope returned backe again to Comora, as did alſo Sigiſmund Forgat, with the like hope of peace from Botſcay. At which time Botſcay beeing about to depart from the aſſembly at Kirpay, back again to Caſſovia, gaue power to Illiſhaſcius for the furtherance of the treaty for peace. Who hauing receiued letters of ſafe conduct from the Archduke Matthias, about the end of December, together with his wiſe went to Vienna: who being admitted vnto the Archdukes preſence, and hauing had an houre and a halfes talk with him, and euery day after conferred with the Counſellors from eight a clock to twelue, at the length compoſed all difficulties and differences touching the treaty of peace, excepting fiue Articles onely concerning Religion; the free exerciſe whereof the Hungarians in any wiſe required. So that now men began to conceiue ſome good hope of a peace to be in time concluded. I K L

This year thus ending with the beginning of the treaty for peace, the next year began with the wonted troubles of war, the rebellious Haiducks doing great harm in the vpper Hungary, tyranniſing after their wonted maner vpon men of all ſorts and conditions. Where aſſaulting diuers cities, and being valiantly repulſed, they were conſtrained to retyre by the Polonian Coſſacks defending the ſame: yet did they neuertheleſſe no little harm vnto the Country inhabitants. Wherof complaint being made to the King of Polonia, he by his Embaſſador ſent to Botſcay at Caſſovia, obtained, that thoſe ſpoiling Haiducks ſhould be called back again out of thoſe parts. M

Now had Illiſhaſcius the negotiator for the treaty of peace to bee made with the Rebels, ſo

A well dealt in that matter,as that the ſame in the later end of Ianuarie ſhould haue been publiſhed at Vienna, but that certaine of the chiefe of the Clergy could not be brought to conſent,that the free exerciſe of Religion ſhould indifferently be granted to all the people in generall, but vnto the Nobilitie onely. Whereupon Illiſhaſcius with the reſt of the Commiſſioners for the Hungarians,with great diſcontentment being about to return home again without any thing at all concluded,the Deputies for the Emperor ſeeing that it could not otherwiſe be brought to paſſe, at length agreed (although neuer ſo much contrary to the good liking of the Clergy-men) to ſatisfie the Hungarians in this their requeſt,and that the free exerciſe as well of the Reformed as of the Romiſh Religion, ſhould bee permitted to all men thorowout all Hungary, in ſuch ſort as they had before beene in the time of the Emperours B Maximilian and Ferdinand. Concerning which point for the free libertie of Religion, Letters were deliuered vnto Illiſhaſcius; all the other points concerning the peace beeing put off vntill the next aſſembly of the chiefe States of Hungary,ſhortly after to be holden at the city of Presburg.

The free exerciſe of religion granted to the Hungarians.

About the beginning of March, the Spahi at Conſtantinople had requeſted of the Viſier Baſſa, That it might bee lawfull for themſelues to take vp their woonted Penſion of the Farmers and husbandmen here and there in the Countrey. Which although it were vnto them by the Viſier Baſſa denied, (who had commaundement from the great Sultan, within a few daies after to giue euery one of them his preſent pay in ready money) yet they not ſo contented, but going out of the city, preſumptuouſly preſumed to trouble the countrey men, and C to do the Farmers great harm. For which their inſolencie the great Sultan (the chiefe Captaines and leaders of them being again returned into the City) cauſed them ſome to bee beheaded,ſome to be hanged,and other ſome to be bound in chains and drowned: whereby no ſmall fear was ſtruck into the reſt of the common ſouldiers. But the rebellion in Aſia ſtil increaſing, and the rebels there ſecretly both fauouring and furthering the proceedings of the Perſian King, the Sultan forthwith ſent for the Viſier Baſſa,who the laſt yeare had ſerued in Hungary, to go into Aſia to repreſſe the Rebels there, and alſo to withſtand the proceedings of the Perſian King:commiting in the mean time the managing of the war in Hungary vnto his Lieutenant.

The treaty of peace both with the Turkes and the Rebels was yet in hand; whereunto how D much the Turks were for their part inclined, the garriſon ſouldiers of Rab had good proofe: for the eighteenth day of March, being the day at their requeſt appointed for the treatie, and wheron the Commiſſioners on both parts there meeting together, ſhould haue furthered the negotiation of the peace, not paſt fifty of the Turkes comming to the gate of the towne, required to be let in,as if they had come for that purpoſe. Whom our men nothing ſuſpecting, were about to receiue them into the town: when as a Sentinel without the town (it beeing a thicke miſt) perceiued three thouſand more of the Turks lurking there by: and forthwith giuing an alarm to thoſe of the town, bewraied the enemies treachery; who therupon retyred, they of the town diſcharging their great ordnance after them.

The next moneth about the beginning of Aprill certain meſſengers came from Eperia (a E City ſeated in the vpper Hungary, yet holden for the Emperour) to Vienna, declaring the moſt miſerable ſtate of that city:which although the way therunto being three or four weeks before opened,it had receiued ſome good ſtore of victuals, yet now (as they ſaid) was ſo on euery ſide beſet by the Rebels, as that no prouiſion at all could more therunto come: hoping by that means to bring to paſſe, that the citiſens pinched with hunger and want of things neceſſarie,ſhould at length yeeld themſelues together with the city into their power. By which means they but a little before had obtained the ſtrong town of Tokay; wherin the famin was ſo great,that the ſouldiers had not only eaten their ſhooes and leather jerkins,but had now alſo killed two boyes to eat, and ſome others of them had caſt lots amongſt themſelues, which ſhould be kild for the other to eat. By which extremitie Ruber the Gouernor of the place was F inforced to yeeld. Vnto whom Botſcay,who then lay at Caſſovia, is ſaid to haue offred a great ſumme of mony, with many other good things,to haue taken his part: all which he moſt conſtantly refuſed, proteſting, euen vnto death to continue faithfull in his obedience to the Emperour.

Tokay taken by the Rebels.

About the ſame time Illiſhaſchius, who had before not a little laboured about the furthe- G ring of the peace in Hungarie, writ letters from Caſſouia vnto a certaine great man at Vienna; whereby he declared, that Botſcay without the conſent of the Eſtates of Hungarie could of himſelfe determine nothing concerning the concluſion of the peace: who had oft times told him to his face, that rather than they would againe ſubmit themſelues to a forreine Go-uernour, they would for euer put themſelues vnder the Turks protection: and yet promiſed by the ſame lettters, that although he had got vnto himſelfe great diſpleaſure thereby with the Haiduckes, he would not for all that ceaſe by all meanes to draw the States of the country in their next aſſembly vnto his part, ſo that that which was before concluded at Vienna concerning Religion, ſhould not againe be reuerſed: for many of them (as he ſaid) were afraid that it would not be performed, which was there promiſed vnto the States concerning the exerciſe of their Religion. And that therefore they could not yet bee perſuaded to put H themſelues from vnder the Turks protection, vntill they ſaw themſelues ſufficiently ſecured, both for the liberty of their Religion, and the keeping of their antient priuiledges. And that they could not, nor would, not endure a forreine Gouernour to rule ouer them, with whom they could not talke; nor yet ſuffer Clergy men to haue any voyces in their ciuill affaires. And therefore (he ſaid) he thought it very neceſſarie that the Emperour ſhould not doubt in this point to gratifie the Hungarians. And that Tranſyluania, whereupon hee had been hitherto inforced to beſtow ſo great coſt for the keeping thereof, being now left vnto Botſcay, he ſhould appoint ſuch a Gouernour ouer Hungarie as the States of that countrey ſhould require. For that there was no hope of any peace to be made with the Turks, except I Botſcay and the States of Hungarie ſhould vndertake the treaty thereof; ſeeing that they but only ſeeking for a peace in ſhew, were oftentimes diſcouered but to ſeeke for their owne aduantages and profits.

Illiſhaſcius reproachfully vſed by the Hungarians.

But concerning Illiſhaſchius himſelfe, the Hungarian Rebels ſeeing him ſo much to labour about the concluding of a peace, in ſcorne called him by the by-name of Cripeliſhacius, as hee that too much inclined vnto the Germanes: which by-name he tooke in ſo ill part, as that he departed ſtreight to Eperia, with a purpoſe not to haue been preſent at the next aſſembly of the States: but being again pacified, and by Botſcay called back, he made ſuch a notable ſpeech vnto the States in their next aſſembly, that all men now began both to hope and wiſh more for peace than they had before done. K

In the meane time, the Turks in great number being gathered together to Belgrade, expected the end of this treaty for peace, and letters from the great Sultan to Botſcay were intercepted alſo: whereby he aduiſed him to proceed in his purpoſe, and ioyning with his powers, to ſeize vpon Auſtria, Bohemia, and Morauia; for that he could not be contented with Hungary and Tranſyluania, and leaue the reſt of the Prouinces vnto Botſcay as his inheritance.

The Tartars about this time were about ſo make a road into Polonia, but when as they with their oft incurſions had not a little troubled the Haiduckes alſo in the vpper Hungary, they reſolued amongſt themſelues to ioyne their forces together, and to fight as well againſt the Turks as the Tartars, and from thenceforth neither to truſt the one nor the L other.

Hereupon, when as the Turks in great number came to aſſault Lippa, a towne of the Haiduckes, they forſaking the towne, fortified the Caſtle with certaine companies of armed men, and afterwards beſtowed many others here and there in caues and cellers in the towne, and layed great ſtore of gunpouder in the ſtreets. Vnto which towne the Turks comming, and finding the gates open, and none to reſiſt them, haſted to haue taken the Caſtle. But in the meane time, the pouder which the Haiduckes had layed taking fire, blew vp a number of them, and they which lay hid in the caues and cellers forthwith breaking out, ſlew of them whomſoeuer they met, and ſo made of the Turks a great ſlaughter, and againe cleered the towne. M

The Eſtates of Auſtria conſidering the great harmes they had in theſe late troubles recei-ued, as well from the Hungarian Rebels, as from the Emperors mutinous ſouldiers, and by experience taught how dangerous a thing it was for them to reſt vpon other mens protection, being

being vnto them ſtrangers; reſolued now in a general aſſembly of the Eſtates by them about this time holden, to take vpon themſelues the defence of their Countrey againſt ſuch ſudden incurſions and tumults of the mutinous ſoldiers, and no more to rely vpon forrein protection, ſtill to ſeek when they had moſt need thereof. Wherefore to aſſure themſelues in their own ſtrength, they with a general conſent agreed to haue alwaies in readines two thouſand horſemen and eight thouſand footmen to be maintained at the common charge; fifty of the country peaſants ſtil finding of one of the ſaid ſouldiers.

And much about this time, viz. the third of Iune, Illiſhaſcius a great man among the rebels, and yet the greateſt furtherer of the peace, (as appeared by his doings, and by that wee haue before of him written) hauing before obtained letters of ſafe conduct from the Archduke, came now again with his wife alſo to Vienna; there more at large to conferre vpon the Articles for a peace to be concluded, with ſuch as were on the Emperors behalfe for that purpoſe deputed. Where comming to confer and talke about that matter, he was ſo croſſed by Nicolas then Biſhop of Vienna, who hitherto had been preſent in counſell together with the reſt of the Commiſſioners (a great enemy vnto the peace, in reſpect of the article concerning the liberty of the Reformed Religion) he was, I ſay, by him ſo croſſed, as that there was no hope of any thing to be for the common quiet concluded, ſo long as he was there preſent. For the which cauſe he, on both ſides and of all men deſirous of the peace diſliked, was in the Archdukes name willed no more to come into the Councel, for diſturbing of the peace. In which negotiation for concluding of the peace, Illiſhaſcius had taken ſuch pains in trauelling to and fro, betwixt the Archduke then lying at Vienna, and Botſcay with the States of Hungary then lying at Caſſovia, and ſo debated the matter on both ſides, that all things beeing as good as agreed vpon, for a full concluſion of all matters, he himſelſe, together with George Humanoius, Francis Magot, Sebaſtian Tockel, Staniſlaus Turſon, and others, with two hundred horſe, and thirty two wagons, in all four hundred perſons, the ſeuenth of September came to Vienna, with fifty Huſſars following them. Shortly after whoſe comming, the treaty for peace was earneſtly begun, with often meſſengers paſſing to and fro betwixt Vienna and Caſſovia, to Botſcay lying then very dangerouſly ſick, vntil that all the articles of the peace were neere about the 14 day of September fully on both parts agreed vpon: moſt difference ariſing about the Article for the free exerciſe of Religion. For although it was before declared, that men might haue the free exerciſe of Religion; yet the Hungarians recalling that general word Religion, to a particularitie, would needs haue it ſet down, that men might haue the free exerciſe of thoſe Religions which are at this day called the Lutheran, Calvinian, and Romiſh religion. Neither would they conclude any peace, til they were of their requeſt in that point ſatisfied. Which peace ſo concluded, the next day after, the Deputies for the Hungarians ſent an Embaſſador to the Viſier Baſſa at Buda, to certifie him of all their proceedings, and to requeſt him not as yet to attempt any thing for the diſturbing of the peace. Now the Articles of the peace were as followeth.

Peace between the Emperour and the diſcontented Hungarians.

Articles of Peace agreed vpon betwixt the Emperor and his diſcontented ſubiects in the vpper Hungary.

1 That from thenceforth it ſhould be lawfull for euery man thorowout the kingdome of Hungary to haue the free vſe of his Religion, and to beleeue what he would.

2 That if the Hungarians ſo thought good, they might chuſe a Palatine for their Gouernour; and that in the mean time the Archduke Matthias ſhould no more vſe the title of a Gouernor, but of a Vice-Roy.

4 That the Biſhops that were nobly deſcended in Hungary, and had lands of their owne, ſhould from thenceforth be admitted into the Councell, but the other Biſhops not ſo to be receiued.

5 That Botſcay for himſelfe and his heirs mal ſhould for euer hold Tranſylvania.

6 That the ſame country of Tranſylvania ſhould be ſtill ſubiect to the kingdom of Hungary.

7 That for his arms he ſhould bear three royall Crownes and three open Helmets.

8 That he ſhould no more afterward ſtile himſelfe Prince, but Lord of part of the Kingdome of Hungary.

9 That they ſhould pay the Haiducks their wages which had leuied them.

10 That the harms don on both ſides ſhould for euer be forgotten.

11 That Bohemia, Moravia, Lauſniſium, and Auſtria, ſhould not only with their Letters and ſeales confirm the articles, but alſo ſwear at Vienna, to keep the ſame ſo far as ſhould concern them.

12 That the Hungarians ſhould likewiſe ſend ſome to Vienna, who in their behalfe ſhould with their Letters, Seals and Oaths, confirm and ratifie theſe articles.

13 That the aſſembly of the States of Hungary ſhould be referred vntill a more conuenient time for them.

14 That all theſe things being don, this agreement ſhould be publiquely confirmed and inrolled in the Records of the kingdom of Hungary.

15 That it ſhould be lawfull for the Hungarians by their Embaſſadors to inuite the Princes of the Empire to the approuing and confirming of theſe Articles.

Which fifteen articles were on the Emperors part ſubſcribed by Trauſam, Mollart, Sigifred, Pruner, Lichtenſtein, and Kreuberge: and on the Hungarians part, by Illiſhaſcius, Peter Erkod, George Turſo, Sigiſmund Forgat, and others.

The twentieth of September following, the Embaſſadors for Botſcay and the Hungarians being admitted vnto the preſence of the Archduke Matthias, obtained of him pardon for the forepaſſed rebellion, and all that was therein don. Vnto whom ſecuritie for the ſame was afterward giuen by the prouinces; therby alſo to aſſure them that they ſhould not be therfore afterwards troubled. But yet for all that was before don, the title of the prince of Tranſylvania was left vnto Botſcay for term of his life. Who feeling his ſicknes daily to increaſe, would oftentimes ſay, That he could willingly die, ſo that it would pleaſe God before his death to giue him leaue to excuſe himſelfe of his rebellion before the whole Roman Empire. And ſo about the end of September, all the aforeſaid Embaſſadours for the Hungarians and Botſcay, being aſſembled into the caſtle of Vienna, together with the Emperors Councel, and certain other Noblemen of the prouinces belonging to the Emperor, receiued euery one of them the articles of the peace, copied out and fair written in parchment. Which don they returned to their own dwellings: but Illiſhaſcius went from thence to Newhuſe, to bee preſent at the peace to be afterwards made with the Turks alſo: from whence he afterwards writ letters vnto the Viſier Baſſa, to requeſt him, not as yet to attempt any thing againſt the Emperors prouinces, but peaceably and quietly to expect his Commiſſioners, which were ſhortly to come to him.

But in the mean time whilſt this peace was thus in concluding, certain Tartars at Conſtantinople, in their inſolencie ſet fire vpon a certaine Iewes houſe: whereof aroſe ſuch a terrible flame, as burnt not only many houſes, but a great number of Iewes themſelues alſo, the harm there don being eſteemed at forty hundred thouſand duckats. In which tumult and noiſe of the people running to and fro and quenching of the fire, the great Sultan hauing a fall from his horſe, was therof for a while ſicke.

The Turks of Caniſia alſo hauing conſpired with the Captain of the leſſer Comora, came to haue ſurpriſed the ſame. But the garriſon ſouldiers there hauing before had a ſuſpition of it, ſuffered ſo many of the Turkes as they knew they were able to ouercome, to enter: and ſo ſhutting the gates of the city, kild them euery mothers ſon, the reſt which were without returning again to Caniſia.

Peace thus as is aforeſaid concluded with the Hungarians, George Turſon, Nicolas Iſtvan, Iohn Mollart, Althem, with ſome others the Emperors Commiſſioners for a peace to bee made with the Turks, went to Comara; Sigifrid Collonitz and Budin following them with the army: for as yet they durſt not altogether truſt the Turks, for intercepting them by the way. Which Commiſſioners caried with them Solyman Baſſa of Buda, who had now bin ſeuen yeares kept priſoner in the caſtle of Vienna; and Aly Baſſa; both brauely apparelled in blew ſilk; ſix wagons following them, wherin were caried certaine preſents for the great Sultan, to wit, a moſt curious clock, certain fair pieces of plate, an hundred thouſand duckats, and diuers other things of great value.

A But whilſt they there ſtaid, expecting to hear from the Viſier Baſſa then at Buda, a ſudden inſolent accident fel out, like enough againe to haue broken off the peace already made with the Hungarians, as alſo to haue vtterly cut off the treaty of peace to be had with the Turkes, and to haue ſet them altogether by the ears again. For albeit that the firſt article of the peace made with the Hungarians was, That euery man ſhould haue the free exerciſe of his religion; yet the eighth of October, about three a clock in the afternoon, when as a certaine Hungarian Lutheran preacher was in the pulpit preaching to the people in a church in the ſuburbes of Comora, Buchem and Knevie two captaines comming from dinner with certaine of their ſeruants more than halfe drunk, with their ſwords drawn ran into the church and draue the Preacher out thence; vpon whom captain Buchems trumpetter alſo diſcharged a piſtol, and raiſed B ſuch a tumult in the church, that diuers children were troden to death vnder foot, and the reſt put in great fear of their liues.

Which inſolent fact ſo mooued the Hungarians, that Turſon and Budian there preſent with the reſt of the Commiſſioners, ready to haue gon about the treaty for peace, would needs the next day haue departed from Comora, and were hardly by Mollart and Collonitz intreated to ſtay. Buchem and Knevie the two Captaines were bound to their appearance for anſwering of the matter, and the trumpeter with irons on his heels was clapt in priſon. But the news hereof being carried to Neuhuſel, and as the manner of report is, by fame made far greater than it was, as, That 150 perſons was ſlain in the Church, there aroſe ſuch a tumult among the Hungarians there, as that Illiſhaſcius with the reſt of the captains had much adoe to quiet and ap- C peaſe the ſame: who joining with the Turks of Strigonium and the Haiducks of the Iſland, had determined now by night to haue inuaded Comora, where the outrage was committed; had not *Pograni*a the elder (a man of great grauitie) comming from thence, declared to Illiſhaſcius and the reſt of the captains all the matter as it was don; vpon whoſe relation the whole tumult was again appeaſed. But foraſmuch as the two aforeſaid captains bound to their appearance, were by night fled to Vienna, the Hungarians were very erneſt to haue them ſeuerely puniſhed, as breakers of the firſt article of the peace concerning Religion. Botſcay in the mean time beheaded Catayus his Chancellor, who had gon about to poiſon him, in hope after his death to haue bin Prince of Tranſylvania himſelf; placing Iohn Ianuſy in his ſtead, and giuing him Catay his lands.

Botſcay cauſes his Chancellor to be beheaded.

D Peace now made with the Hungarians as is aforeſaid, and Commiſſioners appointed for a treaty of peace to be had with the Turks alſo (wherunto the Viſier Baſſa, then lying at Buda, was as forward as any, beeing ſo commaunded from the great Sultan his maſter) there wanted but a place commodious for the ſaid Commiſſioners, without ſuſpition of danger, and indifferent for them all to meet in. Wherupon Cæſar Gallen, a man of great experience in ſuch matters, with ſome other captains, were appointed to find out a fit place for them to meet in: who hauing viewed many, at length made choice of one within half a league of Comora, ſo fit for that purpoſe, as if Nature had therfore prouided it. The great riuer of Danubius beeing there diuided into three parts, made therin three Iſlands, al compaſſed round with the arms therof; into which Iſlands the Commiſſioners for the Emperor, for the Turk, and for the Hungarians E might come without let one of another, to intreat of their affairs, and ſo in little boats prepared for that purpoſe, paſſe ouer one to another as their occaſions required. Into which ſo commodious a place, the Deputies for the Emperour the 25 of October, conducted by the horſemen of Mansfelt, Hohenlo and Bonchimin, came. After whom followed Illiſhaſcius and the other deputies for the Hungarians, aſſiſted with the nobility of Hungary, al attending the comming of the great Sultans Commiſſioners; who likewiſe immediatly after came, being brought vp the riuer in 24 braue ſhips wel appointed.

Theſe Commiſſioners being thus apart arriued in the Iſlands, began firſt to conſult by themſelues euery one, of their ſeueral affairs and buſineſſes; and afterwards many times meeting together, with much grauitie conſulted and conferred of the beſt waies and meanes for F the making of a good and aſſured peace for the appeaſing of theſe wars: which euery one of them, and all together, to that end employing the vttermoſt of their indeauours, at laſt the nineteenth of November it was betwixt all the three parties fully agreed vpon and concluded, and hoſtages on all parts giuen one to another, with oathes and promiſes ſolemnly on all

First, That the Emperor and the great Sultan, in all their Letters, Diſpatches, Inſtruments, and Embaſſages, ſhould not ſtile themſelues by any other names or additions, but by the names of Welbeloued father and ſon; to wit, the Emperor calling the great Sultan his Son; and the great Sultan the Emperor (in reſpect of his years) his Father. H

That in the beginning of their Letters they ſhould take vpon them the name and quality of Emperor, and not of King, reſpectiuely one of them to another.

That thoſe two Emperors ſhould take order, that the realme of Hungary and the Archdukedome of Auſtria might be in reſt, peace, and tranquilitie, and altogether deliuered and aſſured from all incurſions, oppreßions, and outrages of the men of war on both parties.

That it ſhould be lawfull for the King of Spain, if he ſo thought good, to enter into this treaty of peace, without the oppoſition or let of one or other of theſe Emperors in any ſort.

That the Tartars, and all other people vſually wont to come in arms into Hungary, ſhould be compriſed within this treaty of the peace, ſo to be diſarmed of all power, by their means to do harm within the realm of Hungary, and they there aſſured from their violences and robberies. I

That euery one, both on the one part and on the other, ſhould forbear from making incurſions and pillages and enterpriſes of war, and from all acts of hoſtility one againſt another; and yet euery one neuertheleſſe to haue power to purſue theeues and robbers, and ſuch others ſeeking after booty, to the diſturbing of the peace, and injuring of the Commonweale. Wherof euery man ſhould haue power to giue knowledge, to the intent by common force to ſuppreſſe them, and to cauſe them to recompence the wrongs and harmes by them done.

That all places, caſtles, towns, and forts ſhould remain without attempt either on the one part or on the other, whether it were by force, ſurpriſe, or treaſon; and ſo likewiſe the goods, families, and cattell of the countrymen which were of their territories and juriſdiction; Botſcay ſtill holding all that was lately to him granted by the Treaty of Vienna. K

That all priſoners taken in the wars ſhould be ſet at liberty, but eſpecially ſuch as had beene taken in Townes and Citadels, which by their valour and courage they ſought to haue defended. And the other priſoners to bee deliuered by exchange and ranſome, as ſhould bee moſt expedient and eaſie for both parties.

That all controuerſies hapning as well on this ſide as beyond the riuer of Danubius, ſhould be peaceably ended by the iudgement of the gouernor of Rab, of the Baſſa of Buda, of the Gouernour of Sclauonia, and of the Gouernors of other places: and that if they ſhould chance to be of ſuch important weight and conſequence, as that they could not by theſe magiſtrats be determined and compoſed, that they ſhould in that caſe be reſerued to be decided by their Imperial Maieſties; and that it ſhould bee lawfull both for the one party and for the other, to repair and build the places ruined, but not to build places of new, which might preiudice either the one part or the other. L

That Amurath the Viſier Baſſa ſhould ſend his meſſengers with preſents to the Archduke Mathias; and that the Emperor ſhould diſpatch an Embaſſador toward the great Sultan with 20000 Duckets: And that the great Sultan likewiſe ſhould ſend his Embaſſador to Prague with great and rich preſents to the Emperor.

That this peace ſhould begin in the year 1607, and continue for the ſpace of twenty yeares, and that one of the Emperors ſhould ſend vnto the other euery three yeare their Embaſſadors with honorable and rich preſents, according to the pleaſure and power of their Maieſties.

That all the Emperors ſucceſſors, as alſo thoſe of the kingdome of Hungary ſhould bee comprehended within the agreement of peace; together with all their kindred, allyes, and confederats, as likewiſe thoſe of the great Sultans alſo. M

That the Chriſtians ſhould again haue the city of Vacia deliuered to them, which they ſhould at their pleaſure keepe and fortifie: and that Strigonium, with all the Villages thereto belonging, ſhould remaine

vnto

A vnto the Great Sultan; yet ſo as that no man ſhould be with any new tribute oppreſſed; and that ſuch as had before been free from paying of tribute, ſhould ſtill keep the ſame priuiledges.

And that the Turks ſhould not exact their tribute by the point of their ſwords, but by the way of Iuſtice, which they ſhould commit vnto the diſcretion of the Iudges and Receiuers, to that end appointed, that ſo it might be payed without oppreſſing of the people, except haply they which ſhould pay it, vpon preſumption ſhould deny it, or too long deferre the payment of it: in which caſe it ſhould be lawfull both for the one ſide and the other, to vſe ſuch meanes as ſhould ſeeme vnto them good for the obtaining thereof.

Theſe are the Articles of this peace, which God turne to the glory of his Name, and the B benefit of the Chriſtian Commonweale; and for which all the townes of Hungary made great ioy and triumph, which they declared by the thundring of their Cannons, which they in great number diſcharged, with many other ſolemnities and triumphs. The Commiſſioners themſelues in token of their conceiued ioy, magnificently feaſted one another alſo: which the Turks firſt began; and not content to haue made them great cheere, gaue vnto our Commiſſioners great Preſents alſo: for the Baſſa of Buda gaue vnto Mollart, Althem, Turſon, Iſtuan, Collonitz, Budian, Hendoc, Cæſar Gallen, and Eleſchin, braue and couragious horſes moſt gallantly furniſhed; and to the reſt exceeding rich garments and tapeſtrie hangings of great value. And as at the time of this feaſt, the troupe of Mansfield had by many ſallies and vollies of ſhot giuen great pleaſure vnto the Turks as they ſate at the table; Alla Baſſa to deC clare the contentment and pleaſure he had therein receiued, ſent to the captaine of this troup two hundred duckets, which he would not accept, requeſting in ſtead of them to haue deliuered vnto him a certain captiue by the Turks then kept priſoner; whom the Baſſa cauſed freely to be deliuered vnto him, and withall ſent backe againe the two hundred duckets to be diuided among the ſouldiers; which for all that Mansfeld refuſed, ſending them backe againe vnto the Baſſa. After which actions of ioy and peace, euery man returned home well content and pleaſed.

Theſe things thus done, and the peace confirmed, the Baſſa of Buda forthwith ſent his Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople, certifying the great Sultan of the peace now made with the Chriſtians: who thereof conceiuing great ioy, with a number of Ianizaries and others, in great D magnificence went to the Church, to giue thanks therefore vnto his Prophet Mahomet, and ſpent the next day with great ſport and pleaſure, purpoſing from thenceforth to turne all his force and power for the ſuppreſſing of his Rebels in Aſia; and the ſubduing of the Perſian King.

The Haiduckes begin new ſtirs in Hungary.

Now albeit that there was a peace of late concluded with the Hungarians at Vienna (as is before declared) yet diuers ſtirs and tumults were neuertheleſſe by the Haiduckes in diuers places of the vpper Hungary ſtill raiſed: inſomuch that about the end of Nouember the Inhabitants of the County of Bocotſie were through their inſolences inforced to ioyne battell with them, wherein a number were on both ſides ſlaine, and three countrey villages burnt: ſo that it ſhould ſeeme, no peace can be ſo well and indifferently made, but that ſome will be E ſtill troubling and impugning the ſame.

Botſcay calleth an aſſembly of the States of Hungary.

Shortly after, viz. the thirteenth of December, Botſcay calling together an aſſembly of the Eſtates of Hungary, propounded to them to be conſidered of, firſt, That the laſt reuolt, almoſt generally made throughout all Hungarie, with all the ſtirres and troubles thereby raiſed, had all been hitherto to no other end made, but for the defence of their Religion, and the maintenance of their antient liberty: Then, That whereas they by their generall good liking had made choice of him for their prince, and that hitherto he had done nothing without their knowledge and conſent, and that euen now at this preſent he was by their conſent ready to depart from the Caſtles and free Cities in the vpper Hungary; and had now ſent his Letters vnto the Archduke Matthias, for the ſending of his Deputies to receiue them; whether hee F ſhould from thenceforth relinquiſh the title of a Prince, or not. And that foraſmuch as no warre could bee made without great harme doing, that he would therefore for the auoiding of further troubles about ſuch matters, that a Decree ſhould be made, That all ſuch wrongs and iniuries ſhould bee forgiuen and forgotten, and that euery man ſhould ſtill hold all ſuch goods, whether they were moueable or immoueable, during the time of this late warre. He wiſhed them alſo in the next generall aſſembly of the States, with all their power and endeauor, to vrge the repealing of the Article concerning the burning of Heretiques, with al other Articles contrary to their Religion: and not to remit any thing concerning the choice of their Palatine, as had in former time bin vſed: neither in this next generall aſſembly of the Eſtates to neglect any thing which might ſeeme to concerne their priuiledges and liberty. And that therefore they ſhould be carefull to ſend thither wiſe and powerfull men, ſuch as ſhould not eaſily be ouercome with the clamors and outcries of the contrary part. At length he wiſhed them to conſider of this alſo, how a true and ſincere confederation might bee made betwixt Hungary and Tranſyluania, ſo that a ſafe and quiet traffique and commerce might in both places be vſed.

Theſe things thus done, Botſcay his ſickneſſe ſtill more and more increaſing vpon him, ſo at length preuailed, that it made an end of him, to the great ſorrow and griefe of all the people in generall, who had him in great honour and regard. He died at Coſſouia the 30 of December, in the yeare 1606. He was honourably deſcended, and a man of great ſpirit, ambitious, wiſe, and politique, a great louer of his countrey, but an extreme enemy vnto the Germanes, and their gouernment in Hungary.

A little before his death, he earneſtly perſuaded Iohn Ianuſie his Chancellor to continue in his alleagance to the Emperor, and not to raiſe new ſtirres, or ſo much as in him was, not to ſuffer any to be raiſed. Neuertheleſſe, ſuch his wholeſome counſell not regarded, there were ſome who immediatly after his death were about to haue raiſed new forces, for to haue ſeiſed vpon Tranſyluania, and ſo to haue ſtirred vp new troubles. For preuenting whereof, Matthias the Archduke forthwith ſent a meſſenger vnto the States of the vpper Hungary; aduiſing them, That the great harmes and miſeries conſidered which that part of Hungary had of late felt and endured, almoſt to the vtter ruine and deſtruction thereof (which proceeded not ſo much from the warres with the Turks, as from their owne ciuill tumults and ſeditions) they ſhould from thenceforth giue themſelues to quietneſſe and peace, and not again inſolently to preſcribe vnto the Emperor what to do, or how he was to diſpoſe of the countrey of Tranſyluania, aſſuring them, that the Emperour would not hereafter winke at ſuch their rebellious plots and deuices, but forthwith turne all his power and forces to the vtter deſtruction and rooting out of ſuch rebellious and ſeditious perſons, the diſturbers of the common peace and quiet. By which the Archdukes warning, ſome, otherwiſe ready enough to haue raiſed new ſtirres and troubles, were not therein ſo forward as otherwiſe haply they would haue bin, but kept themſelues quiet.

Now many there were (and yet are) which much maruelled, that the Chriſtian Emperour would thus make peace with the great Sultan (as is aforeſaid) he being then ſo much troubled with wars, both againſt his owne Rebels, and the Perſian King, in Aſia, moſt part of his forces being turned that way; ſo that a fitter time, or of more aduantage, could not haue been wiſhed for the Emperor to haue done great matters againſt him in, and not only to haue holden his owne (which he did not) in Hungary, but to haue recouered ſome good part of his loſſes there before receiued alſo. And indeed true it is, that the time then well ſerued for both: but what auaileth opportunitie without power? And had the Hungarians (the greateſt ſtrength the Emperor hath hitherto had for the defence of that little which is yet left of that ſo great a kingdome) been at quiet and at his command, and he himſelfe a Prince which had reſted vpon his owne ſtrength and power, euer at his pleaſure to haue been raiſed, and as need ſhould require ſupplied, without depending vpon his friends and allyes, then haply it might haue bin in him accounted a great ouerſight, to haue omitted and ouerſlipped ſo faire an opportunitie. But the Hungarians being then not only reuolted from him, but taking part with the Turks, and the Turks with them, and he of himſelfe with his own power not able to hold the field againſt them, or well to maintaine a defenſiue warre; and his friends and allyes, his wonted and greateſt ſtaies, then at his greateſt need failing of him alſo, what ſhould he in ſuch a caſe do but as he did? to accept of a reaſonable peace whileſt he might haue it; eſpecially againſt ſuch an enemy, as whoſe whole power being turned againſt him, might haue eaſily endangered his whole eſtate. For it is not reaſonably to be thought, how the Emperour ſhould

A of himſelfe, without the great aid of the other Chriſtian princes, his friends and allies, be able to withſtand the huge and dreadfull power of the Othoman Emperour: as (without ominous preſage be it ſpoken) it is to be feared it will too true appeare, whenſoeuer his wars and troubles in the Eaſt being ended, he ſhall againe turne his forces this way towards the Weſt.

Now Botſcay was no ſooner dead, but that ſome others of the Nobilitie both of Hungary and Tranſyluania (haply no leſſe ambitious than was he) began by diuers means to ſeek after and to aſpire to that principalitie. Of whom, though ſome other with the weakneſſe of their owne meanes or with the threats of Matthias the Archduke deterred, ceaſed further to ſeeke after it: yet were there ſome others, who better ſupported, and nothing afraid of the Archdukes great words, laboured vnder hand to haue obtained it. For the croſſing of whom, B and the auoiding of further troubles to be raiſed by theſe ambitious competitors, certain of the Nobilitie of Tranſyluania gathered together at Claudianople the twelfth of February, made choice of Sigiſmund Rogotſie for their Gouernor and their Prince of Tranſyluania, and the more to aſſure him of their loue and affection towards him, bound themſelues vnto him by the oath of their alleagance ſolemnely taken in the chiefe Church there. And afterward ſent meſſengers to the Archduke Matthias at Vienna, to certifie him what they had done, and to excuſe themſelues thereof: who comming to Presburg the twelfth of March, there openly proteſted this election of Ragotſie for their Prince to haue been made, not for that they were about to rebell, or to reuolt from the Emperour, whom they would alwaies acknowledge for their Soueraigne Lord; but for that their neceſſitie ſo required, many of the Nobili- C tie both of Tranſyluania and of Hungary gaping after this Principalitie, and going about, for the obtaining thereof, to raiſe new ſtirres and troubles. Howbeit, the ſame Ragotſie afterward doubting not to be able, without great trouble and danger, beſides the Emperors diſpleaſure, to hold the ſame Principalitie, of his own accord about a yeare after, gaue the ſame vp againe, and got himſelfe out of the way to Sarentum: who was no ſooner gone, but that Gabriel Bathor was about to haue ſtept into his place: vnto whom the States of Tranſyluania ſent word by two of the Noblemen, That the free election of the Prince belonged to them, and that therefore he ſhould not ſeeke by force to intrude himſelfe into the Principalitie, but quietly to come vnto the election, and not to bring with him aboue a thouſand horſemen, and fiue hundred foot.

Neuhuſe againe deliuered vnto the Emperour.

D About this time the ſtrong towne of Neuhuſe (otherwiſe called Neuheuſel) the laſt yeare ſo hardly won by the Hungarian Rebels, was againe deliuered to Sigefrid Collonitz for the Emperor; who ſhortly after comming to Vienna, brought news of a great number of the Turks to haue riſen vp in rebellion at Belgrade, to haue rifled the town, and to haue burnt another town, called Aliſchria, downe to the ground, and ſo with a great prey to be gone ouer to the Rebels: and alſo Redeius, Botſcay his Lieutenant, in going to take poſſeſſion of certain lands giuen him by Botſcay, to haue been by his owne tenants, lying in wait for him vpon a ſtreit paſſage, ſlaine.

Amongſt the articles of the peace before concluded betwixt the Emperour and the Great Sultan, one was for the mutuall ſending of Preſents one of them vnto another: With which E Preſents, when as the Embaſſadour, by the Emperour appointed for the carriage of the ſame to Conſtantinople, from day to day deferred to ſet forward, the Turks and Tartars began to doubt, or elſe ſeemed to doubt of the good meaning of the Chriſtians, for the obſeruing of the aforeſaid peace; and thereupon began againe not onely to roame abroad into the territories of the Chriſtians, but alſo cauſed the pledges left at Buda for the obſeruing of the peace, to bee hardly handled and clapt faſt in priſon: whom when as the Baſſa of Buda ſhortly after ſuffered again a little to walke abroad, the proud Ianizaries were therewith ſo much offended, that riſing in a tumult, they had almoſt ſlaine the Baſſa with ſtones, heaping vpon him many reproachfull words, and vnto his face calling him traitor and betrayer of his Prince and countrey, one of which pledges they grieuouſly wounded alſo. Which their inſolencie the F Baſſa in ſome ſort to chaſtiſe, and to deterre them from doing the like againe, cauſed certaine of them the night following to be ſecretly taken, and being found, to bee ſo caſt into the riuer of Danubius. And yet ſhortly after, they purpoſing to make a road vpon the Chriſtians, to colour ſuch harmes as they ſhould therein doe, and to lay all the blame therof vpon the Chriſtians, and to excuſe themſelues, they procured the Baſſa to write vnto the Archduke Matthias, of great wrongs done vnto the Turkes by the Chriſtians, when as there was no ſuch thing at all. The effect of which letters were, That whereas it was in the articles of peace ſet down and agreed, that both parties ſhould abſtain from roads and excurſions of each others countries; yet that the Chriſtians for all that, had aboue an hundred times ſince the concluſion of the peace, made roads into diuers territories of the Turkes, and ſlaine many of them; eſpecially them about Leoven and Setſchin, who (as they ſaid) had ſlain diuers Turkiſh merchants of Peſth, and tooke from them great ſums of money; as they had alſo taken from them of Potſen an hundred and twenty horſes, with diuers other cattell. Beſides that, there were (as he ſaid) four Turks more by the Chriſtians ſlain neer vnto Caniſia, and twenty eight more taken priſoners. And that in the mid way betwixt Hatwan and Buda, fiue and twenty Turks more were ſlaine, and their horſes with all that they had beſide caried away. Which things for that they tended to the breach of the peace, he could not (as he ſaid) but aduertiſe his Highneſſe of, for that he thought the Chriſtian Captains vpon the borders of their territories to be men that hated peace, and to ſeeke by their excurſions, as heretofore they had done, ſo now likewiſe, to diſturbe this good worke begun, and by all ſiniſter meanes to increaſe their own priuat profit. And that therefore ſeeing that he and the Turkes on their part, wiſhed not to attempt or goe about any thing contrary to the Articles of the peace, that in like maner the Chriſtians ſhould alſo containe themſelues within their owne bounds, and with all ſpeed by Letters to giue him to vnderſtand, whether they purpoſed to keep the peace or not.

The great Sultan (as is aforeſaid) hauing made peace with the Chriſtian Emperour, and now purpoſing to turne all his forces againſt his Rebels in Aſia, and the Perſian King (as wee haue oftentimes ſaid) and deſirous firſt to appeaſe thoſe his troubles at home, before hee had further to do with the Perſian, he ſent a meſſenger vnto the Baſſa of Aleppo, to lay down arms and to deliuer vp his charge vnto another, to whom hee had appointed the ſame; promiſing, that if he would ſhew himſelfe obedient vnto this his command, he would not onely pardon him all that was paſt, but receiue him into his grace and fauor alſo. Whereunto the Baſſa anſwered, That he had neuer taken vp arms againſt his Maieſtie, but to be reuenged of the Baſſa's of Tripolis and Damaſco his ſworne enemies; who once taken out of the way, he would not only yeeld himſelfe vnto his Maieſtie, but deliuer alſo the tribute ſent him from Caire and Alexandria, by him before intercepted; and if hee ſo pleaſed to imploy him, to bring great forces in his ſeruice againſt the Perſian King. With which anſwer the Sultan not contented, ſhortly after ſent the Viſier Baſſa with a great Army againſt the Rebels into Aſia. Who by his wiſedom and diſcretion, more than by force of arms, hauing appeaſed the rebels in the leſſer Aſia, and receiued certaine of the chiefeſt of them into his fauor; with an Army of an hundred and thirty thouſand men marched directly toward Aleppo in Syria. Of whoſe comming the Baſſa hauing intelligence, with an army of forty thouſand men, moſt of them harquebuſiers, went againſt him, and in a place of aduantage not paſt two miles from the city valiantly encountred him, and in three notable battels one after another withſtood his whole forces. But making himſelfe ready to haue incountred him the fourth time, and vnderſtanding of great aid comming to the Viſier from the Baſſa's of Damaſco and Tripolis, he with ſpeed retyred: and returning into the City, hauing truſſed vp his treaſure, with ſuch things as he made moſt reckoning of, fled into the mountains toward Perſia, with the greateſt part of his army yet left ſtil following him. After which vnfortunat battel, the Viſier Baſſa with his army comming vnto the city, at length by force tooke the ſame, and there to the terrour of the inhabitants, put to the ſword all the garriſon ſouldiers which the Baſſa had left there.

But the Baſſa purpoſing with new forces to haue encountred the Viſier, finding himſelfe together with his better fortune, vtterly forſaken by many of his former friends and Companions, thought it beſt at length to take his refuge vnto the mercy of the great Sultan. And ſo reſolued, by Letters requeſted the Viſier Baſſa to write in his behalfe to the Sultan; and ſo if it were poſſible to procure his peace. Which the Viſier hauing eaſily obtained, hee was by Letters from the great Sultan ſent for to Conſtantinople; with aſſured promiſe, that hee ſhould

A ſhould be employed in ſeruice againſt the Perſian King. Vpon receipt of which letters, the Baſſa with an hundred horſe ſet forward; and comming to Conſtantinople, there in the preſence of many other of the Baſſaes humbled himſelfe vnto the Sultan; who not onely kept his promiſe with him in pardoning of him; but alſo in regard of the antient family whereof he was diſcended, as alſo of his great valour and faire conditions, receiued him againe into his fauour, and cauſed all the goods taken from him in Syria, to be againe vnto him reſtored.

Now in the meane time the Great Sultan had by the meanes of the great Cham of Tartarie ſought to make peace with the Perſian King; but all in vaine: for that he demanded the City of Tauris, with all the prouinces before taken from him by the Perſians, to be againe B vnto him reſtored: which the Perſian King vtterly denied, foraſmuch as he had now by force of Armes recouered the ſame, and which in former time belonged vnto his anceſtours. At which time the ſaid Perſian King, the more to entangle the Turke, writ vnto the King of Spaine, for the turning of his forces alſo againſt the Turke their common enemy; the Letters being to this effect: That though they were in Religion diuided, yet that in power and in common hatred againſt the Othoman Empire they were conjoyned: and that hee conſidering the greatneſſe of his power and armes, whereby hee was become his neighbour in the Eaſt, he could not but moſt entirely loue and fauour him: and that therefore hee had commanded all his Prouinces, as well in India as in other places thereabouts, that they ſhould ſhew vnto his ſubjects all manner of courteſie, and to demand of them no tribute. And that C he hauing by force recouered the fortreſſe of Aden, which Solyman the Turkiſh Sultan had ſometime by treaſon ſurpriſed, he had appointed the ſame vnto the ſeruice of the Spaniſh Gouernour dwelling in Goa. And that his pleaſure was, That all the Chriſtians dwelling in his Kingdome ſhould enjoy the ſame liberty and priuiledges which his owne faithfull ſubjects had. And beſides declared, that he had now for ſeuen yeares ſpace made continuall warres againſt the Turkiſh Sultan, who by treaſon had taken from him the ſtrong Towne of Chiamon, for the recouery whereof he had now diuers times ouerthrowne his Armies. But foraſmuch as he was determined to make no end of this warre, vntill he had driuen the Sultan out of thoſe parts of the Eaſt, and recouered the ſeat of Iſmael and Iuchel, his anceſtours in Babylon and Caire, he therefore requeſted him, being a King of ſo great power, to joyne D in league with him, and to ſend his dreadfull fleet into the Perſian gulfe; promiſing that by ſuch meanes the Othoman power driuen out, he could eaſily make himſelfe Lord of Syria and of Ægypt. Laſt of all, he reckoneth vp the Preſents he ſent him; to wit, the Images of Iſmael, Iuchel, and of Ionas, together with his owne, caſt in gold, and ſet with moſt rich pretious ſtones and pearles; a Perſian writing table, garniſhed with faire pretious ſtones, foure dogs by nature wonderfully ſpotted with red, yellow, and blew ſpots, two peeces of Arras adorned with moſt pretious ſtones and pearle, wherein the worthy acts of him that great Tamberlane were liuely to be ſeene: foure hunters hornes very ſmooth and richly garniſhed: twelue moſt gallant plumes of feathers of diuers colours: ſix drinking glaſſes which could not be broken, and couchbeds ſo cunningly made, as that they were like vnto chaires, hauing wrought in them E the antient wars betwixt Aſcanius and Ghiuſa King of the Medes.

Now the Emperour, for the better appeaſing of all former troubles, and the preuenting of new, and the better aſſurance of the State, had about the middeſt of Auguſt called an aſſembly of the States of Hungary to Presburg; whither they being come, and hauing long in vaine expected the comming of Matthias the Archduke, by the Emperour appointed to haue beene Preſident in that aſſembly, were in the beginning of September about to haue returned home, but that requeſted by the Archduke to ſtay yet fifteen daies longer, they were contented ſo to do; but yet vpon condition, That if the Archduke then came not, they ſhould not be bound to ſtay any longer: For why, they by Letters certified of the attempts of the Tartars (who had requeſted to haue a place in the borders of Hungary, appointed them to dwell F in) were deſirous in any wiſe to haue that aſſembly of Parliament put off to a further time, that ſo they might the better betime preuent and meet with ſuch the Tartars deſignes, whom they were loth to haue for their bad and troubleſome neighbours. And now the Turks in the

The States of Hungary about to depart from Presburg, by the perſwaſion of the Archbiſhop there ſtaid meane time, in hope that the peace betwixt them and the Chriſtians would not long hold, were come to Buda in ſuch multitude, that the houſes in the towne being not able to hold G them, they were glad to ſet vp tents for them to lie in within the city: for that the Baſſa would not ſuffer them to ſet vp any tents abroad in the fields, leſt the Chriſtians ſhould ſuſpect them to be about the raiſing of an army, and ſo diſturbe the peace.

But the States of Hungary hauing ſtaied full 15 daies, as the Archbiſhop had requeſted, and the Archduke not comming, made a ſolemne proteſtation before the Chapter of the Cathedrall church at Presburg, that they departed from Presburg, and ſo returned home, not vpon any diſcontentment or contumacy, but for want of things neceſſary, and other their vrgent occaſions (hauing about ſeuen weekes expected the Archdukes comming, without whom nothing could be done) and yet that if it ſhould pleaſe the Emperor by ſolemne ſummons at H any time after to call another Parliament, they would be ready vpon ſuch ſummons giuen, to returne againe to Presburg, and there to conſult of all ſuch things, as ſhould be for the good and welfare of the Common-weale: ſo that nothing were propounded contrary to the articles they the yeare before agreed vpon at Vienna, which they would haue in all points kept whole and inuiolate: ſo that if any man ſhould goe about or attempt any thing in diſpoſing and ordring of the publike affaires contrary to that agreement, they would not in any wiſe ratifie the ſame, although it were by the Emperor himſelfe allowed: which their proteſtation they requeſted to haue regiſtred, and ſealed with the Chapters Seale, and ſo not hauing done any thing at all for which they came, againe returned.

After whoſe departure from Presburg, the Haiduckes (men vſed to liue by their ſwords, I and not by their labour) of all others moſt diſcontented with this generall peace, began now to raiſe new ſtirres and tumults, and dayly to grow ſtronger and ſtronger, crauing aid of the Turks and Tartars, and not of the other Hungarians their countrymen, now againe returned to their wonted allegiance vnto the Chriſtian Emperour: a number of which Haiduckes flocking to Buda, the Baſſa there with ſome other of the Turks Captaines and Commanders, entered into conſultation what to doe with theſe ſo fit inſtruments for the troubling of the Chriſtians, and the diſturbing of the peace. To entertaine them he durſt not, and to caſt them off he was loth; but yet purpoſing to vſe them and to ſet them a worke as occaſion ſhould ſerue, he to prepare an enterance thereunto, by Letters threatened them of Comara, that except they better kept the capitulations and articles of the late peace, they ſhould ſhortly K heare of new matters. But in the meane time Letters were ſent from the great Sultan to the Baſſa of Buda, with charge, that although the Chriſtians were reported to encreaſe their ſtrength, he ſhould yet keep himſelf within his bounds, and to attempt nothing againſt them, except they ſhould proceed to manifeſt force: in which caſe he ſhould not faile by all lawfull meanes to reuenge himſelfe. Which the Sultans mind once made know, the Turks again departed from Buda, moſt part of the great ordnance that they brought with them being carried backe againe to Sigeth.

The Baſſa of Buda forbiddeth to make warres vpon the Chriſtians.

But the States of Hungary, beeing returned home from Presburg, and againe aſſembled, the fourteenth day of October, by their generall conſent, decreed, That Tokay ſhould againe be joyned vnto their juriſdiction; and that the great ordnance throughout L all the free cities ſhould be remoued and carried home vnto the places whereunto they before belonged: That the Vayuod of Tranſyluania ſhould be admoniſhed not to ſeperate Tranſyluania from Hungary: that the Baſſa of Buda ſhould be warned for to keepe his Turks within their owne bounds: and that the Nobility of Hungary ſhould betime be admoniſhed with all their force to repreſſe the Haiduckes, and all other their enemies. Howbeit the Haiduckes proceeding in their inſolent outrages more than before, tooke certaine forts, and with fire and ſword ſpoyled many places of the Countrey, cauſing the people to ſweare to be friends to them and the Turks, and enemies vnto the Germanes and Wallons: and demanding of Humanaius the Crowne wherewith Botſcay had ſometime beene rewarded from the Grand Seigniour, had a purpoſe to haue crowned him, or ſome other for their M King: who for all that, by a meſſenger ſent word vnto them, that he would not at their hands accept that dignity, but faithfully continue in his allegiance toward the Emperour. But

A when the States of the vpper Hungary were about to haue gone againſt theſe ſeditious and rebellious people to haue ſurpriſed them; they were from ſo doing deterred by the Baſſa of Agria, threatening with his Turks and Tartars to take their parts if they ſhould once take vp armes againſt them.

Six hundred Haiducks intercepted by Humanaius.

About the ſame time ſix hundred Haiducks going to the caſtle of Saint Andrew, and comming thither, could not be let in by the garriſon ſouldiers, as they had deſired; and perceiuing them to make no reckoning of their ſeruice, could no longer hold, but openly profeſſed themſelues to become the great Sultans ſeruants: who from thence marching to Buſnoc, tooke it by force, and ranſacked it: and ſo ſtill ſeeking after booty, ran out towards Tockay, where by the way they were in a ſtreit by Humanaius, lying in wait for them, entrapped, and B almoſt all ſlaine; who afterward ſent two of the Turks enſignes, taken from them, to Vienna, and to the terrour of others, empaled ſome of them vpon ſtakes, being brought priſoners to Caſſouia. For which vnfortunat expedition, ſome other of the Haiduckes lighting vpon two of the captains, who by chance had eſcaped out of Humanaius his hands, put them both to death for the euill leading of their fellowes, hanging vp the one, and with their ſwords hewing the other all to peeces. Now by the report of ſome of the priſoners there taken, it was known this new rebellion of the Haiducks to haue bin raiſed by the procurement of the Baſſaes of Buda and Agria, who by their meſſengers had promiſed vnto them all helpe. Which report to haue been true, the euent did ſhortly after confirme, for the 27 day of Nouember almoſt 15000 of theſe Haiducks hauing before receiued from the great Sultan 300000 duckats for pay, came and C moſt ſtreightly beſieged Filek, a ſtrong caſtle, the Turks ſending them great ordnance from Agria, vnto whom theſe Haiducks had promiſed to deliuer all ſuch places as they ſhould win. Howbeit, the euent of this ſiege anſwered not to their deſire: for Thomas Boſnias, Captaine of Filek, with his garriſon all of Germane ſouldiers, ſo valiantly repulſed them, and the extremity of the Winter weather ſo diſtreſſed them, that they were glad to raiſe their ſiege, and be gone.

Now much about the ſame time, viz. about the beginning of Nouember, a great fire aroſe at Conſtantinople, wherein almoſt fiue hundred ſhops of wares with many other faire buildings were burnt, ſo that the harme there by fire done was eſteemed to amount to about two millions of gold.

D At the ſame time that the aſſembly of the States of Hungary ſhould haue been holden at Presburg (as is before declared) the Emperor had appointed alſo another aſſembly of the nobility and States of Auſtria to be holden at Vienna; where after they were aſſembled, certain articles were vnto them on the Emperors behalfe propounded for them in that aſſembly then to conſider of: as firſt, that for the keeping of the frontiers of Auſtria in quiet, the contribution by them granted amongſt themſelues the laſt yeare, ſhould this yeare following be doubled. Then, That if it ſhould fortune the enemy to attempt any thing of new againſt that Prouince, that in ſtead of the horſes and money which they were woont to ſend vnto the warres, they ſhould for the ſpace of twelue moneths, or of the greateſt part thereof, as occaſion ſhould require, of their owne coſts maintaine ten companies of German footmen, eue- E ry company being three hundred ſtrong; and as many troupes of Germane horſemen, euery troupe conſiſting of an hundred horſe. And, that if for the better defence of the borders of Auſtria there ſhould happily need a greater ſtrength, the ſame ſhould be raiſed in no other ſort than was vſed in Hungary, nor at greater charges maintained. And, that if it ſhould continue peace, theſe charges ſhould be conuerted to the payment of the ſouldiers wages: And that the States & other ſubjects of that Prouince ſhould ſo much as might be, be eaſed from the trouble of ſending either of horſe or foot for the defence of the frontiers. Thirdly, That Commiſſioners ſhould be maintained this yeare alſo to attend the army, and certaine skilfull Captaines appointed for the chuſing of a fit Generall for the army. That diligent regard and care ſhould be had for the prouiſion of corne and victuals for the vſe of the people F in generall, as well in the time of peace as of warre. And that foraſmuch as it much concerned the good of the Common-weale, to haue the frontiers of the country toward Caniſia diligently viewed, for feare of the Turks great garriſon there ſtill lying, that therefore certaine good and expert ſouldiers, which knew thoſe places well, ſhould be choſen, who together with the Deputies of the Emperour, Hungarians, and Stirians, riding about theſe confines ſhould forthwith conſider what were beſt to be done for the ſafety thereof. In briefe, ſeeing that of the ſafety of Rab, the welfare of the citie of Vienna and of the forts thereabouts depended, that for the repairing of the fortifications thereof, and the better ſtrengthening of the ſame, the ſumme of fourtie thouſand florins ſhould be appointed: and for the defence of the frontiers of Auſtria from the incurſion of the Turks gariſon of Caniſa, fiue thouſand: and for the furthering of the buildings at Nuſtorſe, fiue thouſand more ſhould be paied: and that thoſe who hitherto had beene ſlacke in paying of their contribution money, ſhould forthwith be enforced to pay the ſame: And alſo that it might be conſidered of, how the too much inhauncing of the value of monies might be reſtrained: that good orders might be kept, all the country cleared from the roberies of idle ſouldiers, ſtraggling here and there vp and downe the ſame: that the counterfeit Hungarian and Polonian mony ſhould be prohibited, as not currant: that good order might be taken for the ſtaying of the Plague, which then began in many places in Auſtria.

Concerning which Articles, when as the States there aſſembled complained, all that country to be with the long wars againſt the Turke, the incurſions of the Rebels, and the outrages of the mutinous ſouldiers, already almoſt exhauſted, and miſerably bared of mony; no reſolution could then, according as the neceſſity required, be made, but was vnto a further time deferred, and the aſſembly broken vp.

The Emperour at the ſame time appointed a Diet of the Empire to be holden at Ratiſbone: wherein he hauing appointed Ferdinand Archduke of Auſtria, to be chiefe in his place, he with a notable traine of ſeuen hundred horſe, and a gallant guard of footmen, came thither the eight and twentieth of Nouember, and was there by the citizens honourably receiued. Vnto which aſſembly, when as the Deputies of the Electors, and of the other Princes and Cities of the Empire, were in great number come, at length the twelfth of Ianuary, Diuine ſeruice being done in the Cathedrall Church, Ferdinand the Archduke, with his Courtiers, the Emperours Counſellors, and other the Princes deputies being there preſent, taking horſe before the Church, with a great company of the Nobility and Princes deputies following of him, went to the Court, the citizens in their armes ſtanding on both ſides: where Godfrey Ottelius the Emperours Secretary hauing in a notable Oration ſet forth the Emperours loue and affection towards the Electors, Princes and States of the Empire, and why, the Emperour him ſelfe could not be preſent at this aſſembly, as willingly he would haue been, he propounded in his name fiue Articles for them in this their aſſembly to be eſpecially conſidered of. Firſt, how the Empire might hereafter be preſerued and defended againſt the violence of the Turks, and the dangerous rebellions by their procurement ſtirred vp in Hungary, to the endangering of the whole Empire, eſpecially ſeeing that the Turks them ſelues (with whom the peace was of late concluded) by their doings had heretofore more then ſufficiently declared what truſt or credit was to be giuen vnto them: and ſeeing that it is moſt manifeſt, them therein to haue ſought for nothing elſe, than that hauing made or rather counterfeited a peace with the Chriſtians for a time, for the ſuppreſſing of the Rebels, and the repreſſing of the inuaſion of the Perſians, they might after ſuch victory againſt them obtained, come better prouided, and ſtronger to ouercome the Chriſtians. Which was eaſie to be ſeene for that whileſt they were yet intreating of peace, they had taken Strigonium, and hauing concluded peace, they ceaſed not as yet with their counſell and aid to helpe the Rebels in their rebellious tumults: which was manifeſtly to be perceiued by the Haiducks themſelues, who were not aſhamed openly to profeſſe themſelues to be the great Sultans ſeruants, to require Cities and Fortreſſes to be yeelded vnto the Sultan, and to conſpire againſt the very name of the Germanes. For the ſpeedy remedy of which miſchiefe, the Emperour had thought good, that conſideration of this point ſhould ſo bee had, as that the Princes ſhould either conſent vnto a certaine ſtanding and perpetuall contribution, whereby a ſufficient ſtrength might alwaies bee ready, wherewith to withſtand the enemies attempts: or elſe that for certaine yeares twenty thouſand footmen and foure thouſand horſe might there be ſtill in readineſſe, to be maintained at the common charges of the Empire, which the Emperour (need ſo requiring) might vſe againſt the common enemy. Or that if this were

A were heauy or troubleſome vnto the States of the Empire, yet at leaſt they ſhould conſent yearely to contribute ſuch money as might ſuffice for the ſuſtayning of ſuch a power, Another poynt of this concluſion, was about the correcting and reforming of the adminiſtration of Iuſtice in the Imperiall Chamber. For ſeeing that in the former aſſemblies and meetings this matter could not be fully decided, by reaſon of certaine hinderances and impediments which then fell out, and that without the due adminiſtration and execution of Iuſtice no Empire could long ſtand or flouriſh, no more than the World could without the Sunne; his Imperiall Majeſty therefore would not haue the deliberation of this ſo neceſſary a point to be put off or referred vnto any other aſſembly, but to bee done and concluded in this preſent aſſembly. The third point to be conſidered of, was the warre which B hath beene now ſo many yeares made in the Low-Countries, and the inconueniencie thereof redounding vnto the Empire. For whereas in the treaty of peace in the Low-Countries, (at which treaty both hee and the whole Empire ought to haue beene there preſent) for the better concluding and ending of the ſame, hee had heard the confederate Princes to be now acknowledged for a free State, he could not now any longer (as hee ſaid) forbeare, but that (ſeeing the Low-Countries to be a member and free of the Empire, and by the antient Records of the Empire, and of the Emperours, and by many other proofes it appeareth, the Gouernours of the Low-Countries to haue beene vaſſals of the Empire) he ſhould by Letters which were written vnto the King of Spaine, the Archduke Albertus, and the States of the confederate Prouinces, admoniſh them, That they ſhould not proceed to doe or determine C any thing in this matter, which might any way tend to the hurt or prejudice of the Emperour, of the Empire, and of the houſe of Auſtria. And foraſmuch as that warre in the Low-Countries had hitherto done no ſmall harme vnto the Empire, if happily it could not be agreed vpon betweene the parties, and that it ſhould happen the ſame warre to be any longer continued, or rather againe renewed, it ſhould then bee conſidered vpon, how the Empire might be ſatisfied for the great harme it had vntill this preſent thereby receiued, and how it might be from the like harme hereafter kept and preſerued. The fourth point in this conſultation, which was to be conſidered of, concerned the coyne. For whereas it is maniſeſt, that the value of the mony to bee dayly more and more inhaunſed and rayſed, and that thereby not onely the Magiſtrates in the publique receipt, but the ſubjects alſo in generall D receiued great and maniſeſt harme, foraſmuch as the price of ſuch neceſſary things which wee muſt in this life haue ordinary vſe of, muſt of neceſſity be ſtill more and more encreaſed, according to the value of the money, the Emperour thought good with mature deliberation to remedy this miſchiefe in this preſent aſſembly of the Empire. The fifth and laſt point which was to be conſidered vpon, was the perfecting of the Matriculer of the Empire, for the giuing vnto euery man that which of due belongeth vnto him: the perfecting of which Matriculer, the Emperour would haue in this aſſembly to be amongſt them conſidered of.

Which articles thus propounded, there fell a great contouerſie amongſt the Deputies of the Princes concerning the manner of their proceedings in theſe matters: as whether they E ſhould conſider of theſe articles in ſuch order as they were propounded, or otherwiſe. And when as many thought it beſt firſt to conſider of the article, for the reformation of Iuſtice, being the ſecond article propounded to be conſidered of, and afterwards to come vnto the reſt of the articles to be afterward conſulted of: when as the two and twentieth day of January they came againe to Counſell, a writing was by the Emperours command read vnto them, whereby it was ſignified vnto the States of the Empire; the rebellious tumults by Botſcay and ſome others raiſed in Hungary to be yet by the Haiduckes continued, the Sultan himſelfe ſending of them rewards, and furniſhing them with ordnance and other things neceſſary for the warres, by the Gouernour of Agria, and the Baſſa of Buda, threatening all extremities vnto them which ſhould go about to reſiſt them; and then augmenting the danger F which thereby might enſue vnto the Empire, and eſpecially vnto the Germane name, ſeeing that it was maniſeſt thoſe rebellious Haiducks to haue eſpecially conſpired the deſtruction of the Germanes, and to haue confirmed that their league, by drinking of an health: It was requeſted, that leauing off theſe contentions, for the manner of their proceeding, they would turne their conſultations vnto the firſt article, and reſolue how remedy might in time bee giuen vnto this miſchiefe, and how aid might be ſent vnto the Emperour againſt his G enemies.

The Deputies for the States of the Empire, in the aſſembly at Ratisbone, at variãce among themſelues.

But when as in their often meetings, nothing could be concluded, by reaſon of the diuers and different opinions betwixt the Proteſtants and Catholickes, Ferdinand the Archduke againe calling together the Deputies of the Electors, of the Princes, and of the Imperiall cities, cauſed it by Letters to be declared vnto them, How that the Emperour not without his great griefe and ſorrow had heard, That for certaine diſſention among them they could not yet come to conſult of the articles propounded in that aſſembly, to be by them conſidered of, but to his great griefe to be from day to day protracted: and that therefore he requeſted them, That either they themſelues would quietly end thoſe diſſentions amongſt themſelues, or elſe ſend their differences conceiued in writing vnto the Emperour to be decided, H and ſo to come at length effectually to conſult of the propounded articles. And indeed the Deputies aforeſaid had in writing before exhibited their mindes concerning that point, for the manner of their proceeding, vnto the Archduke Ferdinand. But foraſmuch as that writing was according to the manner of the Catholickes and the Proteſtants, of two different ſorts; the former thinking it meet to conſult of the aforeſaid article in ſuch order as they were propounded; and firſt of all, to conſider of the contribution to be giuen againſt the Turks, and other enemies in Hungary; but the other labouring, firſt for the reformation of Iuſtice, and the confirmation of the peace of Religion: and afterward to prouide for aid againſt the forreine enemies, that ſo remedy might firſt be prouided for inward, then for outward griefes; eſpecially ſeeing that they had no expreſſe commandement firſt to determine I of the contribution. Vnto whom the Archduke by writing againe anſwered, That he had receiued no other inſtruction from the Emperour, than that he ſhould conſult of the aforeſaid articles, with the Deputies there preſent, in ſuch order as they were propounded: Neither that it was conuenient, that the firſt article concerning contribution being neglected, they ſhould proceed vnto the ſecond, ſeeing that the enemies might eaſily, by the delay of putting off the ſame in effect, take occaſion in the meane time to do the Chriſtians great harme. Beſides that, that he had ſufficiently proteſted, That conſultation concerning the reformation of Iuſtice ſhould in this preſent aſſembly bee had alſo; neither that it was the Emperours minde to haue it deferred vnto any other aſſembly. Whereunto he exhorted the K Proteſtants, That they ſhould forthwith endeauour by their Letters vnto the Electors and Princes, and other their ſuperiours, to obtaine leaue, that they might firſt determine ſome certainty about the firſt article concerning contribution; that ſo giuing way to the opinion of the other party, they might inſtantly prepare themſelues for the making of the contribution. Howbeit, this his perſuaſion preuailed nothing, by reaſon of their diſcord and diſſention about the order of their conſultation; the one part ſtill labouring for the contribution to be firſt agreed vpon, and the other part holding as hard for the reformation of Iuſtice, ſo that Ferdinand the Archduke out of hope of concluding any thing that good was, not in vaine to ſpend his coſt and time any longer, the fifth of May diſmiſſed the aſſembly, and returned home, as did all the reſt of the Electors and Princes Deputies, no one article L that was propounded being ſo much as once reaſoned of, but all left vndecided: ſo ſmall care was there of the common good, either for the raiſing of money for the withſtanding of the Turks and Rebels, or for the reformation of Iuſtice; the neceſſity of both, either on the one ſide or the other, ſo hardly vrged, and yet in concluſion be neither reſpected or regarded.

The Diet brokẽ off, and nothing concluded.

Matthias the Archduke commeth to Preſburg.

Whileſt the Diet to no purpoſe (as is aforeſaid) was by the Archduke Ferdinand holden at Ratisbone, Matthias the Archduke with a great traine following of him, came in the meane time to Presburg, where he was with much joy and triumph receiued; the garriſon ſouldiers in order ſtanding on both ſides the way as he went vnto the Caſtle: Napragius the Biſhop of Rab, with an eloquent Oration welcomming of him, in the preſence of certaine M of the Hungarian Nobility, who had gone out as far as Hainburg to meet him, and now alſo honourably welcommed him, much rejoycing at his comming. The next day the Archbiſhop and Cardinall of Strigonium with a notable traine of Hungarian Gentlemen came to A Presburg: who forthwith receiued into the Caſtle, and hauing ſaluted the Archduke, conferred with him of many things in this aſſembly to be conferred of. In the meane time Illiſhaſchius (that noble Hungarian of whom we haue ſo often ſpoken) arriued there alſo with twelue coaches, ninety harquebuſiers, and forty Hungarian horſemen going before him, and three hundred Haiducks which had attended vpon him, being at the gate diſmiſſed. So the chiefe of the Hungarian States being come, the conſultation was begun the three and twentieth day of Ianuary: where when as the Archduke had propounded vnto the Hungarian Nobility, what things they were eſpecially to conſider of; it was by them anſwered, The Haiducks before their comming out, to haue determined, not one whit to depart from the articles the yeare before propounded and agreed of at Vienna; nor to admit any limitation B at all of them: ſo that for the appeaſing of the tumults of the Haiduckes, there was no need of any new conſultation, but onely to confirme ſuch things as was then and there conſulted and agreed vpon. From which their reſolution when as the Hungarians were not to be remoued, and being grieued with the ſcoffing at of certaine of the Clergy (thereupon refuſing in any wiſe to make their appearance, as they were commanded, before the Cardinall in the ca-ſtle) were about againe to depart; making a ſolemne proteſtation, themſelues to be guiltleſſe of ſuch harmes as ſhould thereof afterwards enſue; it was at length on all parts agreed vpon, That the whole matter ſhould be committed vnto ten choſen out of the Hungarian Counſel-lors, and ten moe of the Counſellors of Auſtria, to be conſulted and determined of. By whom being met all together the eight and twentieth of Ianuary in the houſe of Illiſhaſchius, it was C concluded, That ſeeing that peace and quietneſſe in thoſe countries of Hungary and Auſtria could not otherwiſe be made, that thoſe articles and conditions, concerning which no agreement could the yeare before be made in the treaty at Vienna, being quite left off and neglected, the reſt of the articles which were there agreed vpon, ſhould be ſtill entirely obſerued and kept: and that it ſhould be lawfull for euery man to haue the free exerciſe of his Religion. Which thing the Commiſſioners of Auſtria by a ſpeciall writing there confirmed vnto the Hungarians. Whereby they declared themſelues after long and mature deliberation, to haue perceiued not onely by the true relation and report of the Hungarians, but alſo by their owne experience, vnto how great inconueniences the whole Kingdome of Hungary hath of long beene expoſed, as well for the warres it hath had with the common enemy of the Chri-D ſtians, as for diuers the ciuile tumults and ſeditions therein; and that therefore they not willing that ſuch harmes ſhould in thoſe countries againe encreaſe and grow, to the infinite effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, after the articles of Pacification agreed vpon at Vienna, ſaw no other better remedy for theſe ſo great inconueniences, than that all parties ſhould ſtill hold themſelues contented with the ſame articles of Pacification concluded and agreed vpon in the ſaid aſſembly at Vienna. And that therefore they had decreed, thoſe articles to be ſincerely and inuiolately kept: and promiſed vnto the States of Hungary, to giue their aid for the defence of theſe articles, againſt all their enemies, being ready to giue good reaſon thereof before God, the Church, the Emperour Rodolph, the Archduke Matthias, and his other brethren, and all the Houſe of Auſtria, as the neceſſity of thoſe Countries ſhould ſeeme to E require: hoping alſo that the States of Hungary would reſt themſelues likewiſe in that Pa-cification of Vienna, and the aſſurance thereof, in all points obſeruing the ſame; and that they would alwaies giue their ready helpe and aid vnto the Countries of Auſtria, againſt their enemies in like manner. All which things thus agreed vpon and determined, Letters of Confederation were in the name of Matthias the Archduke, and of all as well the Eccleſiaſticall as Temporall States of Hungary and Auſtria, to this purpoſe written, That whereas for the appeaſing and ſuppreſſing of the tumults and ſeditions which the Haiducks by the inſtigation of the Turks had of late not doubted to raiſe, for the concluding of peace with the Great Sultan; they were met together at Presburg, and therein altogether buſied, to deuiſe how the Kingdome of Hungary, with the Countries adjoyning, might from de-F ſtruction be deliuered, the Chriſtian Religion preſerued, and from waſting and ſpoyling, whereunto they had hitherto beene expoſed, ſaued: Vpon mature deliberation, had as well in the name of them that were preſent, as of them that were abſent, made ſuch a Confederation and League; That if hereafter it ſhould fortune any detriment of Warre to be by any

Commiſſioners appointed for the appeaſing of the new troubles in Hungary.

Letters of Confederation betwixt the States of Auſtria and Hungary, for the maintaining of the Articles of Pacification agreed vpon at Vienna.

any man made or done vnto the Hungarians, or the countries thereabout, for the aforeſaid article of Pacification, which they had determined religiouſly to keep, that they would forthwith with their vnited forces come to aid their confederat brethren, and together with them to liue or die. G

With theſe letters ſigned and ſealed with the hand of the Archduke, and of the Noblemen there preſent, the firſt of February, Illiſhaſchius with George Turſon, were ſent vnto the tumultuous Haiducks (who had now appointed their meſſages to be ſent vnto the Sultan and the Tartar Cham, to craue their aid) to diſſuade them from ſuch their purpoſe, and to perſuade them to quietneſſe; threatening them withall, That if they would not hearken to ſuch honeſt conditions, they ſhould altogether, and at once, be ſet vpon and oppreſſed by the whole power of the States.

The Aſſembly at Presburg thus ended, Matthias the Archduke returning to Vienna, and H forthwith calling together the States of Enſeric, declared vnto them all that was done in the Aſſembly at Presburg. And for as much as that aſſembly was chiefely to that end appointed, That the Kingdome of Hungary ſhould not altogether be pluckt away from the Empire; and that after the reuolt thereof, the greateſt harme to be done by the incurſions and ſpoyling of the enemies, would lie vpon the countries of Auſtria; he aduiſed them ſo to looke vnto themſelues, and carefully to prouinde for the Common-weale, as that hauing mony alwaies in readineſſe to maintaine an army, they might with all conuenient ſpeed go to meet with the Haiducks, if haply they would not conforme themſelues vnto the Articles of Pacification, but againe raiſe new broiles; that ſo they might defend and preſerue their Country from their I outrages.

The Prince of Valachia dieth; whoſe widow notably preſerueth the Country for her ſon.

About the begining of this Spring, when as Ierome Prince of Valachia was dead, leauing behind him a ſonne but thirteene yeares old, the Emperour admitted him, as yet not capable of the gouernment, vnder Tutors, vnto the ſucceſſion of his heritage. Which thing the Valachians being by no meanes willing to endure, and bearing themſelues vpon the helpe of the Turks, went about to make choice of another in ſtead of their Prince of late dead. For which cauſe, the Princeſſe widow by letters certified Polloſcie her ſonne in law, of this outrage and injury of her ſubjects: and hauing obtained of him a great ſumme of mony, and therewith raiſed an army of ten thouſand good ſouldiers, went forth againſt the Valachians, and in open field ouercame them in ſo bloudy and terrible a battell, that hauing ſlaine fiue thouſand of K the Valachians and Turks, ſhe had ouer them a notable victory, and by that manes preſerued the principality of that country for her ſon.

The Duke of Florence in vaine requeſted by the Turks to ſpare their gallies.

The Great Duke of Florence had hitherto done great harme with his fleet vnto the Turks in the Mediterranean ſea: for which cauſe a meſſenger about this time comming vnto him in the Great Sultans name, promiſed him great matters, if he would from thenceforth forbeare to hurt and purſue the Turks Gallies. Which his requeſt ſerued the Turks to no other purpoſe, but as it were to put oyle vnto the fire. For the Duke afterward cauſed new Gallies to be made, and his fleet encreaſed, and therewith did more harme than formerly he had done.

The Haiduckes refuſe to admit of the Pacification made at Vienna.

Now although that after the ending of the Aſſembly at Presburg, Illiſhaſchius and George L Turſon had deliuered vnto the Haiduckes the Articles of the Pacification, and commanded them from thenceforth to keepe themſelues quiet; yet for all that, could they not yet be perſuaded to hearken vnto ſuch their counſell: for that they being men ſtill accuſtomed to the wars, and liuing by their ſwords, could not endure to fall to Husbandry, and ſuch other labours. For which cauſe they of the country about Gymeric, writ vnto them which dwelt in the country about Nuſol, letters to this effect: That foraſmuch as they being diuers times certified of the miſerable eſtate of their neighbours, had refuſed to come to aid them, they ſhould yet now remember how neceſſary a thing it were, with their conjoyned minds and forces to helpe one another; for that the Haiduckes hauing now paſſed the riuer of Teiſe, were broken into that Prouince, and were run as far as Budnoc: neither were they minded ſo M to ſtay, but to rob and ſpoile all the country before them, if they were not with ſpeed encountered. And the rather, for that but a few daies before, they had receiued thirty thouſand Hungarian Duckats from the Turks, whom they now acknowledged for their Lords, with

A horſes and other gifts to be diuided among their leaders and captaines; and moreouer, dayly expected aid from the Tartars, who in great number lay about Belgrade. Wherefore ſeeing it could not be expreſſed, what great harme and loſſe was by the Haiducks done, as well vnto the Noblemen themſelues, as to the common country men; that they ſhould therefore thereof giue their neighbours to vnderſtand, and with all ſpeed to take vp armes againſt the ſame rebellious Haiducks.

Not long after, about the latter end of March, Proclamation was made by the commandement of Matthias the Archduke, throughout all Auſtria, That euery man ſhould prouide himſelfe to take vp armes. The cauſe whereof men diuerſly ſuſpected; howbeit that vnto this Proclamation was this reaſon ioyned, That the Archduke was determined himſelfe to go B about the 14 of Aprill into Morauia, and there to gather together all his power, as well Hungarians, as Auſtrians and Haiducks, for the war he was to take in hand. There were alſo Letters in the Archdukes name ſent vnto the Vaſſals of Auſtria, to giue them to vnderſtand, That whereas they were not ignorant, what, for the obtaining of peace, and defence of theſe countries, had of late beene decreed at Presburg; and that all the States of Enſerie had approued the report thereof receiued from their Deputies, and ſo promiſed their helpe and aid vnto the Archduke, as if that he himſelfe would take in hand any expedition, they would ioyne themſelues vnto him, and together with him to liue or die: yet that there were ſome, which being more deſirous of war than peace, did not only not reſt vpon the former pacification, but gathered an army alſo in the borders of Morauia, with a purpoſe to make an inroad as well in- C to Morauia, as into Auſtria it ſelfe. For which cauſe the States of Morauia were alſo enforced, for defence of themſelues to raiſe an army, and to craue helpe from their neighbors. And that therefore ſeeing the Archduke, mindefull of his promiſe for the common defence of the country, was reſolued to beſtow his life and all his fortunes, and in his owne perſon to vndertake an expedition into thoſe places from whence the greateſt danger was to be feared to fall vpon thoſe countries; neceſſity then required, that the States themſelues alſo ſhould ſuffer nothing to be wanting on their behalfe, but euery one of them together with their ſeruants forthwith to ioyne themſelues vnto the Archduke, and to the vttermoſt of their power to endeuour themſelues to deliuer them and theirs from death and deſtruction. That God, in whoſe name this expedition was by them to be taken in hand, as by the louers of peace, might D ſo in ſhort time make an end of all tumults, and grant vnto thoſe countries wiſhed peace and quietneſſe. And that therefore they were to be admoniſhed, That according to the tenor of the Decree made at Presburg, they with ſuch a number of horſe and foot as they could vpon the ſudden raiſe at a day to be ſhortly after vnto them named, ſhould ioyne themſelues vnto the Archduke, and not to ſuffer any thing to let them in ſo doing. So that if haply any chance or ſickeneſſe ſhould happen vnto their Generall, yet notwithſtanding that they ſhould ſend their power vnder the leading of ſome other man, ſeeing that the Archduke himſelfe ſpared not to aduenture his life and fortunes, and (if God ſhould ſee it ſo good) account it a great gaine euen to loſe the ſame, ſo that thereby he might do his country good.

About the beginning of Aprill, the Cardinall returning from Prague to Vienna, brought E with him the Emperors anſwer and reſolution, viz. That he did ratifie and confirme all things that were done and concluded with the Hungarians and Turks; but that his will was, That the confederation made betwixt the States of Hungary and Auſtria at Presburg, ſhould be void and of none effect. Which the Archduke proteſting that he could by no means like of, or ſuffer to be don, he the 15 of Aprill afterwards with a great number of the Peers, Nobility, and Counſellors, and a multitude of good ſouldiers, going out of Vienna towards the monaſtery of Neoburg, ſet forward vpon his iourny, carrying with him eight and twenty pieces of ordnance, there expecting his ſouldiers in all places leuied: by publike Letters proteſting, That no man ſhould from his army receiue any harme; or if that by chance any harme were done vnto any man by his army, aſſuring his ſubiects it ſhould be againe vnto them reſtored F and recompenſed.

But the rumor of this expedition being brought into Bohemia, the Nobility of the country began to aſſemble themſelues the fifteenth day of Aprill; whither when as many of the Deputies of the other Countries were aſſembled alſo, it being decreed, That the Nobility of the faithfull States there preſent, ſhould with all ſpeed returne home, and ſo prouide themſelues and their ſubjects of neceſſary armes; that, need ſo requiring, they ſhould therewith be able to defend themſelues and their countrey, the aſſembly was diſmiſſed. Beſides that, the Emperor himſelfe carefull for all euents, cauſed many both horſe and foot, to be brought to Prague, and be diuerſly bilited in the Citiſens houſes; and furthermore, the eighteenth of Aprill, by letters directed vnto certaine Princes of the Empire, and to certaine Earles alſo, citiſens, and other vaſſals of the Kingdome of Bohemia, warned them with all ſpeed to ſend aid vnto him at Prague.

But Matthias the Archduke in the meane time marching forward with an army of twenty thouſand horſe and foot, the foure and twentieth day of Aprill came to Zname, a city of Morauia; and was there, by the States of Morauia (who the day before were come thither alſo with foure hundred horſe) honourably receiued and brought into the City. From thence ſending out letters into the territories of Bohemia, and to the city of Prague, he requeſted, That they would ſend out of euery place two deputies for them, vnto the aſſembly to be holden at Zaſlauia, the fourth day of May: promiſing withall, That hee himſelfe there being preſent, would yeeld vnto their deputies a reaſon of his doings, as alſo what he meant to do hereafter. Beſides that, he by letters ſent vnto the Electors and other Princes of the Empire, declared the cauſe why he was enforced to make this expedition: and withall ſending vnto them a copy of the agreement made at Vienna, the fiue and twentieth day of Aprill, in the yeare 1606, by the common conſent of the Archdukes; in moſt friendly manner requeſted them, That they would not intermeddle in this buſineſſe, but rather with their counſell and aid to further the ſame.

But the three and twentieth day of Aprill, the Emperor ſent the Popes Embaſſadors, with the Embaſſadors of diuers other Princes and States, then lying at Prague with ſundry of the Bohemian Miniſters, in Embaſſage to the Archduke Matthias, ſtill lying at Zname: whom the Cardinal the next day after followed alſo, to make ſome good pacification, if it were poſſible, with the Archduke. But the Emperor in the meane time calling vnto him the counſellors of the old and new towne of Prague (contrary to his wonted manner) moſt courteouſly with his owne hand receiued them, and giuing them thanks for the faithfull duties by them hitherto performed; requeſted them, That hereafter they would continue in their like fidelity and loyalty alſo: moſt liberally promiſing vnto them all kindneſſe, with the reſtitution of the priuiledges concerning the ſhutting of the gates of the city: which liberty they had before loſt in the time of the Emperor Ferdinand. And not long after, a generall muſter was taken, not only in the city of Prague, and the townes thereabouts, but alſo throughout all the Kingdome of Bohemia, and three hundred musketiers appointed for the gard and keeping of the caſtle, vnder the command of Count Solmes, who had commiſſion for the raiſing of other ſouldiers alſo.

The Tartar Cham dieth.

At the very ſame time it was from Conſtantinople certainely reported, the Tartar Cham to haue died, and the Turkiſh Sultan hauing receiued newes thereof, to haue diſmiſſed his ſonne, whom he hitherto had detained as a pledge, and with diuers ſhips and gallies, to haue cauſed him to be tranſported ouer the Blacke Sea, vnto the borders of Tartary, there to take poſſeſſion of his fathers kingdome. It was alſo then reported, certaine of the ſeditious Turks making of a road, to haue ſurpriſed Smirna, a rich city of Aſia, and to haue forraged all the country about it farre and neere, and comming vnto Magneſia, a chiefe city of that Country, to haue had ten thouſand crownes by the inhabitants offered, from thenceforth to ſpare the Country thereabouts. The Perſian King alſo at the ſame time notably to proceed in his warres, and to do the Turks great harme, the Turks and Tartars ſeeking in vaine to withſtand him.

In the meane time Embaſſadours comming vnto Prague from the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, part of them the ninth of May, went vnto the Archduke Matthias to Zaſlauia, who ſtill lay there encamped with an army of fiue and twenty thouſand men: of whom they requeſted a truce for the ſpace of eight daies, for the making of a Pacification betwixt the Emperour and him, and for friendly ending of this buſineſſe, eaſily obtained the ſame, eſpecially ſeeing that thoſe Princes Electors, being ioyned and bound vnto the Empe-

A rous in a double confederation, as well for their Electorſhip, as in reſpect of the Kingdome of Bohemia, could not, as they ſaid, otherwiſe do, but ſent preſent aid vnto the Emperor his neceſſity ſo requiring; to which end they had now in readineſſe certaine thouſands of ſouldiers in the frontiers of their countries, to be forthwith ſent vnto him: The other part of theſe Embaſſadors in the meane time ſtaying with the Emperor, where after the German manner they were all prouided of good cheere and wine.

About the ſeuenteenth of May Matthias the Archduke with eighteene thouſand men roſe and marched towards Prague, Collonits with the reſt of his army following him. And although that the Archduke had ſeuerely commanded his ſouldiers to abſtaine from robbing, ſpoyling and burning of the Country, and had diuers times ſeuerely puniſhed ſome offenders B therein by hanging of ſome, and heading of others, yet could he by no meanes ſo reſtraine them, and keepe them in, but that ſome of them would ſometimes be ſtragling abroad, and doing harme, eſpecially the Hungarians, who were ſtill running out euen as far as the Emperors campe, and the new city of Prague. Whom for all that, the Emperours ſouldiers (being then twenty thouſand ſtrong) would not meddle withall, being ſo commanded by the Emperour. Howbeit ſome of theſe ſtraglers going too farre abroad into the country, were by the country men cut off and ſlaine.

The three and twentieth day of May an aſſembly of the States of Bohemia was called at Prague, the Emperour himſelfe being there preſent; Adam Waldſteine carrying the drawne ſword before him. In which aſſembly the Nobility and States of the country with one con- C ſent promiſed to ſpend their goods and liues in the Emperours quarrell; yet in the meane time requeſted theſe things following to be granted and confirmed vnto them: viz. That Religion according to the confeſſion of Bohemia and Auguſta ſhould inuiolately be kept, and that they which profeſſed the one, ſhould not therefore ſcoffe or deſpiſe the other. That Bohemians only ſhould be preferred to Archbiſhopricks, Abbotſhips, and other ſpirituall preferments. That the Archbiſhop ſhould not meddle with ciuill and politicall affaires. That Eccleſiaſticall offices ſhould be permitted vnto the Proteſtant Miniſters, as in former time, the Catholickes in the meane time holding what they had. That the Pontificall diſpenſation in cauſes of Matrimony, according to the Decree of the aſſembly holden in the yeare 1602, ſhould be abrogated and taken away. That it ſhould not be lawfull for Prieſts and other Ec- D cleſiaſticall perſons to buy lands or territories, without the expreſſe conſent of all the three States, but to hold themſelues contented with their tythes and other their reuenues. That it ſhould be lawfull for all men in their own ground and territories to build Churches for Religion on both ſides. That Proteſtants and Patrons of the Vniuerſity of Prague ſhould be ioyned to the Conſiſtory, as they were in the time of the Emperor Ferdinand. That one ſhould be choſen for Burgraue in this aſſembly. That chiefe politicall offices ſhould not be left void aboue a moneth. That vnto theſe politicall offices men of both religions ſhould be admitted: ſo that if the Burgraue were a Catholike, the chiefe judge ſhould be a Proteſtant. That euery man ſhould enjoy his right, and that no Decree ſhould be publiſhed againſt the ſame: neither that they which were of the Order of Knights ſhould be raſhly ſued, or bound to any arreſt. E That one of the Bohemians ſhould alwaies be choſen into the ſecret Counſell, and made acquainted with the Bohemian affaires. That euery man might haue acceſſe vnto the Emperor, and not all things to be done by his Counſellors. That it ſhould be declared to all men, what was to be vnderſtood by the crime of treaſon. That a difference ſhould be made betwixt offences: and that no man ſhould for any light offence, together with his goods, loſe his life and reputation. That the ſuits of widows, orphans, and others alſo, ſhould with expedition be diſpatched, and not from day to day deferred. That from henceforth the father ſhould not be bound to pay the ſons debt, which he was run into without his knowledge; neither yet the ſon himſelfe. That in politicall offices men ſhould not be too much grieued with too heauy exactions. That men ſued ſhould not be ſummoned but in good tearms, and that ſuch as were in F any reputation be bound to any arreſt, without the hearing of their cauſe, and much leſſe to be impriſoned. That the ſword vpon frowardneſſe or madneſſe taken out of the Church of Thine certaine yeres before, ſhould be againe ſet in the former place. That Lawyers which pleaded mens cauſes, ſhould be contented with ſuch fees as were by common Decres appointed them.

And laſt of all to conclude, they in any wiſe requeſted the Emperour, that it would pleaſe him to eaſe the Nobility and States of Bohemia of theſe griefes, before they were compelled to anſwer vnto ſuch things as were to be propounded vnto them on his behalfe. Who eaſily granted vnto moſt of theſe articles, thoſe which concerned Religion only excepted; ſo that the Senators of the old towne of Prague obtained the deſired ſword to be againe forthwith ſet in the wonted place. But as for the buſineſſe of Religion, it was altogether put off and deferred vnto the next aſſembly to be holden at the feaſt of Saint Michael.

About the end of May the Archduke Matthias his Embaſſadors hauing receiued ſafeconduct from the Emperor and the Nobility of the kingdome of Bohemia, came to Prague and being admitted into the councell of the Nobility, Charles Count Tſeratin to whom this charge was giuen, hauing in the Archdukes name firſt ſaluted the Nobility, cauſed what he and the reſt had in charge, to be before them out of a long writing in the Bohemian tongue read: which done, when as, the Nobility ſo requiring, they were put aſide, and almoſt an houre after were called againe, they receiued anſwer, That the points of the Embaſſage by them propounded, were greater and of more weight than that ſufficient deliberation could thereof in ſo ſhort a time be had; and that therefore it was by the Nobility thought meet, that Commiſſioners on both ſides meeting together in the open field neere vnto Debriſe ſhould there conſult of theſe articles, and by the conſent of the Emperor and Archduke to do what they might to end the matter. Vnto which anſwer the Archdukes Embaſſadors conſenting, the ninth of Iune returned againe vnto the campe. The Emperours Embaſſadors within two daies after with forty coaches and an hundred horſe following them vnto the place appointed, who oftentimes going to and fro, at length ſo wrought the matter on both ſides, that the buſineſſe quietly and friendly ended, they were againe made friends.

The articles of which pacification and agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Archduke were the ſeuenteenth day of Iune in the caſtle of Prague openly read in the Bohemian tongue, Lichtenſtein, Kintskie, and other Chiefetaines the Archdukes Embaſſadours, being there preſent, in order thus:

The Articles of pacification betwixt the Emperour and the Archduke Matthias.

That the Emperour refuſed not, but that the Crowne of Hungary ſhould be deliuered into the Archduke Matthias his hands: and to yeeld vnto him the Kingdome of Hungary, and to remit vnto his ſubiects the oath of their allegiance before giuen vnto him, ſo that the Nobility and States of Hungary ſhould chuſe no other King but the Archduke. That in the next Dyet of the Empire, he ſhould propound vnto the States of the Empire to be conſidered of, what contribution they ought to make vnto the Archduke for the defence of their frontiers, if happely longer warre were to be made with the Turke. That hee ſhould cauſe the Writings which concerned that Kingdome of Hungary, within the ſpace of two moneths to be deliuered vnto the Archduke. That he ſhould likewiſe alſo ſurrender vp the Archdukedome of Auſtria, by himſelfe hitherto poſſeſſed, vnto the Archduke: yet ſo, as that the Archduke ſhould take vpon himſelfe all the Emperours debt as well in Hungary as in Auſtria, and within a yeare ſhould cauſe ſufficient Recognizance or Caution ſealed with his owne hand, to be deliuered vnto the Creditors. That he ſhould cauſe all the Letters and Writings, as well concerning the vpper Auſtria, as the neather, within the ſame time to be deliuered vnto him, together with a Copy of the Priuiledges therein, vntill that deliberation might be had concerning them, to be transferred vnto him alſo. That the Nobility and States of Bohemia ſhould in the Emperours name ratifie and confirme the Treaty held at Vienna, for the making of the peace betwixt the Emperour, the Turks, and the Hungarians. That they alſo ſhould not refuſe at the Emperours requeſt, to promiſe vnto the Archduke a certaine ſucceſſion into the Kingdome of Bohemia; but yet with condition, ſo that if it ſhould happen the Emperour to die without heires male, before the death of the Archduke his brother: but if he ſhould haue heires male lawfully begotten and vnder age: that in that caſe he ſhould onely haue the rule and gouernment of the Kingdome of Bohemia, yet with certaine Bohemian Counſellors ioyned vnto him. That the Archduke ſhould by Writing confirme vnto the Nobility and States of Bohemia, That he ſhould after the vſuall manner and faſhion demand the Kingdome of Bohemia, being void of a King. That he ſhould take the vſuall oath of a King, and alwaies haue like regard of all their priuiledges, as the other Kings

A his predeceſſours had. That the States of Bohemia ſhould not gaineſay, but that the Archduke might hereafter vſe the title of the deſigned King of Hungary. That the adminiſtration of the Marquiſet of Morauia ſhould be granted vnto the Archduke Matthias and his heires, together with the title of a Marqueſſe, till that after the death of the Emperor this Prouince was againe to reuert vnto him which was to enioy the kingdome of Bohemia. But if it ſhould happen the Archduke to die before the Emperour, the States of Bohemia ſhould not refuſe, but that this Prouince ſeparate apart, might (as ſhould ſeem good) chuſe vnto it ſelf a Patron and Defendor, vnto the death of the Emperour. That the Biſhopricke of Almits, hitherto in temporalities ſubiect to the King of Bohemia, ſhould from thenceforth acknowledge the Archduke Matthias to be the Gouernour thereof, leſt there ſhould be a confuſion of ſuites in B Morauia, the Biſhop in the meane time hauing regard to his owne priuiledges. That the Emperor at the requeſt of the Archduke ſhould maintain the priuiledges of them of Sileſia, and of the States of the cities, and augment them alſo with new priuiledges, being reaſonable and conuenient. That for the defence of the borders againſt the Turks, the Nobility and States of Bohemia ſhould not contribute more than hitherto they were wont; yet ſauing to the Archduke power and abilitie in the generall meetings and aſſemblies of the Kingdome to intreat thereof, as the Emperor had hitherto had. That the titles of all the Prouinces which the Emperor did now ſurrender vnto the Archduke Matthias, ſhould be ſtill vnto him reſerued. That the Archduke Matthias ſhould vtterly renounce the County of Tirali, and ſurrender his part therof vnto the Emperor. That in the meetings and aſſemblies to come, the Archduke ſhould C by all means endeauour, that the Emperour ſhould receiue a reaſonable yearely contribution out of thoſe Prouinces which he now departed with. That all offences hitherto committed, ſhould generally be forgiuen and pardoned, all and euery the perſons on both parties, onely Verkanious excepted, concerning whom, as alſo concerning his debt, the Nobility of Morauia had vndertaken in their next Aſſembly to take order. And that armes ſhould on both ſides be laid apart.

Which Articles thus agreed vpon, and on both parts accepted of, the Crowne of Hungarie, with the Ornaments thereto belonging, ſuch as are King Stephen his Sword, the golden Apple, with the Croſſe of the Kingdome vpon it, two paire of rich ſhooes, a very antient Robe, with a Royall Scepter, were by the Emperours chiefe Lieutenant carried into the D campe, and there in a broad and open field deliuered vnto the Archduke Matthias: who with his army in order raunged, and ſixteene thouſand horſe and foot diuided into three battalions, after he had receiued theſe Royall ornaments, commanded three great vollies of ſhot to be diſcharged, and afterwards royally feaſted the Emperours Embaſſadour. Which pacification thus made, many out of the Archdukes camp, but eſpecially the Hungarians, went into the City of Prague, there to buy things neceſſary; and many came alſo out of the City to ſee the Archdukes camp. But in the mean time certaine inſolent ſoldiers hauing by night broken vp certaine ſhops of the Iewes, and carried out of them much rich wares, were the cauſe of great ſtirres and tumults in the City; inſomuch, that diuers of the ſouldiers were therefore caſt into priſon.

E The firſt of Iuly King Matthias riſing with his army, departed from before Prague, taking his way with his chiefe Councellors towards Lintz, and diuiding his army into three parts, that ſo they might the more eaſilier paſſe through thoſe countries home. After the riſing of which army, a certaine noble Bohemian and a good ſouldier, called [illegible], vnto whom the Hungarians and Haiduckes had in this expedition done great harme, with ſix hundred harquebuſiers and a number of countreymen went forth to a place called Pancouitſe; where hauing cut off the paſſage, and cut downe trees croſſe the waies, that none might that way conueniently paſſe, hee with ſuch fury in a place of aduantage charged the Hungarians, comming that way, that hauing ſlaine about nine hundred of them, ſome others were alſo carried away priſoners, with a great booty of horſes, waggons, and other goods. F With which deed the Hungarians grieued, trod downe the corne as they went, and began to ſet fire on the villages and houſes in the Countrey thereabouts. But the newes thereof being brought vnto the King, hee forthwith by Herbenſtein, Generall of the horſemen, commanded the Hungarians and Haiducks not onely to deſiſt from this their inſolencie, but themſelues alſo, vpon a great penalty, to help to quench the fires by them raiſed. G

In the mean time the comming of King Matthias being reported at Vienna, great preparation was there made for receiuing of him, and bringing of him into the city according to his royal dignitie: who the 14 of Iuly towards night beeing come thither, with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, and 3000 horſe, the Archbiſhop of Hungary, who with Count Trautſamius and many other of the Emperors counſellors and ſeruants went out of the city to meet him, and there amidſt eight enſignes of German ſoldiers, and 1500 horſemen, as it were ſet in order of battel, receiued him with a long and eloquent oration; as did afterward Trautſamius, in the name of the States of Auſtria; the Emperors Counſellors alſo honorably welcomming him. Which done, mounting again to horſe, the King with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, ſtayed vntil two troups of the horſmen of Vienna, in number about 400, were all entered H into the city; and afterwards 1500 of Bucheims horſemen and the aforeſaid eight enſignes of the Germans going before, and the Emperours Counſellors following them, the King himſelfe with the Archduke his brother and all his train ſet forward; and paſſing ouer the bridge, wheron three triumphal arches were moſt ſumptuouſly erected, he was by 3000 Citiſens of Vienna, gallantly apparelled and armed, with much thundring of the great ordnance & vollies of ſmall ſhot moſt magnificently receiued, diuers other triumphs and ſports, to manifeſt the joy of the people, being there made alſo, which for breuities ſake we paſſe ouer. But being gon a little further, he was by the Senators of Vienna on horſeback receiued vnder a rich canopy, born vp by ſix of the antienteſt of the ſaid Senators, and ſo brought to Saint Stephens Church; whither he was no ſooner come, but that lighting from his horſe, he was there receiued by the I whole Clergy, and vnder a canopie brought into the Church; where after Seruice don, he was with like triumph and magnificence, through diuers other triumphall arches, brought to the Caſtle, the great ordnance on all ſides ſtill thundring off from thence, and from the walls and bulwarks of the town.

But theſe triumphs and ſolemnities ended, ſhortly after when as they began to conſult about ſuch things as concerned the good gouernment of the kingdome of Hungary, and crowning of the King, and that the Proteſtant States of Auſtria in many places began to exerciſe their Religion according to the manner of the Confeſſion of Auguſta, and that the Miniſters began openly to preach in the Churches there, Leopold the Archduke and Biſhop of Paſſavia comming to Vienna, with Melinus the Popes Nuntio (but a little before come to Prague) K with Cardinal Forgatſius and the Biſhop of Vienna, with earneſt and importunate ſoliciting of the King, obtained from him a commandement, That that exerciſe of religion ſhould bee again abrogated, the Churches ſhut, and publique preaching forbidden. Which thing forthwith brought forth new ſtirs and troubles in Auſtria. For the Proteſtant States forthwith calling a Councel among themſelues, by generall conſent refuſed by oath of loyaltie and allegiance to binde themſelues vnto the new King, vntill they had of him obtained the libertie for the free exerciſe of their religion; and combining themſelues together, reſolued euen with the loſſe of their liues and goods to maintain the free preaching of the Word, and exerciſe of their Religion according to the Confeſſion of Auguſta: and to that end commanded all their ſubiects and tenants to be ready in arms, that need ſo requiring, euery thirtieth man, L tenth, or fifth might be preſt to come forth vnto the wars. But hauing ſent a ſupplication to the King whereunto 280 of the nobilitie had ſet their hands, and receiuing no anſwer, but that they ſhould deſiſt from their purpoſe, and without delay to make their appearance to take their oath of allegiance to the King, they forthwith the 14 of September going to Horne, by Letters ſent vnto the reſt of the Roman Catholique States proteſted themſelues to be cleare, before God and the whole world, of all the euils and miſchiefs that were afterward to inſue, if thoſe States not regarding the appeaſing and ending of thoſe troubles, or the ſafety of them their countrymen, ſhould take their oath of allegiance vnto the King. And ſo forthwith raiſing an army, leſt vpon the ſudden they ſhould be at Horn oppreſſed, they began by all means M to prouide for their affairs. But the report thereof comming to the States of Bohemia & Morauia their neighbors, they were by them giuen to vnderſtand, That they would become interceſſors for them vnto the King, and yet not to be wanting vnto them at their need, as occaſion ſhould require.

In

A In the mean time letters were brought from Conſtantinople to Vienna; declaring King Matthias his Embaſſadors hauing audience with the great Sultan, to haue in an eloquent Oration on the Kings behalfe promiſed, religiouſly to keep the peace of late made betweene them. And afterwards in the Kings name to haue offered his preſents vnto the Sultan, and he in the preſence of his chiefe Baſſa's to haue receiued them. But when he came to requeſt the gouernment of Tranſylvania, he would in no wiſe therunto conſent, but gaue the ſame to Gabriel Bathor, with commandment vnto the Baſſa of Buda for the eſtabliſhing of him in this principalitie.

About the beginning of October, the Counties of Trautſame and Furſtenburg were from King Matthias ſent vnto the Proteſtant States at Horne; and ſhortly after them Maximilian B the Archduke followed alſo. Who although they with moſt glorious promiſes ſought to appeaſe them, and by all means to draw them to take the oath of allegiance; yet could they no whit preuail with them, without granting the free exerciſe of their Religion. But the ſixt of October, the Catholique States not expecting the conſent of the Proteſtant States, at Vienna ſwore fealty vnto Matthias the new king of Hungary; the great ordnance in the mean time thundring off, with drums and trumpets in euery place of the City ſounding, and the reſt of the day being with great feaſting, triumph, and ſolemnitie ſpent.

King Matthias hauing thus at Vienna receiued the oath of allegiance of the Catholiques, ſhortly after departing thence, the 22 of October comming to Presburg, was there by the nobility of Hungary receiued and brought into the city with 10000 ſoldiers. Which Eſtates C afterward, viz. the 6 of Nouember, offered in writing vnto the King certaine articles, whereof they deſired to be by him aſſured: moſt of which articles were drawne out of the pacification made at Vienna the 23 of Auguſt, Anno 1606; the chiefe effect wherof was this, That the free exerciſe of Religion ſhould be permitted vnto all men in all the cities and towns of Hungary, not ſo much as that city to be excepted wherein the king ſhould be reſident. That no German captain ſhould be ſuffered in any the ſtrong forts of Hungary, but that the ſtrong townes of Rab, Comora, Vivaria, and others, ſhould be committed vnto the gouernment of naturall Hungarians born: That the crown of Hungary ſhould ſtil be kept in Hungary, and committed to the keeping of Temporall men. That firſt and before all other things a Count Palatine ſhould be choſen. That the king himſelf ſhould alwaies reſide in Hungarie, or if not, that the D Palatine in his abſence ſhould haue ful power, with the Counſellors of eſtate of Hungary, to determine and conclude of all things, and that the King ſhould therewith hold himſelfe contented. That no publique office ſhould be beſtowed vpon any, but vpon ſuch natural Hungarians as had of their country wel deſerued; nor permitted to any for mony. That no Ieſuites ſhould be ſuffered in the kingdom, neither that Eccleſiaſtical men ſhould be ſo much fauoured as formerly they had bin. That officers ſhould not be bound to giue account of the adminiſtration of their offices, but before the Treaſurers of Presburg, being natural Hungarians born. That from henceforth mony ſhould not be carried out of the kingdom, as hitherto it had bin. That the Palatine being dead, the king ſhould within a year keep another, the chiefe Iuſtice in the mean time after the old maner ſupplying his room.

Troubles in Auſtria about matters of religion.

E The Proteſtant States of Auſtria had but a little before ſent their Embaſſadors vnto the Nobilitie and States of Hungary then gathered together at Presburg, with requeſt, That foraſmuch as they could not by any intreaty obtaine of the king the free exerciſe of their religion, as wel within their cities as without, and that very neceſſitie had driuen them by force of arms to ſeek for the ſame, that they would by ſending of them men, afford them ſuch ayd as was vnto them due by the former pacification made at Vienna An. 1606. Which troubles of Auſtria the Nobilitie and States of Hungary deſiring to haue appeaſed, ſent George Turſon and ſome others with letters of interceſſion in their behalfe vnto the Archduke Maximilian: which when they had deliuered vnto him, they receiued from him this anſwer, That K. Matthias neuer thought to diſturb the common quiet of that country, or to attempt any thing F againſt the priuiledges therof, granted by the Emperor Maximilian of happy memory; but to grant vnto the cities the liberty of Religion, he could by no meanes, partly in reſpect of conſcience, partly for the danger that might therof inſue from the Pope and the king of Spaine; and yet neuertheles he would promiſe to ſuffer and tolerate the free exerciſe of religion without the city, and in the beſtowing of publique offices to haue no reſpect of Religion: yet with this condition, That they ſhould lay down armes, ſubmit themſelues vnto the King, acknowledge their fault, and craue pardon for the ſame; for that in ſo doing the States ſhould haply preuail more than by force of arms.

With which anſwer, ſeeing no better could be got, the Hungarian Embaſſadors going to the States of Auſtria, began by diuers reaſons earneſtly to perſuade them to ſubmit themſelues vnto the King. If the Hungarians ſhould (as they ſaid) giue aid vnto them of Auſtria, they ſhould in ſo doing, in ſtead of helping them but do them more harm; for that the Hungarian power could not be brought into Auſtria but to the vtter deſtruction thereof. That the league betwixt the Hungarians and them of Auſtria was a general league, and concerned as well the Catholiques as the Proteſtants. That the Chriſtian religion was neuer with the ſword planted or defended; Chriſt himſelfe ſaying, Them to be happy which therfore ſuffer perſecution; and commanding Peter to put vp his ſword into his ſcabberd. That it was an eaſie matter for euery man to raiſe ſtirs and tumults, but again to appeaſe them was farre more difficult. That by the taking vp of arms the free exerciſe of Religion could not bee furthered or prouided for, it being rather dangerous, leſt the contrary part preuailing it ſhould be vtterly ſuppreſſed. That by this means Hungary it ſelfe ſhould be expoſed to many dangers, for that not only new ſtirs might vpon this occaſion by the ſubiects thereof bee raiſed, but other forrein Princes alſo take vp arms againſt it alſo; the Emperor by force of arms ſeeking for his right, and the Turkiſh Sultan by a new inuaſion going about to bring the ſame vnder his ſubiection. And telling them further, That the Archduke had promiſed to take good order for all things, ſo that they would lay downe armes: and that the clemencie and bounty of theſe Princes being known, they were not to doubt but that they would perform their promiſe: and that the Hungarians could not now doe or attempt any thing againſt the King: but that if it ſhould happen theſe two Archdukes being dead without heirs male, the gouernment of theſe two prouinces ſhould come vnto the Archduke Ferdinand, that then they ſhould haue more cauſe to help them of Auſtria againſt him. Moravia they ſaid to be a free country, and yet the King to haue giuen therunto no more aſſurance for the liberty of religion, more than his bare promiſe. Wherfore ſeeing that both the fortune and chance of war was doubtful, and was not without great expence to be maintained; that they were of opinion, it to be beſt for the Proteſtant States of Auſtria to lay downe armes, and by way of requeſt to ſolicit their cauſe with the King.

Illiſhaſcius is choſen palatine of Hungary.

Mathias crowned King of Hungary.

In the mean time, the griefs wherof the Hungarians complained being taken away, and all controuerſies happily ended, Illiſhaſcius was by a general conſent choſen to be Palatine, and Matthias the 14 of November openly proclaimed King of Hungary, and the 19 of the ſame month in S. Martins church at Presburg in this maner crowned: firſt, the Royal Crowne was in a ſtately chariot caried out of the caſtle vnto the church, with a great number of the counſellors and Nobilitie of Hungary attending the ſame; in which Chariot were alſo caried ten enſignes, with the arms of the kingdom in them friſled vp; four of the Hungarian counſellors taking it out of the chariot, in a little cheſt couered with cloath of gold, and ſo carying it into the Chancel of the church. After which Matthias, together with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, followed on horſeback, both attyred in Hungarian apparel; and ſo going into the Chancel, there ſtayed about halfe an houre, vntill that hee was by two Biſhops brought forth vnto the Altar; before whom ten of the Hungarian Nobilitie caried the tenne aforeſaid Enſignes: after whom followed the Palatine with the Crowne, Endeodius with the royall Scepter, Forgatſie with the Apple of the kingdom, Turſo with King Stephens ſword, Tſechius carying the Pax, as they call it, Budian the Croſſe; the Cardinal Forgatſie ſaying Maſſe, with diuers Biſhops and Prelats helping of him: by whom the King was at the beginning of Seruice anointed with oile: where, while the Epiſtle and Goſpel were in reading, the Cardinal ſet the crown vpon the Kings head; all the people crying out, Long liue Matthias the King of Hungarie. But the King with the crown vpon his head, taking a drawn ſword out of Sigifred Collonitz the Marſhals hand, thrice brandiſhed it acroſſe ouer the Clergy mens heads, and receiued the Sacrament at the Cardinals hand. The Maſſe being ended, he by an highway couered with cloath, going in his royal robes from S. Martins church, vnto the bare-foot friers church, as he went, cauſed mony to be caſt abroad among the people. In which church after the firſt Chapter of the Goſpel of S. Iohn being read, he made 28 Knights. From thence the king with the crown yet on his head, and in his ſtately robes, went out of the city at S. Michaels gate, where on horſeback he was brought vnto an high ſtage couered with cloath, wheron hee was ſworne vnto the Hungarians as their King, and they vnto him as his ſubiects. And afterwards thrice mounting vp to horſe vpon a little hil made for that purpoſe, and ſo downe againe, and thrice brandiſhing his ſword acroſſe, he returned back again into the caſtle, where he and Maximilian the Archduke, Cardinal Forgatſie the Popes Nuntio, and the Palatine ſate down at one table; the reſt of the Hungarian Nobilitie, to the number of 70, ſitting down at ſix other tables, and ſo dining with great mirth; the Haiduks and common ſort of people being there bountifully feaſted alſo. Where many of them in ſcrambling for the money that was caſt abroad, and in taking vp of the cloath from the ſcaffold, hauing their hands and fingers cut off, & ſo lamed, caried from thence the woful remembrance of what was there then don.

The ſolemnitie of this coronation thus paſt, King Matthias thought it good for him yet for a time to ſtay at Presburg, vntil the new building in the caſtle was ended, which the nobility of Hungarie had appointed for the keeping of the Crown of Hungary, to the intent that hee himſelfe might ſee the ſame, with other the royall ornaments put thereinto, and ſealed vp with his own ſeal: he in the mean while labouring to appeaſe great contentions, and to place fit men again in the great offices of the commonweale; for that the Hungarians would by no means ſuffer the Germans to enioy any of the ſame: for which cauſe many of the chiefe officers, men of great authoritie, were diſplaced; and among them Sigiſfrid Collonitz, a man who had much deſerued of the kingdom of Hungary. Howbeit ſhortly after, he by the counſel of Maximilian the Archduke, was by the Hungarians themſelues, repenting them of that they had done, not only reſtored vnto his former offices, but had by them (and that not without his iuſt deſert) euen greater preferments offered him alſo: ſo mutable a thing the iudgment of the Common people is. But Illiſhaſcius now Palatine of Hungary, the 28 of Nouember talking with king Matthias at large, earneſtly intreated him in the behalfe of the proteſtant States of Auſtria, eſpecially for that the other Proteſtant States of Hungary ſeemed now in their behalfe to be much mooued alſo; and the Moravian Embaſſadors openly at the ſame time proteſting, That their States could in no wiſe forſake them their friends the States of Auſtria, if their need ſo required. And albeit that both the Elector of Saxony and other Princes of the Empire, were become earneſt interceſſors alſo, vnto the King for them; yet the Popes Nuntio ſo hardly withſtood them, as nothing could as then be granted.

About the beginning of December the king returning again from Presburg to Vienna, the Proteſtant States of Auſtria about the 16 of December ſent Erneſtus the free Baron of Landau, Maximilian Polheim, Sebaſtian Grabner, Charles Forberger, Pilgram Sitſendorff, and Chriſtopher Buchner, their Embaſſadors vnto the King, to know what they ſhould truſt to. Who the 27 of December receiued anſwer, That they ſhould hold themſelues contented with ſuch anſwer as they had before receiued, and to ſubmit themſelues to the kings pleaſure; or els to doe what they themſelues thought good. With which anſwer they returning, the States forthwith began to leuy new forces, perſuading the ſoldiers, that mindful of their oaths they ſhould truly ſerue whitherſoeuer and againſt whom ſoeuer they were ſent.

And now a great army of the Proteſtant States of Auſtria lay in the villages about Crembſa and Spaine, ſo that thoſe two towns were thought to bee in great danger of them. For the ſtrengthning of which places, Bucheime was by the King ſent thither with 1500 horſe, & certain pieces of great ordnance: and an edict withall publiſhed the 10 of Ianuary, charging the States to be preſent at Vienna the 21 day of the ſame moneth, to take their oath of allegiance to the king. Howbeit they moſt ſtifly ſtil refuſed ſo to do, or to remit any thing of that they had before required. Inſomuch that Maximilian the Archduke, who hitherto had not a little labored in this cauſe, was quite out of hope to bring them to any conformitie, or to make any good end therof. In the mean time certaine of Bucheims horſemen on the kings part, being about to haue taken vp a place, ſuch as they thought conuenient for them to lodge in, had like to haue bin diſappointed of the ſame by the horſemen of Gerrane on the States ſide. About which matter Bucheim comming forth with 7 troups of horſmen, and Gerrane but with three, and three companies of foot, there was betwixt them an hot skirmiſh for the time, fought the thirteenth day of Ianuary; in which an hundred of Bucheims horſemen were ſlaine, but of Gerrane his men not ſo many, they hauing the aduantage of the ground, and ſo therewith in the skirmiſh holpen,both for the defence of themſelues, and the annoying of their enemies. Wherof the King hauing knowledge,and therwith much mooued,beſide the aforeſaid Edict, cauſed another to be proclaimed at Vienna, againſt ſuch ſouldiers as ſerued the proteſtants; proſcribing them all,and denouncing them Rebels,except before the 21 day of Ianuarie,they laying down armes,departed out of the proteſtants Campe. Howbeit the Proteſtant States were ſo far from diſmiſſing their forces,as that they with new ſupplies ſtrengthned the ſame; and hauing taken an hil not far from Hallen[illegible]ynne,and from thence diſcharging three tyre of 20 pieces of great ordnance,ſtrook a great fear and terror into the minds of the kings ſoldiers within the town.

About this time alſo the States of Moravia (that nothing might on their part bee wanting for the making of an attonement betwixt the king and the Proteſtant States of Auſtria) ſent ſome of their Embaſſadors vnto thoſe States at Horn,and other ſome vnto the King at Vienna;who hauing acceſſe vnto the King,declared vnto him, The States of Moravia, from whom they came,to be earneſtly importuned by the proteſtant States of Auſtria,to ſend them ayd, according to the agreement made with them the year before. And told him moreouer, That this maner of his proceeding tended not vnto peace and quietnes, but rather vnto the trouble and deſtruction both of the kingdome and of all the prouinces to him belonging. All that errour,the ground of thoſe troubles,they ſaid to depend vpon a corrupt interpretation or miſconſtruing of words, rather than of the matter it ſelfe; ſo that by men deſirous of peace, it might eaſily be compoſed and ended. And that therfore their requeſt vnto his Majeſty was, That he hauing regard not only vnto the good and welfare of his prouinces and ſubiects,but euen of himſelfe and of his honour alſo, would of his clemencie and goodneſſe vouchſafe to giue remedy vnto the preſent danger, and auert the miſerable calamities now hanging ouer them,and euen ready to fall vpon their heads. The proteſtant States they ſaid to bee content to put the controuerſie to be decided and compoſed by certain graue & wiſe men,to be choſen arbitrators on both parts; yet with this condition, That for 14 daies ſpace no hoſtilitie ſhould on either ſide be vſed. That the inhabitants both aboue and beneath Amiſum ſhould be compriſed within this truce. That ſuch as were kept in durance for religion ſhould bee ſet at libertie: and that all highwaies and paſſages ſhould be from all ambuſhes and other dangers cleared. Vnto which their requeſts the king condeſcending,gaue leaue vnto the States of Moravia,vpon the moſt equall conditions they could deuiſe,to compoſe and end all differences:who ſo laboured in this buſineſſe betwixt the King and the proteſtant States of Auſtria, that at length,*viz.*the twelfth of March,a pacification was made betweene them: Leopold the Archduke,Melinus the Popes Nuntio,the Biſhop of Vienna, and other great men of the contrary religion and faction,ſeeking in vain to hinder the ſame. The chief articles and points in the Pacification were theſe: That the Nobility in their caſtles and towns,as alſo in their houſes in the city,ſhould for themſelues and their people haue the free exerciſe of their religion: That the free exerciſe of preaching might be vſed in three Churches,at Iſerſdorf,Trihelſwincel,and Horn. That the other Churches ſhut vp might again be opened by three of the Romiſh and three of the Reformed religion,and the free exerciſe of Religion in them vſed. That Counſellors and other publique officers ſhould from thenceforth indifferently be choſen of men of both religions; but ſuch Offices as were hereditarie ſhould ſo ſtill remain. That the election of Magiſtrates and other publique Officers in towns and cities, ſhould from thenceforth be made by the Magiſtrates and Citiſens themſelues,and not to be nominated from the Court,as hitherto they had beene. That no Church ſhould bee hereafter ſhut againſt either part,but their own Churches to be left vnto them both,quietly to vſe. That the townſmen and Citiſens in their townes and Cities ſhould from thenceforth haue power to make choice of their miniſters and preachers; and that for them it ſhould be lawfull to viſit the ſicke,and to adminiſter vnto them the Lords ſupper. That the oath of Allegiance ſhould be taken of them of the Reformed religion, in like maner as it had beene before taken of them of the Romiſh,but yet not with the ſame ceremonies of the Romiſh church; all vnitie and confederation with them to be had, to be taken away. That all grudging hatred and quarrell ſhould bee on both ſides forgiuen,and for euer forgotten. Wolfgang of Hoffkirch,Voliſogius,and others, remoued and put from their offices for not taking the oth of allegiance,being again receiued into fauor and reſtored to their places. That it might be lawful for the towns and cities aboue

The troubles in Auſtria pacified.

A A miſum, to haue the free exerciſe of the Reformed religion in their ſuburbs and hoſpitals.

It was not long after this pacification made, but that king Mathias the 17 of May, going to Lintze with 300 horſe, was there with eight troups of horſmen & fifteen companies of foot, by the States ſent forth to meet him, moſt honorably receiued, and by three triumphal arches brought into the city: where he receiued of the States of the religion the oath of obedience; which with much ioy, triumph, and feaſting performed, he the 27 of the ſame moneth againe returned to Vienna. The aforeſaid States of Auſtria in the mean time with great zeal continuing the free exerciſe of their Religion at Horn, a great multitude of people daily reſorting vnto the ſermons there made: they of the Romiſh religion much grieuing and fretting therat.
The King himſelfe alſo being come to Vienna, put diuers of the Romiſh Catholiques out of B their offices, placing others of the Reſormed religion in their rooms, to the great diſcontentment of many.

About this time the Baſſa of Agria, notwithſtanding the peace, had for the ſum of twenty thouſand crowns before hand payd, ſecretly compacted with one Andrew Drake, to haue the ſtrong town of Filek in the vpper Hungary deliuered vnto him. Which the traitor had intended (as he himſelf confeſſed) to haue performed, by ſetting of the houſe wherin he himſelf dwelt, by night on fire: vnto the quenching wherof the gariſon ſoldiers reſorting, his purpoſe was in the mean time to haue ſecretly let in the Turks, and ſo to haue deliuered the town into their hands. But this his ſo wicked a purpoſe in good time diſcouered, and by him confeſſed, he was therfore, as he had wel deſerued, aliue cut into four pieces; a iuſt reward for his ſo C foul intended treaſon. The Baſſa of Buda alſo, contrary to the treaty of peace, about the ſame time went about to haue exacted the oath of allegiance of aboue 400 country villages of the Chriſtians, being not compriſed within the foreſaid treaty. But as the Turks for their part were ſecretly plotting how to incroch vpon the Chriſtians, and to do them harm; ſo the Haiducks on the other ſide in great numbers gathered together in the vpper Hungary, began here and there to moleſt and trouble the Turks, vntil they were by their ſuperiors commanded to deſiſt from ſo doing, for diſturbing of the peace.

Illiſhaſcius dieth.

Now about this time alſo Illiſhaſcius the County Palatine of Hungary died at Vienna; A man much beloued of the Hungarians his countrymen, and now by them no leſſe lamented for. Whoſe dead body was with great honor afterward conueyed from Vienna, vnto his owne D territorie in Hungary, and there with all funeral pomp buried with his Anceſtors. In whoſe ſtead George Turſon was afterward by the general conſent of 158 of the Hungarian Nobilitie choſen County Palatine of Hungary, and ſo with the vniuerſal and ſolemn acclamations of the people ſaluted.

New Troubles for religion in Bohemia.

And now the troubles for religion were ſcarcely wel ended in Auſtria (as is aforeſaid) but that the like, or rather worſe, began forthwith euen for the ſame quarrel to ariſe in Bohemia; the Huſſites (as they call them) moſt earneſtly importuning the Emperor for the free exerciſe of their Religion, or rather for the taking away of certaine grieuances done to their religion: and the Roman Catholiques euen at the ſame time leauing nothing vnattempted, that might ſerue to bring them of the Religion into hatred with the Emperour and others ſitting at the E helm of the gouernment of eſtate; and ſo to fruſtrat whatſoeuer the Emperor had in the general aſſembly of the States the laſt year granted vnto them of the Religion, for the free exerciſe and aduancement therof. The compoſing of which controuerſie (tending vnto the rending in ſunder of the whole kingdom) when as the Emperor had referred vnto certain of his chiefe Counſellors, and they altogether fauoring the Roman Catholiques, would giue them of the Religion no certain anſwer wheron to reſt; they therwith much diſcontented, as out of hope to by them relieued, and in great fear to be by their aduerſaries, as enemies vnto the ſtate oppreſſed, layd their heads together, and after good deliberation taken, What were beſt for them to doe, both for the ſafety of themſelues, their wiues, children, and Religion; they by a generall conſent, of themſelues appointed the fourth of May to hold a generall meeting of F them of the Religion in the new Court at Prague, there to conſult of all matters concerning the buſineſſe of Religion. And yet in the mean time openly in parliament proteſting, by the mouth of Wenceſlaus Bodowitſius a Baron of Bohemia, them to haue appointed this Aſſembly for the Emperors good, and for the common quiet of the whole realme; as alſo for the better informing of the Emperor of all matters, and to prouide that the Emperor and the kingdom G might not through the means and perſuaſions of thoſe his euill Counſellors be brought into extream peril and danger. Immediatly after, the States of the Religion with all ſpeed diſpatched their Embaſſadors vnto King Matthias, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Saxonie, and the Duke of Brunſwick, to requeſt them, by their interceſſion to become mediators for them vnto the Emperor, for the obtaining of the free exerciſe of their religion, which in all points agreed with the Confeſſion of Augusta, and which long before was exhibited vnto Maximilian the Emperor, and by him allowed. Now in the mean time theſe the States of the Religion were by ſome for theſe their proceedings commended; but by other ſome not onely blamed, but alſo accuſed of rebellion againſt the Emperor and the State. But the matter beeing declared vnto the Emperour, he complaining vnto himſelfe of the inconſiderateneſſe of his H Counſellors; to maintain his authoritie, cauſed the Parliament then in hand to be prorogued: and to ſeem of himſelf to grant that which he could not wel withſtand, commanded by a Decree, that ſame very day to be appointed for the concluding of that article of Religion, on which the States themſelues had appointed their aſſembly to be holden in the new Court at Prague. Notwithſtanding which Decree, many troubleſome ſpirits publiquely ſet forth other their conceits in writing, to far other purpoſe; grieuouſly therin reprehending the ſtates of the Religion, for that of themſelues they had appointed a day for their aſſembly into the new Court at Prague: which (as they ſaid) was nothing elſe, but in a rebellious maner to riſe againſt the Lawes of the kingdome, and the authoritie of their lawfull Prince; and therefore aduiſed them to forbear from making any ſuch aſſembly as was by them appointed. Hereof I aroſe great troubles euen vnder the Emperors noſe, in Prague the chief city of Bohemia; they of the Religion not daring to truſt the Roman Catholiques, neither they them: beeing ſtill ready vpon euery falſe report or vain ſurmiſe to go together by the ears; vntill that the Emperor for the ſtaying of theſe troubles, and for the auoiding of further danger, was glad to cauſe it to be openly proclaimed in the new Court at Prague, That his Imperiall Maieſtie hauing receiued and vnderſtood the Apologie of the States, now did abrogate that his Edict publiſhed againſt them but a few daies before; and now by this his new Edict did account all the States of the Religion for his faithfull and welbeloued Subiects, and as of them, vnto whom the right of the kingdom and the Kings oath belonged, as wel as to all the other ſtates of the kingdome. And that hee alſo had thoſe the ſame States excuſed, in that they for the K good of his Majeſty & of the whole kingdom had appointed their Aſſembly in the new court at Prague; and that therefore he denounced them in ſo doing, not to haue don any thing contrary vnto his Majeſty. And that he appointed the 25 day of May for the generall aſſembly of Parliament to be holden in the Caſtle of Prague, for the ending of the Article concerning Religion, and the reforming of other the publique grieuances of the Commonweal. Yet with this prouiſo, That the ſaid States ſhould ſafely and quietly come vnto the parliament, without entertaining of any forrein ſoldiers: as that his Majeſtie ſhould alſo, not by himſelfe nor any other, for pay entertaine any, or ſuffer any forreine ſouldiers to come into the kingdome. Which the Emperors Edict being proclaimed, the States of the Religion hauing made their publique prayers, and ſung certain hymnes and pſalmes vnto the glory of God, for the good L ſucceſſe of their buſines, left the new court at Prague, and returned euery man home to their own houſes, to make themſelues ready to come vnto the Parliament, to be holden at the appointed day.

But the day appointed for the Parliament being come, and the Emperour ſtill delaying the matter, the States of the Religion weary of ſuch long delayes, and in doubt to be therewith deluded, as hauing not receiued from the Emperour any ſuch anſwer as whereon they might reſt; the third of Iune offered vnto the Emperour a ſhort Writing concerning their griefe and further purpoſe, to this effect. They had (as they ſaid) expected, and well hoped, That regard beeing had not onely of ſo many requeſts of ſo great and moſt noble Princes, made in their behalfe, but euen of the Emperour his promiſe alſo, made vnto them, both in the M generall Aſſembly of the States the laſt yeare, and in the late precept of the Emperours alſo, they ſhould at length haue receiued ſuch anſwer vnto their petition, concerning the free exerciſe of their Religion, as wheron they might haue ſafely reſted. Which for that it had not bin

A yet don, they referred the doing therof vnto God and further time, imputing the blame therof not vnto his Imperial Maieſty, but vnto the vnquiet and troubleſome natures of ſome as well the Eccleſiaſtical as Temporall magiſtrats and perſons. But foraſmuch as they meant no longer to be deluded by their enemies, much leſſe to be defrauded of his Maieſties Royal promiſe, which was now vnto the world known; they had thought good to offer and preſent vnto his Maieſty a writing conceiued in the Bohemian tongue, according vnto which they deſired to be ſecured concerning the free exerciſe of their Religion: moſt humbly requeſting his Maieſty to accept of the ſame, and at length to ſatisfie their requeſts. Which if it might not be granted (the Emperours Maieſty hauing more reſpect vnto the troubleſome Clergie men, and ſome other his euill affected Counſellors, than to the faithfull States and ſubiects of B his kingdome) that then they would reſt themſelues vpon the Decree made in the Aſſembly holden in the year 1608, and vpon the laſt Edict of his Maieſty: yet with this ſolemn proteſtation, That ſeeing they had by certain information vnderſtood, much warlike preparation, eſpecially in Bavaria, to be made, and diuers conſultations in many places to be held againſt the States of the Religion (his Imperial Maieſty and other his faithful counſellors knowing nothing therof) which might tend vnto the ruin and deſtruction both of his Maieſty and of the whole kingdom; they themſelues would take vpon them the defence thereof, & do their indeauor, that furniſhed with men and armes, they might to the vtmoſt of their power defend him their Soueraign, together with themſelues and the whole kingdome, againſt the inuaſion of their forrein enemies.

C In the mean time while theſe things were thus in doing, an Embaſſadour came from the Duke of Saxonie to Prague, to intreat the Emperour for the States, and for the granting of them the free exerciſe of their Religion. The Embaſſadors of the States of Sileſia forthwith following of them alſo: who alſo requeſted of the Emperor, to haue the liberty for the free exerciſe of their Religion by him confirmed vnto them, promiſing their moſt ready help & aid vnto the States of Bohemia, if need ſhould ſo require. But the States of Bohemia hauing in vain from day to day expected anſwer from the Emperour, turning themſelues vnto their former reſolution for the defence of themſelues and of their Religion; forthwith raiſed a great number both of horſe and foot; who with their well known Captains and commanders they brought euen vnto the city of Prague. Howbeit at length, viz. the eleuenth day of Iuly, the D Saxon Embaſſadours earneſtly ſoliciting their cauſe, and vrging their requeſt, according to their deſire receiued anſwer from the Emperour, by letters from his Maieſty written to this effect.

He gaue all men (as he ſaid) to vnderſtand, and by theſe his Letters witneſſed to eternall memory, That after that all the free States of his kingdome of Bohemia, which in the receiuing of the Lords Supper participate the body and bloud of our Lord Chriſt Ieſus vnder both kinds, his faithfull ſubiects, had in the Aſſembly holden in the Caſtle at Prague, in the year 1608, in all humilitie requeſted, That it might be lawfull for them to hold, and freely to exerciſe their Religion according to the Confeſſion of Auguſta (as ſome call it) exhibited vnto his father Maximilian the Emperour, of moſt happy memory, and by him to the ſayd E States allowed: and that he then and at that time, by reaſon of other moſt weighty buſines, for which that aſſembly was then called, and ſuch as could ſuffer no procraſtination or delay, had thought it good to defer the allowing and ratifying of this their petition, vnto this preſent aſſembly of Parliament: and that the ſame States now again aſſembled, inceſſantly renewing this their former petition, and hauing therunto ioyned alſo the requeſt and interceſſion of certain noble perſonages, had requeſted to be therein ſatisfied: and that hee and his Counſellors would conſult, how prouiſion might be made for his ſubiects in the kingdome of Bohemia, as wel communicating vnder both kinds as vnder one, now at length to haue effected the ſame. Wherefore ſeeing that his will and deſire was, in theſe and future times peace and quietneſſe might for the increaſing of the Kingdome, be preſerued and kept aF mongſt his ſubiects of all the three Eſtates of the kingdom of Bohemia, communicating as well vnder the one as vnder both kinds: That both parties might freely and without any impediment or let, haue the free exerciſe of their Religion, whereby they were both in hope to obtain euerlaſting ſaluation. And to the intent that accompliſhment and ſatisfaction might in all points be made, as well according to the breaking vp of the Aſſembly of Parliament in G the yeare, 1608, as to the performance of his own precept, of late publiſhed (whereby he hath acknowledged, and euen acknowledgeth, thoſe ſame Eſtates communicating vnder both kinds, and ſubſcribing to this confeſſion, for his faithfull and loyall ſubiects, vnto whom the rights and immunities of the kingdome of Bohemia belonged) he by the common conſent of the Councellors, and other Magiſtrates of the Kingdome, did determine, That his ſubiects communicating both vnder one and both kinds, ſhould friendly and peaceably liue together, without wronging or reuiling of one another; and that vpon the paine and penalty in the law ſet downe, to bee inflicted vpon them that ſhould otherwiſe do. And moreouer, ſeeing that they which communicated but vnder one kinde, enioyed the free exerciſe of their Religion in all points throughout the kingdome of Bohemia, that he gaue leaue and commanded, that they alſo which communicated vnder both kindes, viz. all the States of the Religion, with H all ſuch as embraced the Confeſſion of Bohemia, ſometime exhibited to Maximilian the Emperour his father, in the Parliament holden in the yeare 1575, and now againe to him-ſelfe preſented, ſhould euery where and in all places of the Kingdome, haue the free exer-ciſe of their Religion, without the let or interruption of any; to retaine the ſame, vntill a generall vnion of Religion, and an ending of all diſſention and controuerſies might be made.

Moreouer, That he did grant vnto the States of the Religion this fauour, That they ſhould haue the lower Conſiſtorie at Prague, with power to conforme the ſame according to their owne Confeſſion. That they might lawfully make their Prieſts, as well in the Bohemian as Germane Tongue, and ſet them ouer their Churches, without any let of the Archbiſhop I of Prague. That hee did alſo reſtore vnto them the Vniuerſitie of Prague, which for many yeares agoe belonged vnto the States of the Religion vnder both kindes: giuing them power againe to open the ſame, to furniſh it with graue and learned men of their owne Confeſſion, to beautifie it with good Lawes, and to appoint certaine of their owne companie and profeſſi-on for Gouernours and defendors as well of the Conſiſtorie as of the Vniuerſitie: whom ſo by the ſtates appointed and choſen, he without any ſtay or delay, or other inſtruction or information than they ſhould from the States receiue, would confirme in that their office, and pronounce them for the lawfull Defendors: yet ſo, as that if he being letted by other great buſi-neſſe, cannot performe the ſame within the ſpace of fourteen days, they ſhall neuertheles continue Defendors, and as well enioy the charge of the Office committed vnto them, as if they K had been therein by him confirmed: and that one or other of their number being dead, it ſhall be lawfull for the States to chuſe other in their places. And if that beſide the Churches which they now hold, they would build other moe, or erect more ſchooles for the inſtructing of the youth, it ſhall bee lawfull for them freely and without any let ſo to doe, as well in the Cities as in the Countrey Townes and villages. And foraſmuch as in ſome of the Cities of the Kingdome of Bohemia, men of both Religions did dwell together, he therefore did will and command, That for the preſeruation of peace and quietneſſe, either part freely exerci-ſing their Religion, and obeying their Prieſts, ſhould by no means either hurt or trouble them on the other part; and much leſſe to hinder them to bury their dead in their Churches or Churchyards, with the ringing or tolling of their Bels, or goe about to turne any man from his L Religion, of what ſtate or condition ſoeuer he be, whether hee dwell in the City or in the Countrey Towne or village; or by force to draw them to their opinion, or to take their part.
For that he onely reſpected that peace and quietneſſe might bee kept, and that mutuall loue might ſtill grow amongſt all the three States: Vnto which end and purpoſe, that he for him-ſelfe and his heires, the King of Bohemia his Succeſſors, in the faith and word of a King, did grant and promiſe vnto the States of the Religion, vnto whom this common peace of Religion (as they call it) belongs, as to a principall member of the Empire, all theſe things to be for euer inuiolably kept (the eccleſiaſtical and temporall perſons whatſoeuer reſiſting) ſo that no contrary precept or Edict, ſhould either by himſelf, or any other his heirs or ſucceſſors be publiſhed againſt the States of the religion, or being publiſhed by any, ſhould be accounted effe- M ctuall and ſtrong, eſpecially ſeeing that he by theſe letters, pronounces all the Edicts hitherto publiſhed againſt theſe the ſtates of the religion, to be void, fruſtrate, and of none effect. Neither would that any thing of thoſe which were don by the States of the Religion whilſt they

A ſought for the confirmation of this article concerning Religion ſhould for euer be laid vnto their charge, or by any man by way of reproch obiected vnto them. And that therefore hee ſtreitly charged and commanded all Magiſtrats, and ſuch as bare rule in Bohemia, that they ſhould to the vtmoſt of their power protect & defend al the three States, together with them of the Religion, and neither themſelues to trouble them, nor ſuffer them to be by any others for the exerciſe of their Religion moleſted or troubled: for that hee and other the Kings of Bohemia his ſucceſſors, would moſt ſeuerely chaſtiſe all ſuch as ſhould offend againſt theſe his Maieſties letters (which to be for euer remembred, he would cauſe to be inrolled in the publique Records of Parliament) whether ſuch offenders were eccleſiaſtical or lay men, to be ſharply puniſhed as troublers of the common peace.

B This was the ſum of his Majeſties letter, which he cauſed to bee publiquely ſet vp in the caſtle of Prague the 13 of Iuly, that it might be to all men knowne, this article of Religion, which was the firſt of the articles in this parliament to be concluded and agreed vpon according to the mind of the States of the Religion; and ſo their requeſts to be in all points ſatiſfied. Who forthwith therupon the fifteenth of Iuly cauſed the firſt publique ſermon according to the confeſſion of Auguſta, to be preached in the German tongue in a church of them of the Religion, which had for a long time before bin ſhut vp. At which time they alſo ſent vnto the Elector of Saxonie, to ſend vnto them certain learned men, for the ſetting vp of the Vniuerſitie, and the gouerning of the Conſiſtory at Prague. And yet for all this, the Embaſſadors for the States of Sileſia earneſtly labouring with the Emperor for the liberty of Religion C to be granted to the ſaid States and the reſt of the inhabitants of the prouince, the ſtates of Bohemia refuſed in any wiſe to diſmiſſe their ſoldiers whom they had muſtred neere vnto Roggenſon, vntil the Sileſians were of their requeſt in that point ſatisfied: offring alſo to the Emperor a large label of the ſaid States griefs.

Now it may be ſome hauing read ſo much as is before written concerning theſe late troubles about the free exerciſe of the Reformed Religion, but eſpecially in Bohemia, Auſtria, Morauia, and Sileſia, may deeme the ſame both tedious and beſide our purpoſe. Vnto whom indeed it is not written; but rather vnto ſuch as who together with my ſelfe (the Warres betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks ended, and the peace concluded as is aforeſaid) deſire to know in what ſtate thoſe frontier Countries ſtand, which being the greateſt bulwarks of that D ſide of Chriſtendome, and the chiefe territories of the Houſe of Auſtria, are (the peace being either expired, or otherwiſe broken off) moſt ſubiect vnto the fury of the puiſſant enemy, as neereſt vnto him, and ſo like ſooneſt to feel his great force and power, which prefineth vnto it ſelfe neither bounds nor meaſure, whilſt there is any thing farther to be had. Againſt whom the Chriſtian Emperor had no forces of his owne to oppoſe, more than ſuch as he could raiſe out of the reliques of Hungary, and the aforeſaid frontier Countries; all together but weake helpes againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy, as neuer commeth into the field but with a world of men following him. But yet much weaker, being as now of late they were, euery one of them apart diuided in themſelues about matters of Religion, the incredible maladies of the Chriſtian Eſtates and Commonweales. The heauy and lamentable effect whereof too much of E late appeared in the loſſe of Strigonium, won by the Turks with a farre leſſe army than euer the Grand Seigniors Lieutenant General was wont to come into Hungary: and yet the Chriſtian Emperor by reaſon of the reuolt of the Hungarians, vpon a diſcontentment about the exerciſe of their Religion, not able of himſelfe to relieue the diſtreſſed city of Strigonium, or yet to take the field with an army of any ſtrength, for defence of the reſt of his cities or territories. So weak are euen the greateſt princes, their ſubiects being amongſt themſelues diuided in minds.

But to ſtray further: The Turks Embaſſador in the mean time with a notable traine of an hundred and fifty Turks comming from Vienna the one and twentieth of September, and there hauing ſaluted and with great gifts preſented the King, ſet forward towards Prague, F where he was by the citiſens and certain noblemen of the Emperors counſel, the 12 of October honourably receiued, and the nineteenth of the ſame month admitted vnto the Emperors preſence, firſt preſented to him from the great Sultan his maſter a rich Tent of diuers colors, moſt curiouſly wrought with faire Orient Pearle of great value; and then foure couragious horſes, all furniſhed with moſt rich and ſumptuous furniture. Hee preſented vnto him alſo certain Turkiſh weapons ſet and garniſhed with pretious ſtones; and a princely Turks Robe G ſuch as they vſe at their mariages, gliſtring with gold and pretious ſtones, with diuers other rare things of leſſe value. Together with which he deliuered vnto him the great Sultans letters; and withall deſired the confirmation of the peace before made for twenty yeares, to bee now again renewed.

Vnto which Embaſſadour letters were afterwards deliuered from the Emperour, together with certain other rich preſents to be by him preſented vnto the great Sultan: viz. certaine Caroches lined within with Damaske, and couered without with black veluet; ſix faire and gallant horſes moſt richly furniſhed; a Clocke of wonderfull workmanſhip; two fair Deskes to write vpon of Ebonie: with diuers other like Preſents of no ſmall price. Who ſo H charged with preſents, and bountifully rewarded, and to his good liking anſwered, was afterward in the beginning of Ianuary, with a train of 200 horſe from Prague honourably diſmiſſed.

HERE FOLLOWETH A CONTINVATION OF THIS PRESENT HISTORY (CONTAINING THOSE OCCVRRENTS WHICH HAVE HAPPENED TO THE TVRKISH EMPIRE SINCE THE YEARE OF OVR LORD, 1609, TO THE YEAR 1917, &c.)

By EDWARD GRIMSTON, Sergeant at Armes.

THe Turkiſh Emperour, hauing beene freed ſome yeares from the care of wars in Hungary, in regard that he had concluded a truce for twenty yeares with the Emperor Rodulphus, he now bent all his forces againſt his Rebels in Aſia, and the Sophy of Perſia, where C he had no good ſucceſſe this yeare. For the Perſians hauing formerly extended their Monarchy far into the Turkiſh Empire, and defeated Cicala Baſſa and others in diuers battels; now they entered into the Prouince of Babylon, with a deſigne to joyne it to Perſia. Achmat to ſtay the courſe of their proſperity, ſends a mighty army thither, vnder the command of Naſſut Baſſa; but his fortune was no better than thoſe that went before him. The Perſians came to meet him, gaue him battell, defeated him, and ſlew 20000 of his men. Theſe mournfull newes comming to Court, did much diſtemper the Sultans minde; he could not endure it ſhould be ſaid, that the Perſians had defeated his mighty armies thrice in open battell; and D much leſſe that it ſhould be ſo, and that he ſhould ſeiſe vpon his countries: wherefore to repaire this loſſe, he leuies new forces to be commanded by Cambolat Baſſa of Aleppo, who had bin the moſt powerfull Rebel in Aſia, and was newly reconciled and brought into fauor with the grand Seignior. This man came to the Port to receiue the Sultans commandements, and and to paſſe his army into Aſia: but whether hauing ſome ſuſpition, that he had intelligence with the Perſians, or that ſuch as enuied his greatneſſe, had giuen ſome bad impreſſion of his loyalty to the Sultan; within ſome few daies after his arriuall, Achmat cauſed him to be ſlain by his Capigi. Whereby we may well obſerue, that he that is a Rebell to his Prince, which hath ſo violently oppreſt his ſubjects, and ſet his countries on fire by ſedition, the which he hath bin forced to quench with the bloud of innocents, cannot but end his daies violently and E miſerably, ſeeing that God reuengeth the bloud of innocents vpon the guilty.

The Perſians enter into the Prouince of Babylon.

The Turks defeated.

The Perſian ſeeing what aduantage he had gotten of the Turke, laboured by the bruit of his victories, to draw the Chriſtian Princes vnto his party, and with them wholly to ruine the Othomans; the which he had ſo happily begun. For the effecting whereof he ſent his Embaſſadors to the Emperor being at Prague, to perſwade him to breake the peace with the Turke, and to joine with him. The Embaſſadors arriued at Prague this yeare with rich and rare Preſents: firſt a croſſe of gold inricht with many pretious ſtones; amongſt which there was one piece of amber, whereon was ſeene the figure of the Virgin Mary, holding her young babe in her armes; the which was ſo artificially grauen, as it might be thought the worke of nature: a Topas of exceeding greatneſſe, giuen to the King of Perſia by an Indian King: two kniues of F damaske, with hafts of Jaſper, and their ſheaths couered with diamonds: a certaine kind of Indian wood of moſt excellent vertue, moſt ſoueraigne to cure the paines of the breſt, and to purge the ſtomacke: the gall of a pellican excellent to cure the pluriſie, appoplexie, and feuer: two topazes the one white, and the other violet; this laſt was ſo big, as it was capable to make a cup: an Amathiſt as big as a hens egge; a Perſian bow inlaid with the veines of a camell, Preſents ſent to the Emperor by the Perſian.

camell, and a rough diamond exceeding great; a white ſtone of the colour of water, which was a preſeruatiue againſt the plague, being hung about ones necke; three orientall pearles exceeding big; three rich eſcarbuncles, and three maruellous faire diamonds; and withall this, a ſerpents horne, much eſteemed for the rare vertues. All theſe Preſents were very well accepted, and the Embaſſadors much honoured. But what appearance was there for the Emperor, who had ſo great differences with his brother Matthias King of Hungary, who ſaw the greateſt part of his ſubjects rebelled againſt him, his prouinces in diuiſion, Tranſyluania in combuſtion by the conſpiracy which had bin diſcouered againſt Battori, and finally a generall diſorder ouer all, to breake the peace with the Turke, (who was at his dore, retained only with this bar) and to allie himſelfe with the Perſian ſo far from his countries, from whom he could draw no ſuccors, but only that he might keep the Othoman buſie in Aſia? Thus the Embaſſadors returned, carrying home nothing but good words.

His affairs will not ſuffer him to ioyne with the Perſian.

The troubles which hapned in Bohemia, made him ſee of what importance it was to entertaine peace with the Turke: for if he had broken it by the Perſians perſuaſion, hee had giuen his enemy an aſſured meanes to ruine him: for the Archduke Leopold intred into Bohemia with an army of 9000 foot, and 3000 horſe; he ſurpriſed petty Prague, attempted the old towne, and ſeeking to force it, he ſlew many which made reſiſtance. Matthias King of Hungary aduertiſed of this diſorder, parts from Auſtria with a powerfull army, and aduanceth ſpeedily towards Bohemia. It was to be feared, that if Matthias army and Leopolds had met neer vnto Prague, it had been the loſſe and ouerthrow of the one, and the deſolation and ruine of the country. The Emperor foreſeeing this danger, cauſed 300000 florens to be deliuered to Romeo, Leopolds Lieutenant, for the paiment of his army, and ſo ſent him out of Bohemia. This diuiſion betwixt the Princes of the houſe of Auſtria, grew by the practiſes of ſome of the Emperors Counſell, who being deligated judges to compound the differences of the Bohemians of diuers religions, in ſtead of labouring to reconcile and vnite thoſe people, for the good of the publike, they made themſelues partiſans to the one to oppreſſe the other, and therby they drew the Princes into a dangerous diuiſion, for the ſupport of parties. And moreouer, the Archdukes Ferdinand and Leopold, practiſed to depriue Matthias King of Hungary of the ſucceſſion which he pretended of Bohemia; leſt that being maſter, he ſhould take reuenge vpon their partiſans for the troubles wherewith they had formerly afflicted the country. Such was the eſtate of affaires in Germany, giuing the Turke a faire opportunity, if he ſhould haue embraced ſo rich an occaſion, to make his profit of their combuſtions. But the confirmation of the truce, and the affaires of his houſe kept him in Thrace.

Let vs ſee how the Turke ſpeeds at ſea; where he hath the Knights of Malta, the Sicilians, and Neapolitanes, and the Florentines, vigilant and valiant enemies to annoy him, and croſſe his deſignes. The laſt yeare, which was 1609, the Chriſtians had no good ſucceſſe, loſſe fell particularly vpon the Knights of Malta: for he that fights often can hardly vanquiſh alwaies. The gallion of the Order, commanded by Chiualier Guidoti, an Italian, had made two voyages to ſea very fortunatly, and brought to Malta 300 Turkiſh ſlaues. The encouragement of this good ſucceſſe engaged many Knights to diuers enterpriſes. They armed certain gallions, and made a fleet of ten good ſhips of war, as vnfortunat in their courſes as the gallion of the Order had before beene ſucceſſefull: for meeting with the Turks fleet in the ſeas of Cyprus, they were ſet vpon, and moſt of them ſlaine or made ſlaues. The Knight Freſſinet was ſlaine, and the red gallion wherein he commanded, taken by the Turks; but it was after a whole daies fight. Ambuſon otherwiſe called Fuzillade another Knight, was made a ſlaue, and his gallion taken: the Knight Ouges run the ſame fortune, with the loſſe of a gallion. Freſſinet hauing brought a pinnace with him to attend his ſhip, after ſome fight neere vnto the gallion, it eſcaped by night. In this voiage vnfortunat for them of Malta, the gallion of the Order would needs ſeeke ſome better aduenture: the Knights of Buillon and Rhodes did accompany him either of them with a ſmall gallion. He ſet vpon the carauan of the Turks fleet, neere the Iſland of the Rhodes, his ſucceſſefull beginning of this combat made him hope for victory, and the number of the enemies veſſels for a rich bootye: for there were among the reſt two great gallions of the Sultans; theſe are ſhips which belong to the Great Seigniors women, loden commonly with great riches: but 20 gallies of Rhodes ſeeing this fight, came out of their port to ſuccor them, and by the fauour of a faire wind, drew them into ſafety.

A At Malta the bruit was, That the Turks army conſiſting of fourſcore gallies, ſhould go and beſiege the Iſle of Goza, whereas a Knight called Saint-Liger commanded. Whereupon the Great Maſter had reſolued to fortifie the Caſtle of the Iſland, with a good counterſcarſe, which he cauſed to be made, ſending thither two hundred ſouldiers, and thirty Knights for ſupply, all braue ſouldiers, who might haue made a great reſiſtance, if the Turks had attempted it: but the enemies fleet paſſed on and gaue them time to reſt.

But this yeare 1610, Vignaucourt the Great Maſter of Malta, ſent the fiue gallies of the Order into Barbary, towards the Port Farino, memorable, for that it was the hauen where S. Lewis the French King ended the nauigation of his daies, and at his returne from Ieruſalem and Paleſtine, went to receiue in Heauen the glorious palmes of his holy actions. The gallies of Biſerta B had accuſtomed to fetch palmes there in that ſeaſon (which was in the Spring time) whom the gallies of Malta had a deſigne to ſurpriſe. But the contrary winds, and the tempeſtuous ſeas ouerthrew that enterpriſe; yet their voiage was not altogether vnprofitable; for returning towards Malta, being within the channell, which diuides the Iſland from that of Sicily, they encountered with a great gallion of Tunes, armed by a Turke called Carouſinan, being in view of the gallies of Malta: The Rayſe (who commanded) aſſured his company, and ſmiling, promiſed to free them from their enemies. Being ſo tranſported with vanity, as he ſpake confidently, that he would not feare twenty of the gallies of Malta: but this his pride was ſoone abated with his ruine; for the fiue gallies came cloſe vnder him, and plied him ſo furiouſly with their cannon, as they ſunke him. The gally wherein Verdella an Italian Knight C commanded, had like to haue beene loſt, for being grapled with the gallion, if the diligence of Verdille had not ſpeedily retired it. The Turks after the loſſe of their veſſell, began to ſwim away, but they were all made ſlaues to ſerue in the gallies of Malta, who this yeare had no other fruits of their generous enterpriſes.

The courſe of the Duke of Tuſcany his Gallies.

The gallies of Coſmo de Medicis great Duke of Tuſkany, parted from Ligorne, vnder the conduct of the Commander and Admirall Inghiraim, and running alongſt the coaſt of Barbary, they tooke a Turkiſh ſhip in the ſight of Algier, loaden with merchandiſe, armes, and munition of war, freeing many Chriſtian ſlaues which were in it. This happy beginning promiſed them better fortune. They paſſe on, and ſome twenty fiue leagues beyond Algiers they goe to ſurpriſe the towne of Biſquirre, a ſmall towne in circuit, but ſtrong and well walled.
D Inghirami drawing neere vnto the coaſt, tooke downe his maſts, leſt they ſhould diſcouer his comming. In the meane time he ſent two long boats to find ſome place fit for their landing; the which being carefully obſerued, Colonell Bindy landed his men, and about eleuen a clocke at night marched in good order towards the towne, and forced it. The darkeneſſe of the night kept them from ſpoiling it; being content only to ſet their guards and ſentinels in the moſt important places of the wall: but day being come, the ſouldiers made themſelues maſters of the towne, which they ſacked and ſpoiled. Certaine Moores and Turks, during the obſcurity of the night, had retired themſelues into a Moſque which they fortified: They were ſummoned to yeeld; but the feare of being ſlaues, (which they could not auoid) made them reſolue to die in their owne defence; ſo as the Florentines hauing forced the place, put them all to E ſword; and then embarqued their troups, hauing filled Biſquirre with fire and bloud. The night following, being in the gulph called the Bad woman, they met with a pinnace loaden with corne, the which they tooke, and ſent to Ligorne, and then they put on to encreaſe their conqueſt. Being vpon the coaſt of Sardinia, two Galliots of Biſerta did furniſh them with a faire occaſion. Inghirami ſendeth his gallies to purſue them, who hauing had them in chaſe threeſcore leagues, tooke the one, wherin they had one hundred and twenty ſlaues, and freed many poore Chriſtians from the chaine, who ſuffered the tyranny of the Turkiſh ſeruitude.
They alſo tooke a Turkiſh gally within halfe a league of Algier, and ſpoiled it. And thus triumphing ouer their enemies, they tooke their courſe towards Ligorne, hauing taken foure Turkiſh veſſels, ſpoiled the towne of Biſquerre, and twice braued that of Algier.

The Moriſques or new Chriſtians chaſed out of Spaine.

F This yeare was fatall for the Moriſques or new Chriſtians in Spaine, who being in number nine hundred thouſand perſons, as the originall writes, and had continued there from father to ſon, for the ſpace of almoſt nine hundred yeares, were now in an inſtant baniſhed, and made vagabonds with the blaſt of the Kings mouth.) Men diſcourſed diuerſly hereof: Some ſaid, that the King had reaſon to do it, for that they had ſecret practiſes and intelligences with the Turke his capitall enemy. Others affirmed, that hee did wiſely to preuent their attempts againſt his Eſtate, which were to be feared conſidering their numbers were alſo great. And G ſome ſaid plainely, that it was to haue their lands and inheritances, which had continued ſo long in their races. But the King declared his owne intent by his Edict, the which he publiſhed in theſe termes.

The King of Spaines Edict,

The King: For that reaſon doth in conſcience binde a good and Chriſtian gouernment, to expell out of all Realmes and Common weales thoſe things which breed ſcandall, and bring hurt to our good ſubjects, and danger to the Eſtate, but eſpecially which are offenſiue to God, and prejudiciall to his ſeruice: for this cauſe experience hauing taught vs, That the reſidence of the new Chriſtian Moriſques, and their abode in the Realmes of Granado, Murcia, and Andeloſia, hath beene the cauſe of all theſe inconueniences: for that beſides the manner of H their proceedings, which joyned in the rebellion of Granado, the which began by cruell murthers of all the Prieſts and old Chriſtians which liued amongſt them, calling the Turks in to their aid; yet hauing drawne them out of the ſaid country, and ſuffered them to liue in other Prouinces, ſo as they would repent them of their faults, and liue faithfully and Chriſtian like, according to the precepts and juſt ordinances which were giuen them: They haue not obſerued and kept them according to the ſtrict and direct rules of our Holy Faith: but haue alwaies made ſhew to contemne it, and to haue no feare to offend God; as hath beene ſeene by the great numbers which haue beene puniſhed by the Inquiſition: and beſides, they haue committed many thefts and murthers againſt the old Chriſtians. And not content herewith, they haue conſpired againſt my Royall Crowne and Realmes, ſeeking aid and ſuccors from I the Turke, certaine interpoſed perſons being ſent to that effect, and doing the like with other Princes, promiſing vnto themſelues aid and aſſiſtance, offering vnto them their perſons and meanes. And ſeeing that during ſo many yeares, in which they haue practiſed theſe treaſons and conſpiracies, not any one hath come to reueale them, but they haue alwaies couered, concealed, and denied them; it is a moſt apparant ſigne, that they haue all beene of one minde and will against the ſeruice of God and of me, and againſt the good of this Realme; yet they might haue imitated many Knights of theirs, of generous extraction, who haue don ſeruice to God, to the Kings our progenitors, and to vs, like good Chriſtians, and moſt loyall vaſſals.

Wherefore conſidering all this, and how much I am bound to ſet downe ſome good order, and to procure the preſeruation and increaſe of my Realmes and ſubjects, and deſiring to prouide for all; I haue decreed, with the aduice and counſell of many judicious learned men, and K others, that are very religious, wiſe, and jealous of Gods ſeruice and mine, to chaſe out of the Realmes of Granado, Murcia, and Andeloſia, and out of the towne of Hernache (although it be not within the limits of the ſaid Realmes) all the new Chriſtians Moriſques, both men, women, and children. For when as a great or deteſtable crime is committed in any Colledge or Communalty, it is fit that Colledge or Communalty ſhould be ruined, and that the leſſe with the greater, and one with another, ſhould be puniſhed: And that ſuch as peruert the good and ſincere life of Common-weales, and of their townes and cities, ſhould be baniſhed from other inhabitants, leſt their contagion infect them.

For this cauſe, by vertue of theſe preſents, we ordaine and command, That all the new L Chriſtians Moriſques, without any exception of age or ſex, of thoſe that liue and reſide in the ſaid Realmes, and in the towne of Harnache, except ſuch as be ſlaues, ſhall within the ſpace of thirty daies after the publication hereof, depart out of all our Realmes and Dominions of Spaine, with their wiues, children, ſeruants, and others of their Nation: and that they ſhall not preſume to returne or to make any reſidence in them, in any ſort whatſoeuer. And we forbid them to depart by the Realmes of Valentia, or Aragon, nor to enter into them, nor to ſtay in any of our Realmes or Countries after the time prefixed, vpon paine of death, and confiſcation of all their goods. And we command, that no perſon within our Realmes or Seigniories, of what eſtate, qualities, or condition ſoeuer, ſhall preſume to receiue, conceale, or defend publikely nor ſecretly any Moriſque man or woman, after the ſaid tearme, vpon paine to loſe all M their goods, vaſſals, forts, and lands; and moreouer to loſe all the graces, and benefits which they haue from me, to be applied to my Exchequer.

And though I may juſtly confiſcate all the goods moueable and vnmoueable of the ſaid Moriſques, as belonging to traitours, and guilty of high treaſon; yet vſing clemency, I am content

A content, that during the ſaid terme of thirty daies, they may diſpoſe of their moueable goods, and carry them away, not in gold, ſiluer, jewels, nor letter of exchange, but in merchandiſe which is not prohibited, bought of the naturall ſubjects of this Realme, and not of others: or in the commodities of the ſaid country. And to the end they may during the time of thirty daies diſpoſe thereof, and of their mooueable goods, and employ it in merchandiſe, or in the commodities of the country, and tranſport what they ſhall buy (for as for their lands, that muſt be annexed to my reuenues, to be employed in the ſeruice of God and the commonweale, as I ſhall thinke moſt fit) I declare by theſe Preſents, that I take them into my royall protection, and aſſure them and their goods, That during the ſaid time they may go and come, to ſell, exchange, and alienate all their mooueable goods, and to employ their mony, gold, B ſiluer, and jewels, in merchandiſe not prohibited, or in the commodities of the country, and to tranſport the ſame freely, without any let or interruption, by land or by ſea, paying vſuall cuſtomes; ſo as they carry no gold or ſiluer coyned, or to coyne, nor any other thing prohibited by the lawes of my Realme. Yet we are content, they ſhall carry ſo much money as ſhall be needfull for their paſſage by land, and embarking by ſea: commanding all our officers and louing ſubjects to ſee this preſent Edict duely obſerued. &c. Signed, I the King.

After this publication of the Edict, the tearme of thirty daies was reſtrained to twenty, ſo as the Moriſques were haſtened to depart: and the ſhips and veſſels of what country ſoeuer, were ſtaied in all the Ports of Spaine, to tranſport them whither they would go. Many paſſed from Spaine into Barbary: but during this yeare there came aboue 150000 of theſe Moriſques C into France; the King ſending Commiſſaries, to ſee them well vſed, and orderly tranſported away.

There was a warre fallen out in Barbary betwixt Muley Xequy, King of Fez, and Muley Sidan his younger brother, both Mahometanes; in which warre the younger forced the elder to fly his Country, and to come and craue aid from Philip King of Spaine: But the vnfortunat loſſe of Don Sebaſtian King of Portugall, was a good preſident for the Spaniard not to truſt in barbarous Kings, without good aſſurance: He treated with the Barbarian, and promiſed him ſuccours, with an hundred thouſand Duckats to returne to Alarache, (a place which held for him) where by money or other practiſes, hee ſhould draw vnto him as many ſouldiers as hee could: And that for the ſafety of the ſuccours that he ſhould giue him, hee ſhould put Alarache D or Arrache into his hands. This Arrache is a ſtrong towne in the Realme of Fez, in the Prouince of Algar, ſeated vpon the Ocean, at the mouth of the Riuer of Lucus, whereon part of it is built, and the other part vpon the Ocean: It hath a goodly Port, and hard to take, for that it is defended by a Fort, in the which the Kings of Fez do vſually entertaine a garriſon of three hundred light horſe, and three hundred harquebuſiers: for that the Portugals and Caſtilians hold in a manner all the Sea townes of the Prouinces of Habat, and Erif, where they haue great garriſons. This Prouince is from the Riuer of Nocor along the Mediterranean Sea, vnto the ſtreight of Gibralter, the other is vpon the Ocean from the ſaid ſtreight vnto the riuer Lucus, in the which the King of Spaine holdeth at this day the ſtrong townes of Tanger, Arzilla, and others. According to the former accord, the Barbarian returned to Arrache, with E his mony in one of the King of Spaine his ſhips; to whom in a ſhort time repaired many of his friends and ſeruants. The Spaniard in the meane time hauing prepared a fleet of a great number of gallies and ſhips, and embarqued ten thouſand ſouldiers therein, he gaue the command thereof vnto the Marqueſſe of S. Germaine, who arriued on the twentieth of Nouember in the euening at the Port of Arrache, and there rode at anchor all the night. The next day in the morning, the Marqueſſe called all the Captaines to a Councell, imparting vnto them his deſigne for to force Arrache, in caſe that the Mooriſh King did not keepe his promiſe; they gaue him aſſurance, that they would carry themſelues like vnto braue and valiant ſouldiers.
But ſee what hapned: The King of Fez hauing no meanes to goe from his word, ſeeing the Spaniard ſo ſtrong as he might well force it, many of his followers and people, fearing to fall F vnder the power of Spaine, they would haue abandoned him: but hauing the Gouernour of the caſtle at his deuotion, he thruſt out the garriſon, and deliuered the keies himſelfe vnto the Marqueſſe of S. Germaine. Vpon the firſt bruit that the Spaniards were entred into the caſtle, all the inhabitants ran to armes, and thinking to reſiſt them, after that many of them had ended their daies valiantly, during three houres combat, they were forced to yeeld vnto the Marqueſſe, who preſently planted the croſſe and armes of Caſtile vpon all the Towers and G Steeples. Thus this ſtrong towne which the Caſtilians and Portugals had ſo long deſired, and wheras the inhabitants receiued a great ruine, is in the end falne vnder the domination of their King. The newes of this exploit being brought into Spaine, pleaſed the King much, and the people made bone-fires for joy: theſe are the alterations of times. The Moores in old time were wont to ouerrun Spaine, and now the Spaniards take their pleaſure in Mauritania.

A great battell in Tartary.

About the end of this yeare newes came to Conſtantinople, of the great warres which had been between the Vncle and the Nephew, by the death of the great Cham of the Tartars: the ſon, who during his fathers life time, had continued at Conſtantinople as an hoſtage, and was now ſent backe into his country by the Sultan Achmat, thinking to enjoy his fathers eſtate, his H vncle, brother to the deceaſed Cham, practiſed to ſeize vpon the crowne: but either of them hauing drawne an army of 60000 men together, in the end, they joyned battell, whereas after the ſlaughter of 40000 men vpon the place, the ſonne had the victory, and by that meanes obtained the Crowne of Tartaria.

I will conclude this yeare 1610, with the relation of a particular buſineſſe, to ſhew the greedy deſire of the Turks to get by any vnjuſt meanes whatſoeuer, and their infidelity and falſhod to ſay and ſweare any thing for bribes. Some yeares before, one Maſter Willoughbie an Engliſh Gentleman, hauing rigged vp a ſhip for war into the Leuant, he came into Algier in Barbary to ſell his prize, where at that time one Solyman Catania was Baſſa. This ſhip was ſuddenly ſeiſed on, and rifled by the command of this Baſſa, vpon noother ſubject, but that the I Baſſa pretended this ſhip had burnt a Caramouſall of his, which in truth the Baſſa himſelfe had cauſed to be ſet on fire, that vnder colour thereof he might ſeiſe vpon the ſhip and goods. Maſter Willoughby went to Conſtantinople, and there made his complaint to Sir Henry Lilloe, then Embaſſadour for the Engliſh; but yet could get no ſatisfaction: whereupon he returned into England, and obtained letters from his Majeſty to the Grand Seignior, and to Sir Thomas Glouer, then Embaſſador, reſiding at Conſtantinople: which hauing receiued, he went preſently to the Chimacham (who was Lieutenant to Murath Baſſa the grand Viſier, hee being then imploied in the wars againſt the Perſian.) The Chimacham hauing read theſe letters, would not ſuffer them to be deliuered to the Grand Seignior; promiſing to doe juſtice vpon Solyman Catania, whom he diſcharged from his place, and ſent for him to Conſtantinople; who being K come, and called in queſtion, he denied the fact: Maſter Willoughby (hauing no certaine proofe of his loſſe) ſuborned one Ofiſh Baſſa a Turke, who had beene at Mecha, and was therefore held a very holy man, who ſet a brother of his to procure falſe witneſſes, vpon promiſe to haue the tenth part of what ſhould be recouered: the witneſſes being ready to ſweare to his aſſertion, Solyman Catania hearing their Oath, compounded with Maſter Willoughby, and gaue him foure or fiue thouſand Dollars; ſo the buſineſſe ended. Which ſhews the corruption of the Turks, and that the holieſt of them for mony will not ſticke to beare falſe witneſſe, and take falſe Oathes.

A great Plague in Conſtantinople.

This yeare 1611 the city of Conſtantinople was wonderfully afflicted with the Plague, the which diſperſed it ſelfe ouer all, and crept into the Grand Seigniours Seraglio, whereas L one of his ſonnes died of that infection: whereupon the Grand Seigniour was forced to retire for his ſafety, and to paſſe the remainder of the Summer in his palace or Seraglio of Daut Baſſa, about a league and a halfe diſtant from the city: this violent contagion did forrage in Conſtantinople for the ſpace of fiue moneths, as there were numbred two hundred thouſand perſons dead within the time, and they did commonly carry euery day twelue or fifteene hundred bodies to be buried. The greatneſſe of this mortality is not to be imputed ſo much to the corruption of the aire, as to the wilfull negligence of the Turks, who would not vouchſafe to turne away from a body dead of this diſeaſe, whent it wen to buriall, not to forbeare to viſite their friends being infected. The obſtinate beleefe they haue of Predeſtination maketh them brutiſhly contemne all ſorts of dangers: For ſay they, as ſoone as man comes out M of his mothers wombe to injoy the light of the world, God writes in his forehead all the good or euill ſhall happen vnto him, and particularly of what death he ſhall die, the neceſſity whereof no humane power can auoid. All is gouerned (ſay they) by Deſtiny, and therefore they 200000 perſons died of the Plague.

The Turks obſtinate beleefe touching predeſtination.

regard

A regard not any infection,but contrariwiſe when any one is dead, another takes his cloathes and weares them : which is the cauſe that Conſtantinople and the grand Caire are ſeldome free ; and when as the aire is any thing diſpoſed to contagion,there dies ſuch multitudes of people, as they do not number them but by hundred thouſands, Deth of the French Embaſſador at Conſtantinople.

Before the beginning of this plague, the Baron of Salignac Embaſſadour for the French King at Conſtantinople,ended his Embaſſage with his life. His moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſent the Baron of Mole, eldeſt ſonne to the Baron of Sanſie, to ſupply his place. He arriued at Pera this yeare in the beginning of September, and about the end of October the Sultan being returned to Conſtantinople ; after that he had viſited the Muphti, (who is the chiefe of their Law) the Grand Viſier,the Deftorda, (who is the Sultans high Treaſurer) the Boſtangi B Baſſa his chiefe Gardiner, with other Great men of the Port which were highly in fauour ; in the end he was admitted to audience,and to kiſſe the Sultans hand. A ceremony which in mine opinion I owe vnto the Hiſtory,to ſhew that the Majeſty of the Turkiſh Emperours is ſo great, as to approch neere vnto them, the Embaſſadours of forreine Princes are forced to diſguiſe themſelues, and leauing the habits of their nation, to attire themſelues and their Traine after the Turkiſh manner. Thus the Embaſſador of France parted from his Lodging at Pera,wearing vpon his French apparel a long Turkiſh Robe of cloath of gold curled, furred with Sables : his Gentlemen and Secretaries to the number of ſixteene had the like Robes, but of meaner ſtuffe,wearing caps of blacke Veluet : he had twenty ſeruants in long caſſocks of Skarlet, called in Turkiſh, Ferrages, and vpon them long Robes of the ſame ſtuffe, with C caps of Taffata ; the foure Dragomans or the Kings Interpreters, the Captaines, Maſters of Ships,and other Frenchmen attyred all in long Robes, accompanied the Traine. He paſt the channell which doth ſeparate Pera from Conſtantinople : being come to the other ſide, he found many goodly horſes for him and his Traine, which ſome Turkes that were friends to France,had ſent him to conduct him to the City ; at the gate whereof many Chiaus and Ianizaries attended him to conduct him to the Seraglio : two Chiaus Baſſaes went of either ſide him, accompanying him thither, the reſt of the Turks going before. His arriuall was no leſſe honourable at the Palace Royall, than his comming to the Towne : Two Capigi Baſſaes, or chiefe of the Porters, receiued him at the entry of a great Court, and conducted him to the Grand Viſier,who attended him at dinner in the hal,where he was feaſted,being accompanied D only with one Dragoman or Interpreter : the reſt of his Traine were conducted into a low gallery, whereas dinner was prepared for them after the Turkiſh manner : That is to ſay, a great Tapeſtry vpon the ground without cloath or napkins, and ſome diſhes thinne ſet. The meat was water gruell with ſugar,and ſome pottage with pullets : there were two men either of them holding a certain inſtrument of ſodden leather, in which there was a beuerage which they call Cerbet, made of the juyce of Lymmons, water, and ſugar, and withall they held a cup of blancht copper,giuing to euery one drinke, and going among the diſhes to ſerue them more commodiouſly. From this feaſt, diſtaſtefull to them that had liued after the French faſhion, they paſt into another gallery, whereas the Embaſſadour and ſixteene of his company receiued each of them a Robe of Tinſell, the which hauing put on vpon their other, E they were conducted through a little court paued with marble, towards the Grand Seigniours chamber, which was enricht on the one ſide with many pillars of marble, and ſquare ſtones of the ſame ſtuffe,and beautified with two little fountaines on either ſide : The Chamber within was about ten paces ſquare,the planchard was gilt,the wals enameled with floures after the Turkiſh manner, and the floore couered with Tapeſtry of gold and ſilke. At the entry of this Imperiall chamber ſtood ſix Capigi or Porters, whereof two of them tooke the Embaſſador vnder the armes, and led him to kiſſe the Sultans hand, or rather his Robe ; for hauing ſaluted him from the greateſt of Chriſtian Kings, hee kiſt but his Robe, and then was led on the one ſide, going backewards, to the end he ſhould not turne his backe to the Emperour.
The French Gentlemen were conducted after the like manner to kiſſe his Robe. But F they could hardly ſee the Sultan, for his face was turned towards a window that was grated, before the which, during the ceremony there paſt thirty Capigi, euery one carrying a piece of the Preſents which the Embaſſador had brought : during the which, the Frenchmen could not ſee him but on the other ſide. This ſalutation being ended, the Embaſſador made a ſhort Troubles in Tranſyluania.

This paſt at Conſtantinople, wheras the Sultan did willingly ſee an Embaſſador his Ally, whom he honoured aboue all others. But in Tranſyluania the affaires went after another ſtraine; the combuſtions which ſeemed inſeparable to this miſerable Prouince, made it ſtill the Theater of all diſorders. Gabriel Battori, who gouerned it ſince the ſucceſſion of Ragotzi, had put himſelfe into the Turks protection, againſt King Matthias, who pretended a title, by reaſon of the Seſſion made by Prince Sigiſmund vnto the Emperour, as King of Hungary, and had recouered Hermſtad, and chaſed Raduille Vayuod of Valachia out of his countrey; where hauing ſettled a new Gouernour, and filled the garriſons with Haiduckes, he returned toward Tranſyluania, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt Fortgatſie King Matthias his Lieutenant, who came with troups out of high Hungary, and paſt the riuer of Tibiſce. The Vayuod Raduille had retyred himſelfe into Moldauia to Prince Conſtantine, whom he gaue to vnderſtand, That Battory had an intent to ſeiſe vpon his country, and to make but one Monarchy of their three Prouinces: whereupon they joyned their forces together, and in the end of Iune entered into Valachia, from whence they expelled Battori his Lieutenant with all the garriſons. This exploit made them to hope of a continuance in the proſperity of their armes; they entered into Tranſyluania, whereas they purſued Battori with ſuch dilligence, as they forced him to come to a battell neere vnto Cromſtat, the which he loſt with part of his troups, being conſtrained to ſaue himſelfe with his horſemen in Hermſtad, whereas ſome of the chiefe inhabitants ſeeing him receiue this diſgrace, attempted to ſubmit themſelues vnder the obedience of King Matthias: but the practiſe being diſcouered by him, hee did ſuch execution, as hee purchaſed to himſelfe the name of Cruell.

In the meane time Fortgatſie Lieutenant to King Mathias, maketh vſe of this defeat to ſeiſe vpon Tranſyluania; hee made an Accord with Andrew Nage (who had drawne high Hungary into rebellion, and cauſed the Haiduckes to reuolt) ſo as being freed from that feare, hee entered into Tranſyluania; where hauing taken ſome Townes and Caſtles, hee layed ſiege to Clauſenburg, the which he battered ſo furiouſly, as the garriſons and inhabitants ſeeing themſelues ready to bee forced, yeelded, and tooke the Oath of Allegiance to King Matthias the fiue and twentieth of Iuly. But as theſe proſperities of Forigatſie were humane, ſo did they not long continue. Battori being ſhut vp in Hermſtad, conjures all his friends to come vnto him, and entreated the Baſſaes of Buda and Temeſware to ſuccour him, according to the commandement which they had receiued from the Grand Seigniour: hee practiſed with Nage (a man which did ſwimme continually in the floats of inconſtancy) and makes him to reuolt againe in high Hungary, vpon a ſurmiſe, That Fortgatſie had not kept promiſe with him; ſo as Nage tooke armes againe, ſeiſed vpon the fort of Bayens, and filled all high Hungary with combuſtions; ſo as Fortgatſie could expect no ſuccours at his need from thence: then hauing receiued ſome forces from the Turks and Tartarians, he went to field, purſuing Fortgatſie with ſuch heat and fury, as he forced him to abandon all that he had taken in Tranſyluania, and to retyre into Valachia. What deſolation did this warre bring vnto theſe Prouinces by ſo many priſes and repriſes? Battori going with a thouſand horſe to ſurpriſe Tocai, vpon the frontiers of Valachia, whereas they then held a great faire, he found the garriſon ſo watchfull vpon their guard, as hauing loſt part of his horſemen, he was forced to returne into Tranſyluania.

On the other ſide, Fortgatſie with his Hungarians, thinking from Valachia to recouer high Hungary by the Countrey of the Zeclerians, could not effect his deſigne: for Battori being aduertiſed thereof, ſtopped his paſſage; and in like manner the Earles of Bucheime and Dampier had paſſed the riuer of Tibiſce to meet him: ſo as Battori ſet ſuch guards in all the paſſages and ſtreights, that Fortgatſie was forced to retyre towards Polonia by the ſteep mountains, and deſart places, wheras his army was ſo oppreſt with famine and all other neceſſities, as they periſhed miſerably, there remaining few aliue; with the which he ended his paſſage into Polonia, and from thence ſoone after hee returned into Hungary, but with a very poore Equipage.

Thus the ſtorme ceaſing in Tranſyluania by the reſtraint of Fortgatſie, a more violent tempeſt Troubles in Moldauia.

A tempeſt riſeth in Moldauia, to the end that theſe vnfortunate Regions ſhould neuer be without ſome touch of miſery: for the Turke hauing vnderſtood, That Conſtantine Prince of that country had relieued the Valachian againſt Battori his allye, or rather his Tributary, he ſends a new Prince into Moldauia, the ſuppoſed ſonne of one Thomas, or Aaron as ſome write, who had in former time commanded there, and with him fifteene hundred ſouldiers, with Letters of command to the Turks and Tartarians thereabouts, to aſſiſt him with their forces. This new Prince was ſometime in France, and afterwards detained priſoner in the Fort of Iaques in Spaine, within the Pyrenean mountaines. Thus two Princes contend for Moldauia, the one ſupported by the Polonian, and the other by the Turke. But behold, a third Prince commeth in and pretends a title, being ſonne to one Ianicolo who had commanded there. This B man had beene a priſoner in the blacke tower at Conſtantinople, to which he was committed by the Sultan Amurath, for that he had loſt a battell in the yeare 1601, againſt Michael, who then poſſeſt Moldauia; who eſcaping from thence, wandred through diuers countries, and at laſt comming into England, his Majeſty of Great Brittaine pittying his miſerable eſtate, recommended him by his Letters to Sir Thomas Glouer his Majeſties Embaſſador, then reſiding at Conſtantinople, with commandement to aſſiſt him, and to ſolicite his reſtitution with the Grand Seigniour. Vpon the receipt of which Letters, he retyred this wandering Prince into his houſe at Pera, where he entertained him, with many of his friends and followers which repaired vnto him, for a long time; and in the meane time he ſolicited the Grand Seigniour for his reſtitution, hauing good acceſſe vnto him, by reaſon that he ſpake the C Turkiſh tongue perfectly, and needed no Dragoman, or Interpreter. To whom the Sultan ſtill gaue good anſwers, but with delaies, that it was not yet time; but he ſhould haue ſatisfaction. His Competitor (who was in poſſeſſion of Moldauia) hearing of this practiſe, made friends at the Great Turks Court, and corrupted ſome of the Baſſaes by bribes, (they being all by nature very couetous) to the end they might croſſe his deſigne, and make him away if it were poſſible: and among the reſt he had won Murath Baſſa the grand Viſier, a man of great power and authority, who practiſed many means to get the Moldauian into his hands. Firſt, he ſent word vnto the Embaſſadour, That the Sultan hauing a meaning to reſtore him, deſired to ſee the man, if he were capable of the place or no: but being aduertiſed of their intent, and well acquainted with their practiſes, he refuſed to ſend him. After which, he wrote vnto him, That D it was the Grand Seigniors pleaſure he ſhould ſend the Moldauian vnto him, that he might confer with him. To whom the Embaſſador made anſwer, That vnleſſe he might ſee a Warrant vnder the Grand Seigniors own hand, he would not deliuer him. Murath Baſſa ſeeing that none of theſe practiſes could preuaile, reſolued to fetch him out by force. For the effecting whereof he drew together two thouſand Ianizaries. The Embaſſadour hearing of his intent, fortified his houſe, and armed his people with the Moldauians which were with their Prince, meaning to ſtand vpon his defence. Murath Baſſa deſirous to know what the Embaſſador did in his Lodging, diſguiſed a Ianizary like vnto a Greekiſh Sheepheard; who entering into the Embaſſadors houſe, found them all in armes: then returning vnto the Baſſa, he told him that he had to do with a mad man, and if he proceeded in his enterpriſe, he would hazard the E loſſe of many Ianizaries: whereupon he gaue it ouer. After which, the Embaſſador being called home into England, the Moldauian deſpairing of reſtitution from the Turkiſh Sultan, he turned Turke; and being preſented to the Grand Seignior, was made Bey of Burſia in Aſia: the which he enjoyed not long; for Naſſuf comming from the Perſian wars, diſcharged him. Thus Moldauia hauing many pretented Souereignes, ſuffered many miſeries, and was a prey to Turke, Tartarians, and Polonians, all partiſans to theſe Souereignes.

The voiage of the Gallions of Florence, against the Turks.

Theſe were the troubles which the Turks cauſed at land for the ruine of the Chriſtians. But behold what he ſuffered at ſea by the gallies of Florence, Malta, and Naples; the Florentines made their enterpriſe apart. The Great Duke of Tuſcany being aduertiſed, That the Carauan which tranſported the tribute of Ægypt to Conſtantinople, prepared to put to ſea, he F reſolued to diuert this tribute, and by the valour of his armes to bring it to Ligorne: and for the effecting hereof, he ſpeedily armed foure gallions, vnder the command of Beauregard a Frenchman, who was Admirall. The firſt was called the new gallion, in which the ſaid Admirall went: the ſecond, the great Ligorne, commanded by Brandequedor, Generall at land, and allied to the Duke; and the other two were commanded by two French Captaines. Beauregard ha- G uing receiued commandement, to paſſe with this fleet into the Leuant, to meet with the Carauan, he bent his courſe towards Candy, a fertile Iſland inhabited by the Græcians: Being arriued in the Port of Caliſmene to water, he continued there ſix daies. Leauing this Iſland, he ſailed towards Cyprus, which is held by the Turks, and ſo coaſting Siria, they learned of a ſhip of Marſeilles, that the Carauan was yet in the Port of Alexandria, where they prepared for their voyage to Conſtantinople. To attend them the Admirall Beauregard went and caſt anchor at the fort of Sidon, called Sarepta, gouerned by Emir, or Armil Facardin, a Rebell to the Turke, and a great friend to the Florentines, where he ſtaied twelue daies, to take in Bisket, fleſh, and other neceſſary refreſhings. And hauing made a more ſtrickt league of friendſhip with Facardin, he honoured him with a coffer full of arms, wherby the Florentines ſhips came H as freely into thoſe parts, as into their owne country.

The Florentines meet with the Turks fleet.

Beauregard hauing well victualled and munitioned his gallions, hee returned towards the Iſle of Cyprus, wheras he found a Chriſtians ſhip called the flying Dragon, which came from Damietta, by whom he was aſſured that the Turks army, conſiſting of a great number of gal-lies, was gone out of the Port of Rhodes, and had taken a Flemiſh ſhip. Theſe newes made him thinke that he ſhould meet the fleet, and that he muſt of force defend himſelfe. Wherefore he made all things ready, and preſcribed the order which his Captaines ſhould hold during the fight; cauſing his ordnance to be mounted as if they were to joyne. He had foure as good gallions, and as well furniſhed, as any were in the Leuant ſeas, either of them being armed with 40 pieces of ordnance, and 400 good ſouldiers. Betwixt the Iſland of Cyprus and I Caramania they encountered this Turkiſh fleet, conſiſting of forty gallies and two galliaſſes, vnder the command of Baſſa Muſtapha Grego, who was Generall of this fleet, which was in ſight of the Florentines ſhips: the galliaſſes aduance to take view of them, and to find how far their cannon would reach; and in the meane time the gallies put themſelues into the forme of a Croiſant, ready for the combat. Beauregard an old ſea Captaine, and well practiſed in ſea fights, would not make a ſhot againſt the gallies, but attended vntill the whole fleet came cloſe vp to him; which being neere, he ſaluted them ſo furiouſly with his cannon, giuing them the broad ſides, as the Turks (who expected no ſuch reception) were all amazed, and making a ſtand, would proceed no further. Their Generall hauing well obſerued the reſolute countenance of the Florentines, diuided his gallies into two ſquadrons; giuing charge to the one to K giue an aſſault to the Florentines gallions; and in the mean time the reſt ſhould prepare themſelues to fight.

Fiue Turkiſh gallies ſunke.

The Turks put to flight.

Being thus diuided, they came one after another to the aſſault, the which continued for the ſpace of ſix houres, and yet could not boord them; Muſtapha ſeeing fiue of his gallies ſunke by the enemies cannon, with the loſſe of all the men that were within them. But ſuddenly the wind changed, and proued fauorable to the Florentines, who embraced this aduantage, giuing chaſe to the Turks gallies, forcing them to ſeeke their ſafety in the hauen of Famaguſta, the chiefe fort of Cyprus; ſo of aſſailants (being beaten) they became run-awaies: ſo inconſtant are the accidents of war; and eſpecially at ſea, whereas the good or bad ſucceſſe many times dependeth of a little winde. L

The Florentines take a rich ſhip of the Turks.

This Turkiſh fleet, hauing loſt fiue gallies, and recouered a Port in Cyprus, the Admirall Beauregard ſeeing his deſigne againſt the Carauan diſappointed, he reſolued to return towards Ligorne with his gallions: being at ſea, he encountred a Turkiſh veſſell called a Caramouſall, which came from Rhodes, to goe vnto Cyprus: they chaſed it, and in the end ouertooke it; which they preſt ſo with their ordnance, as they ſlew 130 Turks, and tooke 300 ſlaues. The booty was very rich, being valued at 140000 crownes. After this prize, their victuals beginning to faile, hauing beene ſo long at ſea, they bent their courſe for Ligorne: but the winde falling contrary, they were forced to ſtay eight daies in the Iſland of Scarpante, paſt the bar of Meſſina, and hauing giuen chaſe to certaine gallies of Tunes, they arriued at Ligorne the fifteenth of Iune, where there was great ioy for their returne, and the prize which they had M brought, the which according to the cuſtome was to be diuided; one third to the ſoldiers and mariners, and the other two parts imploied for the entertainment of the ſhips, and the pai-ment of the Captaines.

A This Carauan which goes from Ægypt to Conſtantinople, is euery yeare attended for, not only by the gallions and gallies of Florence, but by thoſe of Malta and Naples, and by all the Pyrats of the Mediterranean ſea: like vnto the Engliſh and Hollanders, who yearely lay in wait for the Indian fleet before the concluſion of the peace and truce with the Spaniards. And although their principall deſigne was to take ſome part of the Carauan, yet they had other enterpriſes vpon the Turks Countrey, beſides the ſpoile of merchants which they met by chance, which many times payed the charge of their voiage; and ſomtimes, they that thought to take, were taken, and loſt both their ſhips and liues.

The gallies of Malta, commanded by the Bailiſe of Venouge, and thoſe of Naples by the Marquis of Saint Croix, joyned together ſoone after, with a deſigne to ſet vpon the Carauan B which carried the reuenue and tribute of Ægypt to Conſtantinople, or els to put in execution the enterpriſe which they had long before projected, vpon certaine places of Albania, or to ſurpriſe or ſpoile ſome Iſland in the Archipelague which might pay their charges. But the firſt failing, they met with a Venetian ſhip laden with merchandiſe, to the value of 100000 crownes. The Spaniards who commanded in the gallies of Naples ſeiſed vpon this ſhip, but the Generall of Malta would by no meanes conſent vnto it, nor ſuffer any of the merchandiſe to be put into his gallies, for that he would not vnjuſtly violate the friendſhip which was betwixt his Order and the State of Venice. This example did touch the Spaniards conſciences, ſo as within few daies they ſent away the Venetian ſhip, but in courteſie they had vnloden all the merchandiſe.

C After this prey of a Chriſtian ſhip, the fleet diſcouered two ſailes at ſea, ſending preſently after them, they were two barks, the one comming from Candy loaden with wood, and the other from Scarpante charged with wine, the which being brought vnto the Generals, gaue them to vnderſtand, that the Carauan of Ægypt was not yet paſt, being aduertiſed that fifty Chriſtians gallies attended them in their paſſage. Vpon this aduice, the Chriſtian Generals being out of hope to ſurpriſe the Carauan, preſently reſolued to vndertake a more great and glorious enterpriſe, and to ſurpriſe the Iſland and caſtle of Lango in the Archipelague, vpon the coaſt of Natolia, and about ſeuen of the clocke at night they ſet ſaile with a good winde, but being changed in the morning, they were forced to return to the Iſland of Porcherne: from whence they parted againe at eight or the clocke at night, and continuing their courſe, in the D morning they diſcouered three Florentine ſhips, who told them, that they had entred into the Iſle of Nigropont with ſeuen gallies; but hauing beene diſcouered, they could not effect any thing; and that their gallies were ſeparated from them in the chaſe of foure galliots. The Chriſtian fleet continuing their courſe, they arriued about eleuen of the clock in the morning at S. Iean de Seruaë, where hauing caſt anchor, there was a Councell called in the Admirall: where they reſolued to petard the caſtle of Lango, toward the ſea: for the execution whereof they ſhould land 200 men; viz. thirty Knights and fifty ſouldiers out of the gallies of Malta, and 120 Spaniards out of the gallies of Naples, and that they ſhould carry two petards with them, the one giuen in charge to Captain Beaulaigue in the troupe of them of Malta, and the other was conducted by the Spaniards; the reſt of their men which they ſhould land, E ſhould go and aſſault the towne of Lango. With this reſolution they parted from S. Iean de Seruaë, with a good winde, and arriued at the Iſland of Lango on the ſixt of Iune, an houre after midnight, whereas they landed three miles from the towne: they that were appointed for the enterpriſe, marcht on with their petards, according to direction; but the night being very darke, the troupe of Malta ſtraied from their guide, but their valour brought them directly to the walls of the Towne; where after many turnings and windings to finde a fit place to plant the petard, (notwithſtanding they were diſcouered and much ſhot at) Beaulaigue ſet it to a Port next the ſea, well flanckt with the Caſtle, the which he forced, and his men entering with fury, went from ſtreet to ſtreet, and put all to the ſword that made reſiſtance. The Spaniards on the other ſide made another breach with their petard, and entered the F Towne; notwithſtanding that at their firſt approch, the Turks (hauing diſcouered them) played vpon them with their great ordnance and ſmall ſhot. The troups being joyned together, hauing cut all the Turks in pieces they met with, they came to the place before the Caſtle, which they thought to ſurpriſe: but the bridge was drawne, and they lay open at the mercy of their ſhot; ſo as there were fifteene Knights of Malta hurt, one ſlaine, with a Spaniſh Captaine, and ſome ſix and thirty ſouldiers of the gallies of Naples, and as many wounded.

Day being come, the Bailiſe of Venouge Generall of the gallies of Malta, came vnto the town G with the foreward, wherein were 150 Knights, and 450 ſouldiers: the Marquis of S. Croix followed him with the two ſonnes of the Viceroy of Naples, and 1500 Spaniards, who ſpoiled the towne and ſuburbs, and tooke all that were liuing captiue: but the Caſtle being well fortified they found it impoſſible to force; whereupon embarking their men and ſpoile, they reſolued in their return to Malta and Naples, to make an enterpriſe vpon ſome towns of Albania: but vpon the way they were aduertiſed, That the Turks had diſcouered the intelligence which the Spaniards and Knights of Malta had with the Grecians of the country; whereupon they tooke reuenge vpon them, putting many of them to death, and amongſt others a Patriarch, who being accuſed to haue practiſed the Chriſtians reuolt againſt the Turks, was cruelly H fleied aliue, and his skin ſent to Conſtantinople. So dangerous a thing it is to ſeeke for liberty with this Mahometane nation.

The Carauan of Ægypt arriues at Conſtantinople.

The Carauan of Ægypt was ſtill in the port of Alexandria attending a paſſage, and to be freed from ſo many Chriſtian gallies which lay in wait for it; and it ſtaied the longer by reaſon of the great plague wherewith Conſtantinople was afflicted. But in the end of October, Mechmet Baſſa of Caire (who would conduct it in perſon) hauing a conuoy of fifty gallies well armed, put to ſea, and arriued at Conſtantinople without any encounter. At his landing, this Baſſa cauſed to march before him 60 mules, euery one laden with 20000 ſequins in kind, being a whole yeares tribute of the Kingdome of Ægypt, the which he cauſed to be carried to the Sultans Serail. This mony was welcome to the Port: for the former wars both in Hungary, I Tranſyluania, in Aſia againſt the Rebels, and in Perſia, had ſo waſted the Emperours treaſure, as it would hardly entertaine one of his armies. The Baſſa who had gathered this tribute together faithfully and with great diligence, was at his comming to the Sultans Port honored with the charge of Baſſa of the ſea, (he who had it before, being aduanced to the dignity of Viſier) and moreouer the Sultan promiſed him his daughter in marriage, being but three yeres old.

Newes came to the Port, that certaine ſhips, gallies, and galliaſſes of the Chriſtians, to the number of fifty, came neere vnto the Helleſpont; which put the Turks in great feare; and complaints being brought vnto the grand Seignior, That certain Caramouſals had bin taken by the Chiſtian gallies; he ſent preſently for the captain Baſſa or Admirall of the ſea, demanding K of him, Whether the report of theſe loſſes were true or no? To whom he anſwered, Yes.
Why are not you then at ſea, ſaith he? He anſwered, For that I can get neither men nor money.
Whereupon the Deſtardar or Treaſurer was ſent for, who had loſt his head, had not the Aga of the Grand Seigniors women entreated for him.

Graſſehoppers at Conſtantinople ſpoile the Country.

This Summer Conſtantinople and the Countries thereabouts was ſo plagued with ſuch clouds of graſſehoppers, as they did ſhadow the very Sunne beames, and fell vpon the City and country round about. The Turks conſulted with their Wiſe men, what it might portend: Who anſwered, That they did foreſhew great plenty to follow. But indeed they left not a greene hearbe nor a leafe in all the Countrey adioyning, nor in the city, where they entered into their very chambers, and annoyed them much, beeing almoſt as big as dormice, L with red wings. And ſoone after there fell ſuch extraordinary great haile in Conſtantinople and Gallata, with ſuch abundance of raine, as the violence of the water did ſuddenly ſhut vp one of the gates of the city, and ſo rebounding filled their ſhops and houſes, that very many were in great danger of drowning. Some houſes fell downe, and ſome people were ſlaine; the pauements of the ſtreets were torne vp, and the ſtones carried together into great

We haue formerly made relation of the Perſians victories, and of the defeat and death of Cicala Generall of the Turks army, in the yeare 1605. And that the yeare following, the Sophy hauing recouered whatſoeuer the Turks had taken from his Predeceſſors, had extended the bounds of the Empire vnto the blacke ſea, from whence he ſent an Embaſſadour vnto M the Grand Seignior, to let him vnderſtand, that hauing recouered what had beene vniuſtly vſurped from him, he would proceed no further, but deſired to liue in peace; the which might now be the better aſſured, the one holding nothing from the other. Moreouer, this Perſian Embaſſadour hauing remained ſeuen moneths at the Sultans Port, was in the end forced to

A retire into Perſia without audience. And laſtly, That Amurath Serder the grand Viſier was afterwards forced to conuert his arms againſt Gambolat and the rebels of Aſia, and to neglect the war in Perſia.

A Perſian Embaſſador comes to Conſtantinople.

Notwithſtanding the Perſian war, there arriued this yeare at Conſtantinople an Embaſſador from Perſia, who according to the Turks maner was attended on by a great troup of Chaoux on horſebacke, Capigies, Ianizaries, and other Captaines, ſent by the Sultan to conduct him to his lodging. Within few daies after his arriual, there was a great ſhew made in Conſtantinople by the ſeuerall trades of the city, euery one marching by themſelues before the grand Seigniors Serail, and repreſenting vnto him their maner of marching in the warres, and the order of their prouiſion, ſome carying on their ſhoulders ſheep, others lambs, calues, beef, B &c. All which was don in policie, to daunt and diſ-hearten the Perſian Embaſſadour, and to encourage their own people; and withall to let him know, that there ſhould be as great plenty in their campes, as he ſaw at that preſent. And to abuſe him ſtill with the imagination of their great preparation, the Chimacham or Viſiers Lieutenant ſent the next day for this Perſian Embaſſador, and during their conference had taken order, that the Emperor of Tartaries brother (who was then in the Sultans Court) ſhould come in: at whoſe entrance the Chimacham aroſe from his place, ſaying, O, I know for what you are come, it is for mony for your ſoldiers; you ſhall receiue it at ſuch a place. Which words were heard by a Dragoman to the Engliſh Embaſſador, then preſent: which was don to terrifie the Perſian Embaſſador; and the ſame time and to the like end they ſent ouer diuers troups of ſoldiers to Scudaret, as if they had been ready C to march with an army.

The Turks great armies are not raiſed in haſt, neither do they march in poſt; when as the Spahi, which make the greateſt part of his army, and haue no other pay or entertainment than the reuenues of certain land, are diſcharged, they muſt haue a whole year to recouer their reuenue, and to put themſelues in equipage; and moreouer, it is threeſcore daies march for an army, from Conſtantinople into Perſia.

Alſo in the years 1609 and 1610, the Turks had not attempted any thing againſt the Perſian, who ſtil ſolicited him for peace. The greatnes of the Othoman empire could not reſolue to make a peace, hauing receiued ſo great defeats; they would giue it but as victors, not as vanquiſhed. But this year Achmat reſolued to ſend a puiſſant Army of aboue 150000 men, D againſt this antient enemy of his Houſe, vnder the command of Amurath Serder his grand Viſier: but before the army entered into Perſia, it was without a commander, by the death of Serder, in the end of Iuly; ſo as they were forced to ſtay and attend the Sultans pleaſure from Conſtantinople.

It was ſuſpected he was poiſoned by Naſſuf Baſſa, one that ſtood out in rebellion againſt the grand Seignior, and yet he had many friends in the Turks army. Wherfore to preuent all mutinies, and conſequently the ouerthrow of the whole army, Amurath Baſſa in his ſickneſſe aduiſed the grand Seignior (by letters which he ſent vnto him) to make Naſſuf Generall of the whole army, and ſo by faire meanes to draw him home, and then to diſpoſe of him at his pleaſure. The Sultan with the great Baſſa's at Court approued wel of this aduice, and choſe E him grand Viſier, and General of the Army. Who hauing receiued the Seal and authority, did forthwith put many of Amuraths friends to death, and with their mony paid all the ſouldiers, which wanted pay, whereof ſome had beene without fiue yeares before. Hee alſo ſent vnto the Grand Seignior threeſcore and ten mules loden with money of Amurath his Treaſure, and threeſcore with goods; all which the Sultan gaue to Amurath his Wife and children.

It is ſtrange to reade, how the Grand Seignior doth tyranniſe ouer his ſubiects, and how ſeuerely he doth puniſh the leaſt omiſſion in any of his officers: for I find it obſerued, that the ſeuenth of Ianuary in the end of this year 1611, the grand Seignior being abroad in the ſnow, and not wel prouided for of fuel, he cauſed Stambol Aga who had that charge, to be ſtript naked, F and ſet in the ſnow four or fiue hours. Indeed this winter was very rigorous, and there fel aboundance of ſnow throughout all Turky, with great ſtormes: many houſes were beaten downe; and amongſt others, the French Conſull of Aleppo was ſlain with the fall of his own houſe.

Naſſuf marching with his army to the frontiers of Perſia, committed ſuch ſpoils, as the Sophy was conſtrained to draw all his forces together to preuent the ruine of his country, being G then about the midſt of Auguſt. But when they were come to a battell, the Perſian finding himſelfe too weak for him, offred conditions of peace, and promiſed to giue the Turk a quantitie of ſilk which ſhould make the charge of 200 camels, for a yearly tribute, in acknowledgment of ſome Countries which he had conquered from the Othomans. Theſe offers were accepted at Conſtantinople: but there was added, That the Perſians ſon ſhould be called Baſſa of Tauris; and that the Magiſtrat or Iudge of that city, called the Cady, ſhould be ſent from Conſtantinople. We ſhall ſee in the following year the effects of theſe propoſitions, by the Embaſſador of Perſia, whom Naſſuf ſhall bring to Conſtantinople: in the meane time let vs return to the Mediterranian ſea, take a ſuruey of the valiant exploits of the Knights of H Malta againſt the Turks.

On the 26 of April, a Turk hauing lent a good ſum of mony to a Chriſtian, to be paid at a certain day; he came before the appointed day with another Turk, and willed the Chriſtian to pay the mony to that other Turk when the day came. Which the Chriſtian promiſed to doe, and performed it accordingly; but the Turk denied the receit therof: wherupon he to whom the mony was properly due came and demanded it. To whom the Chriſtian anſwered, That he had paid it to that party to whom he had aſſigned it. Wherunto the Turk replied, That if it were ſo he were ſatisfied; but yet the other Turk denied it. Wherupon the matter was examined before the Iudge, and the Turk who had receiued the mony, taking an oath to the contrary, the Chriſtian according to the Turkiſh juſtice was inforced to pay the mony again: the I which he did; but withal prayd God to ſhew ſome publique ſigne which of them had don the wrong. And therupon the Turk going forth to repair home to his own houſe, ſel downe dead in the ſtreet.

The Great Maſter Vignancourt continuing his generous deſignes againſt the Turke, had an enterpriſe againſt Navarrin, a place importing this common enemy of Chriſtians: for execution wherof he ſent the fiue gallies of his Order vnder the charge of Vaqueras, great commander of the Order, and chief of the nation of Prouence. They came within ſome miles of the ſhore, but found their landing very difficult, for that they had bin diſcouered by one of the caſtles of Navarrin, which had giuen the alarm vnto the whole country, ſo as they were forced to paſſe on to ſome more eaſie conqueſt, to the end their voyage might not proue vnprofitable: K wherfore they ſailed into the Archipelague, and came neere to the coaſt of Morea, tenne legues from Corinth, where in the night they landed 800 men vnder the conduct of the commander Cremeaux General at land. This troup marched towards Corinth, and an houre before day were at the town gates to force them. Some of the Turks took armes, but their weake reſiſtance could not ſtay the Knights from entring with their troups: they ſackt the town, and hauing taken what ſpoile was portable, they caried away with them 500 ſlaues. After this triumph, the Chriſtians made a happy retreit, & in good order, notwithſtanding al the attempts of the Turks horſe and foot, who were drawn together in great numbers, making 10000 ſouldiers, for the country is very populous; in view of whom they imbarqued their ſpoil & ſlaues. Herby it appears, that this was one of the moſt deſperat enterpriſes that hath bin of long time L ſeen. For to attempt a place ſo far from their retreit, in ſo populous a country, which vpon the leaſt alarm may draw together ſo ſtrong a power; and to make their retreit with ſo ſmall a number, againſt ſuch great troups as purſued them: doubtleſſe wee muſt confeſſe, that as they ſhewed great valor, & had good fortune, ſo they vndertook a very dangerous enterpriſe. Thus the Knights of Malta vanquiſhed; whom we might tearm the maſters of the Mediterranean ſea, if the reuenues of their Order would ſuffer them to ſet forth ſhipping and forces equal to their valor.

But to follow the variable courſe of the hiſtory, let vs obſerue the different occupations of Chriſtians. At Prague the Germanes entertained themſelues with the conſideration of a Crowne, which appeared in the firmament ouer that City about the middeſt of the moneth M October, giuing a very great light; and about it Armies of men fighting, as if it were who ſhould haue it. At that time the Emperour Rodulphus was vpon the Weſt, or declining of his dayes; and Matthias who ſucceeded him in the Empire, then King of Hungary, was vpon

A of the ſun riſing of his triumphs. Many expounded this heauenly apparition as a preſage of happineſſe and good fortune to Matthias; he enioyed the crowne of Hungary already, and by deſignation that of Bohemia; and now they did prognoſticate vnto him that of the Romans. Doubtleſſe men which aſpire after great fortunes do rather adore the Sunne riſing than ſetting; and mans life when it declines taſtes of the lees. The flouriſhing glory of Matthias, his age, and his actions in the Warres, did adde nothing to the authoritie of other men in the country, but did mightily ſettle his owne. Three Sunnes which were ſeene in the firmament ouer Vienna the chiefe city in Auſtria, confirmed the Germans more in this their hope, that he ſhould haue the third Crowne of the Romans. This laſt apparition hapned the yeare following.

B About the end of the yeare, ſome of the Engliſh Embaſſadours men entring into quarrell with certain Iamoglans of the next Serail, from words they fell to blowes. During which tumult one of the embaſſadors men threw a ſtone, and ſmote a Iamoglan on the forehead, wherof he died within few houres after. The Aga of the Serail complained herof vnto the Viſier, who preſently ſent the Subbaſſa of Galata to make inquiry of the fact. The Embaſſador went himſelfe to the Serail, and ſent for his men which had bin in the quarrell, willing the Turks to deſigne the party which had thrown the ſtone. Who all with a ſhout ran vpon one Simon Dibbins, a man that was newly come from Candy, where he had ſerued in the Venetian garriſons, and was now entertained into the Embaſſadors ſeruice. This Simon was not he that threw the ſtone; notwithſtanding the Turks would none but him, on him they laid hands and dragged C him away. The Embaſſador interpoſing himſelfe, and offering to pledge for him, was thruſt away by them, his men beaten, and one of his pages wounded. Wherupon he complained to the grand Viſier, but preuailed little; for to priſon they dragged this Simon, and there kept him a whole month; neither could he be releaſed, albeit the Engliſh nation offered great ſums to ranſom his life; for the Turkes would needs haue bloud for bloud. The day of execution being appointed, the Embaſſador ſent his Chapleine to the priſon where this Simon was, to prepare him for death: vnto whom (examining him how he had formerly liued) he confeſſed, that in England ſome few years before he had killed a man; for which fact he fled thence into Candy; from whence he came to Conſtantinople, where he was to ſuffer for that which hee did not: the iuſt iudgement of God purſuing him to the ſhedding of his bloud in D Conſtantinople among the Turks vndeſeruedly, for the bloud which he ſhed in England wilfully. He was hanged at the Embaſſadors gates: his head and heels the next night were ſtoln away by the Turks, as it was thought, to vſe in ſome kind of Sorcery; the other parts of his body they had leaue to take down and bury.

1612. This year 1612, they did celebrate at Conſtantinople a double nuptial feaſt; for the mariages of the Baſſa Mehemet, ſonne to the deceaſed Cicala, with the Sultans ſiſter; and the Baſſa Mechmet Admirall at ſea, he whom we haue ſeen lately return from Egypt, and bring to Conſtantinople the reuenues of that rich kingdom, with the eldeſt daughter of his Emperor. For the feaſts of yong Cicala the Spahi made courſes on horſeback with battle-axes and barres, in the open place neer vnto the Serail; where they made diuers fire-works of very great charge, E but of ſmall inuention; and they gaue preſents to aboue 20000 perſons, beſides the charge of the banqueting ſtuffe, which amounted to aboue 20000 crowns. The pomp was double; for the Sultans women celebrated that day with the greateſt ladies of the Port; & the men apart in other places did celebrate it in like manner. But the magnificence of the marriage of the Baſſa Admiral at ſea with Achmats eldeſt daughter had far more luſtre at the port. The ceremonie was performed the 30 of Iune, twenty daies after the other; and the order of this great pomp, as wel as ſome other which we haue deſcribed in this hiſtory, requireth a particular relation.

The day before the conſummation of the marriage, they ſent the brides moueables and iewels, from the Serail to the bridegroomes lodging, in this order and ſtate following. Firſt, F there marched fiue hundred Ianizaries on foot, beeing followed with the grand Prouoſt of Conſtantinople, and the general Surueyor, both on horſebacke, and attyred in cloth of gold; the Aga or Colonel of the Ianizaries very proudly adorned, and inuironed with ſome Ianizaries, marched alone on horſebacke: after theſe, two hundred men of qualitie well mounted, and richly attyred, followed with a ſlow pace. The laſt which marcht in this pompe or ceremonie, were the Taliſmans, Centons, Emirs, and other miniſters of Mahomets Clergy. And preſently after followed the Baſſa Achmat, Deftarda or Treaſurer, who conducted the moueables, as choſen by the Sultan to be Godfather or Sagois to the Bride, beeing inuironed with twelue footmen attyred in long robes of gold. After him followed the moueables, apparell, and jewels, which made the brides truſſe, hauing in the head excellent muſicke after the Turkiſh maner, of hoboies and kettle-drums on horſeback.

Theſe moueables conſiſted of 27 preſents; the firſt was a little hat al of gold, couered with pretious ſtones, and pantofles or womens ſhooes after the Turkiſh faſhion of pure gold, iniched with Turquoiſes and Rubies; a booke of Mahomets Law, the couer whereof was of maſſie gold all ſet with diamonds; many bracelets and other rare deuices for women of pure gold, with many pretious ſtones; a little coffer a cubit long and halfe as broad, all of rock chryſtal, hauing the corners of gold, in which were to be ſeen great diamonds and huge pearles, to the value of 80000 pounds ſterling. After this pretious coffer were caried many ſmocks imbroidred with gold and pearle, and head-bands for the forhead, with many robes of cloth of gold. All this was diſtributed into 27 preſents, as we ſaid, and caried with great pompe by 27 men on foot.

After theſe preſents followed 11 Caroches full of yong maidens, ſlaues to ſerue the bride: theſe Caroches were couered and ſhut, and either of them attended by two eunuchs Moores. After theſe followed 28 virgins ſlaues, attyred in cloth of gold, and accompanied by 28 black Eunuchs, al on horſeback and richly clad. After which were ſeen 240 mules loden with tents of tapeſtry, cloath of gold, ſattin, veluet, with the ground of gold, with many cuſhions which are the chairs the Ladies of Turky vſe; with many other rich and ſumptuous mouables. Such was the truſſe which this yong princeſſe brought to her ſpouſes houſe. Doubtleſſe this equipage was ſtately, and did wel become the pompe and greatnes of the Othoman houſe, from the which ſhe deſcended, the mightieſt and richeſt of all the royal houſes of Europe, yea of the whole world.

The mariage day being come, the bride was conducted to her husbands lodging with no leſſe pomp and ſtate than her moueables. The Ianizaries marched firſt, as they had formerly don, being followed by the grand Prouoſt, the Surueyor their Aga, and many other Officers of the Port. The Emirs (who are deſcended from Mahomet, and alone carry greene turbants) marched after to the number of 80. This name of Emir is as much to ſay as Lord: they which wear them anſwer not, and obey none but their Chiefe, called Mirabachi; and their voyce in judgment ſtands for two. They were followed by the Taliſmans or Prieſts of Mahomets Law, and by a great number which ſtudy it, and aſpire vnto the office of Cadies or Iudges, of Cadileſquiers or Mufti. The Viſiers or ſupream Iudges of the Turks eſtate, who iudge of all affairs in councel, came after with the grand Viſier, who is Lieutenant Generall to the Turkiſh Sultan thorowout his whole empire, and keeps the ſeals of the empire: he had on his left hand (which is the moſt honourable rank in Turky) the grand Mufti or ſupreame Biſhop of their Law. The muſick followed after on horſeback, conſiſting of thirty men with drums and hoboies, being followed by eight Egyptians which caried Biſcan tabors, and did a thouſand Apiſh tricks. Theſe were followed by forty muſitians marching two and two, ſome playing on citerns, others on harps, and ſome on lutes after the Turkiſh maner. A foole, held for a Saint among them, being mufled with a cap and a cloak couered with mutton bones, danced & ſung with theſe inſtruments: 50 of the chief officers of the Arſenall marcht after him, and 30 men with hammers and other iron inſtruments, to break down whatſoeuer aduanced too far in the ſtreets, & might hinder the free paſſage of two trees of an immenſe height, laden with diuers ſorts of fruits all of wax, carried by many men, and ſupported from the top and the midſt with ropes. After theſe trees came 20 officers belonging to Achmat Baſſa the high treaſurer, godfather to the bride; and he himſelf alone richly attyred and proudly mounted. After whom came two great torches light, carried by many ſlaues, and then a third torch of a wonderfull bignes, all couered with plats of gold, and ſhining more with pretious ſtones than the flame that burnt. The Raiſſer Aga with fifty of the Princeſſes officers followed theſe lights, and after them was caried a great canopie of crimſon Veluet, and after it another greater, couered with plates of gold, whoſe curtaines being ſhut on all ſides hung down to the ground. Vnder this canopy was the princeſſe on horſeback, with ſome of her blacke eunuchs, her caroch followed couered with cloth of gold,and drawn by foure great white horſes, wonderfull beautifull. Then followed eight other caroches, in which were a great number of the brides maids, with many Negroes gelt; and finally, 25 virgins ſlaues,choſen amongſt the faireſt,all on horſbacke, hauing their haire confuſedly hanging vpon their ſhoulders. Such was the pompe of this marriage:but many times the nuptiall feaſt is intermixt with funerall mourning.For not many daies after, the Sultans ſecond daughter, promiſed to Naſſuf Baſſa, was carried to her graue without any pompe or honour: for the Turks make no great eſteeme of women.

The day after the marriage,the Grand Seignior did cruelly beat his Sultana, the mother of this daughter, whom he had married to the Captain Baſſa; he ſtabbed her with his handjarre or dagger through the cheeke, and trod her vnder his feet. The reaſon was, becauſe ſhee had ſtrangled a fauorit of his, which was one of his ſiſters ſlaues, whom the Grand Seigniour hauing ſeene,and being enamored with her,ſent for her. The Sultana hearing thereof,cauſed her to be brought to her lodging, where ſhee ſtript her of her apparrell, ſtrangled her, and put her clothes vpon one of her owne ſlaues,whom ſhe ſent to the Sultan in ſtead of the other,and at her returne ſtrangled her alſo; as ſhee had done many others when they once appeared to bee with childe by the Grand Seigniour.

A great plague at Constantinople.

The plague beginning furiouſly to ſpoile the City of Conſtantinople,the Sultan was forced to return to his country palace,called the Serail of Darut Baſſa,to auoid the danger of this violent contagion: the which makes mee thinke,that the Turkiſh Emperours for their owne profit diſpenſe with ſome articles of their faith; for as we haue ſaid before, The Turks are ſo obſtinatly tied to the beleefe of Predeſtination, as they will not vouchſafe to turne from a peſtiferous body, when it is carried to the graue, and much leſſe forbeare to viſit his friends, being ſick of the plague, for that(ſay they) if we muſt needs die of this contagion,it is in vain to flie it,for it will find vs whereſoeuer;if not,our health ſhall neuer be impaired, although we conuerſe with thoſe that are ſicke of this diſeaſe.But their Sultans know well how to flie the danger; yea and to cauſe them to be led vnder the arms that come to kiſſe his hand, leſt they ſhould offer him ſome violence. Thus we ſee the defect of falſe religions,when as we ſee this marke of vniuerſalitie in the faith taken away; for there euery man beleeues according to his priuat intreſt,as wellas among many others which haue ſeparated themſelues from the truth, to canton themſelues in their errors,where we doe often trie the diuerſitie of their beleefe.

Sultan Achmat being in his palace of Darut Baſſa,and going to viſit a ſtately Moſque which he cauſed to be built there, a Deruis or religious Turke thruſt on by ſome deuilliſh fury, caſt a great ſtone at him to beat him downe; but the blow of this deteſtable traitor,fell vpon his ſhoulder, and hurt him but lightly. Achmat commanded they ſhould draw from this wretch the confeſſion of his confederates: but the officers of the port cauſed him to be executed the next day, ſomewhat too ſuddenly,and by a death too honourable,for a crime ſo ful of abomination,for they cauſed his head to be cut off. A Deruis of the ſame order had in former times ſought to murther the Emperour Mahomet the ſecond.

On the 14 of Aprill,the Lady Anne Glouer, wife to Sir Thomas Glouer,Embaſſador reſiding at Conſtantinople for the Engliſh,was buried with very great ſolemnity,the like had not bin ſeen in that countrey,ſince the Turks conquered Conſtantinople. There were preſent at this funerall of moſt nations in the world; the ſermon was preached in a large garden vnder a Cypreſſe tree:and although but few of thoſe preſent did vnderſtand it, yet it wrought this effect, that whereas the Ieſuits and Friers had formerly poſſeſt both Iewes, Turks,and other people, that the Engliſh nation ſince the change of their religion,had neither churches,nor any form of diuine ſeruice;hereby they perceiued,that they had both,and ſerued God far more decently and deuoutly than they themſelues; inſomuch that the Ieſuits being aſhamed of their impoſtures, and ſlanderous vntruth, durſt not for a while after walke the ſtreets, for feare of the Turks, who threatned them for ſo much belying the Engliſh. The Sermon being ended, the body was caried from Pera vnto the Engliſh graues,which were almoſt a mile from the place; it was cloſed in lead, and laid in a Caroch couered ouer with blacke veluet, and the horſes with blacke cloth. The Dutch Embaſſador, the Hungarian Agent, the French Colonell with a great number of all nations both men and women followed her to her graue.The tomb was of faire marble, built foure ſquare almoſt the height of a man, hauing an Epitaph engrauen thereon, The Caſtle of Lango taken by the Florentines.

We haue ſeene the yeare before, the Iſland and towne of Lango ſpoiled by the gallies of G Malta and Naples, but the Caſtle was ſaued from ruine, by the reſiſtance it made againſt the Chriſtians attempts: but this yeare in Iune the great Duke of Tuſcans gallies running ouer the Archipelague, aſſailed it ſo furiouſly, as they forced and ſpoyled it, carrying away twelue hundred priſoners. Mechmet Baſſa Admirall at ſea, whom we ſaw euen now buſied at his nuptiall pompe, with the Emperours eldeſt daughter, being aduertiſed of theſe ſpoyles of the Florentines, by the dayly complaints of the Turks which loſt their ſhipping, and of many other enterpriſes attempted vpon his Maſters countries lying neere the ſea ſhore, he departed from Conſtantinople in Auguſt with three and thirty great gallies, hauing commanded all the Beyes of the Iſlands and townes in the Archipelague, to ioyne with him, with as many gallies as they could make, to ſtop the Chriſtians courſes in the Weſt. But whilſt that he is buſied H in thoſe ſeas, the Pirats of Raſcia deſcending into the Euxine ſea, by the mouthes of thoſe riuers which diſcharge their waters into the ſea, ouerran and ſpoiled the Turks coaſts of thoſe parts.

At the firme land Conſtantine one of the pretending Princes in Moldauia, annoyed all that had any dependance vpon the Turke. A part of that great army of the King of Polands, which had mutined for their pay, ſpoiled Podolia; and a Prince of the Tartarians diſcontent for that Achmat had preferred a couſin of his before him in the inueſtiture of the realm of the Tartars Precopians, with 5000 ſouldiers ſpoiled the riuers of Moldauia vnder the Turks dominion, and he did the like in the gulph of Nicopolis.

Troubles in Moldauia.

This was at ſuch time when as miſerable Moldauia was the theatre, wheras the Turks, Tar- I tars, and Moldauians acted a bloudy tragedy, at the coſts and charges of the poore countreymen. For Tomſho hauing been choſen Vayuod or Prince of that Prouince by the Turke, Conſtantine who could not endure that he ſhould reigne, armed the country, ouerran it, ſpoiled it, and made hauocke of all, detaining two Capigi priſoners, whom the Sultan had ſent to him, with commandement to obey his will, and a prohibition not to trouble Tomſho in the poſſeſſion of his Prouince. But this was a meſſage of hard diſgeſtion to Conſtantine; hee could not with patience yeeld to this ceſſion of Moldauia: and in ſtead of ſending theſe meſſengers back to the Turke with an anſwer, hee carried them with him into Polonia, whither he went to demand ſuccors, and cauſed them to be guarded as priſoners. In the meane time by the ſupport and aid of Potoſly Gouernor of Velin his brother in law, he obtained from the King of Poland, K that he ſhould be ſupported againſt Prince Tomſho his competitor, whom the Turke had aduanced; and to make his entry into Moldauia more eaſie, they reſolued to ſend an Embaſſador vnto Conſtantinople, to intreat Achmat to call backe Tomſho to his Port, that Conſtantine might quietly enioy Moldauia; and to acquaint him with the right and intereſt the Polonians had by their capitulations with the Turks, to name a Vayuod or Prince of that Prouince, to the end no wrong might be done vnto them.

This Polonian Embaſſador being arriued at Conſtantinople (thinking to be preſently diſpatched, either by a grant or denial of his demand, & not to ſtay aboue fifteen or twenty days) being viſited at his arriuall by all the Embaſſadors of Chriſtian Kings and Princes which remained there: in ſtead of audience, after ſix weekes attendance, hee was arreſted and detained L priſoner, vnderſtanding from the Turks, that he ſhould haue no liberty vntill that the two Capigi, whom Prince Conſtantine carried into Poland were releaſed.

The troubles and diuiſions among Chriſtians, neighbours to the Turke, haue alwaies ſerued as a bridge for this Infidell to inuade them, and by this aduantage to vſurpe ſuch townes and countries as lie fit for him. Now that Valachia, Moldauia, yea and Tranſyluania, are toſt and turmoiled with continuall diſorders and combuſtions; the Sultan ſeemes to embrace this occaſion, to make himſelfe Soueraigne of thoſe Prouinces, and to get poſſeſſion of al that lies betwixt the riuer of Danow, the mountains of Sarmatia, the riuer of Tibiſcus, and the Euxine ſea. Hee emploies all his thoughts and inuentions vpon this ſubiect, to bring his deſignes to M effect. He armes and drawes forces about Belgrade, vnder the conduct of Baſſa Mahomet Belzergi: He commands the Tartarians to enter into Moldauia, and he ſent a nauall army towards the mouth of the riuer of Danow, which made the frigots of Raſſia to diſlodge, the which had continually made inroades and ſpoyles vpon his lands. Battori Prince of Tranſyluania was at that time before the towne of Cromſtad, which he had beſieged, but the tediouſneſſe of this

A ſiege made him reſolue to ſend an Embaſſador to Conſtantinople, to demand ſuccours from the Grand Seignior, to the end he might be able to continue this ſiege, and to take the towne: he gaue this charge to Andrew Giezy, and ſent him to the Sultans Port: but in ſtead of ſeruing his Maſter faithfully, hee practiſed a deteſtable treaſon againſt him, to put the Turke in full poſſeſſion of Tranſyluania, and to make him abſolute Soueraign. The practiſe was concluded after this manner, That the Baſſa Mahomet Belzergi ſhould enter the Prouince with his army, and that Giezi ſhould ioyne with him certaine troupes, and ſhould deliuer vnto him Veradin, Lippa, and ſome other ſtrong and important places; and for recompence hee ſhould inueſt him in the Principalitie of Tranſyluania, in the place of Battori, and vnder the authoritie of Achmat.

B This treaſon might haue drawne this miſerable Prouince into ruine, and it may be the reſt neere adjacent, if it had taken the effect which the trecherie of Giezy had promiſed vnto himſelfe. But the Baſſa of Buda vnderſtanding that Battori had ſome vent of the practiſe at the Port, and that being now in great feare and perturbation, hee had raiſed the ſiege from before Cromſtad, and was ready to caſt himſelfe into the armes of the Palatine of Hungary, and to craue reliefe from him; the crafty Baſſa knowing that this courſe would be prejudiciall for the Sultan, and finding that the depoſing of Battori would be more difficult than they expected, hee diuerted Mahomet Baſſa from attempting any thing againſt Battori or Tranſyluania. This act ſhewes ſufficiently, that Chriſtian Princes which thinke to ſhelter themſelues vnder the ſhadow of the Turkiſh creſcent, are very ill aſſured: for he neuer failes to ſtir vp enemies C againſt them, to make them ſue for ſuccors, and himſelfe neceſſarie: Then in the end hee expels them, and becomes abſolute maſter of their countries. It was alſo ſaid, That the Baſſa Mahomet would not attempt any thing in Tranſyluania, by reaſon of the election of the Emperour Matthias, whereof the Baſſa of Buda was aſſured by the Embaſſador which the ſaid Emperor ſent to Conſtantinople, to carry the Preſents vnto the Sultan, which Embaſſadour was honorably entertained at Buda by the ſaid Baſſa, and from thence conducted ſafely to Conſtantinople.

But not to keep theſe Turkiſh troups idle, Mahomet Baſſa being aduertiſed that Conſtantine the pretending Prince in Moldauia, had been in Poland to craue ſome aſſiſtance from thence, he reſolued to imploy his forces that way, to diſpoſſeſſe him and to ſettle another.

D But the better to vnderſtand the beginning and ſucceſſe of theſe Moldauian warres, wee muſt make a repetition of that which paſt ſome yeares before. In the yeare 1608, Ieremie Mobyla Prince or Vayuod of Valachia. died: committing the gouernment to his brother Simeon, during the minoritie of his three ſonnes, Conſtantine, Alexander, and Bougdan, the eldeſt being but eight yeares old. He left three daughters married to three generous Princes of Polonia, Potosky, [illegible]iſnousky, and Corresky. Prince Simeon continued in the gouernment vntill the yeare 1611; after whoſe deceaſe the young Prince Conſtantine by the perſuaſion of his mother, that he might ſafely take vpon him the gouernment of Moldauia, and not attend any confirmation from the Sultan, for that Prince Simeon who had been confirmed by the Turke which then reigned, was but Tutor to his Nephew; entred the gouernment. At E this time there remained at Conſtantinople, one Stephano or Tomſho, who had of long time practiſed the fauour of one of the Viſiers called Mehemet, an Eunuch of Georgia (who was then Chimacham, or Lieutenant to the Grand Viſier) and of ſome other Baſſaes, as well by money as by other practiſes, ſuggeſting falſly that he was ſonne to Prince Aaron, who had been Vayuod of Moldauia before the deceaſed Ieremy: and he preuailed ſo by his practiſes and corruption (whereunto the Turks are more ſubiect than any Nation in the World) as he was admitted to the Principalitie by the Grand Seignior, and hauing giuen him to vnderſtand by the Viſier, that Conſtantine had thruſt himſelfe raſhly into the gouernment, and that hee would not acknowledge him for his Lord and Soueraigne, nor pay the yerely tribute, which was 40000 chequines, hee ſent Fouſſeyen Aga with 20000 Turks and Tartarians to F ſettle Stephen or Tomſho in Moldauia, and to expell Prince Conſtantine. Which army marched ſo ſecretly, as they had in a manner ſurpriſed him; yet drawing together a head of 10000 men, hee reſolued to attend the euent. The Aga ſent to acquaint him with his commiſſion, and among other things threatned him, that if he would not ſuffer him to proclaime Stephen Vayuod of Moldauia, and yeeld him the City of Yas free, he would cut him in pieces.

Whereunto Conſtantine made anſwer, by the aduice of the Prince Potosky his brother in law, That the Grand Seigniour had been abuſed: for if hee had vnderſtood, that his predeceſſor had granted vnto the deceaſed Prince Ieremy his father, and to Prince Simeon his vncle, That he ſhould ſucceed his ſaid father in the gouernment: it was not credible that he would ſeeke to diſpoſſeſſe him by force, without hearing, and inſtall in his place an vnknowne perſon, who had falſely ſuppoſed himſelfe to be the ſonne of a Prince of Moldauia: neither ſhould they finde, that he had refuſed to acknowledge the Sultan for his Souereigne Prince, or denied to continue the ſame tribute which his father and vncle had paid; but if the Aga would proceed without any reſpect of his offers, he did hope that the true God of battel would maintain him in his iuſt defence, and would not ſuffer an vſurper to preuaile ouer a lawfull Prince. Fouſſeyen Aga, who had no will to capitulate with Prince Conſtantine, being corrupted by Stephen with Preſents and promiſes, aduanced with his army, ſo as the next day they ioyned battel, but the Moldauians oppreſt with multitudes of Turks, Tartarians, and Valachians, could not make it good. Wherefore Potosky entreated Prince Conſtantine to ſaue himſelfe, and to ſuffer him to finiſh the battell: but he could by no meanes perſuade him, ſtill reſoluing to attend the euent. Whereupon they went both again to the charge with ſuch troups as they had left, and defeated many of the Turks forces; but being oppreſſed with a new ſupply of 2000 horſe which the Aga ſent by Stephen, they were conſtrained to yeeld themſelues to the mercy of their enemies. Prince Conſtantine fell to the Tartarian ſhare, either for that he had been taken priſoner by ſome of them, or elſe was giuen them by Fouſſeyen Aga, to draw a ranſome from him, and be in ſtead of their pay. But they made no great vſe of him; for as they led him away, paſſing the riuer of Nieſtre, hee leapt into it, thinking either to ſaue himſelfe by ſwimming, or vnwilling to ſuruiue his diſgrace. And as for Prince Potosky, he was carried to Conſtantinople, and was put into the blacke tower, which is a priſon appointed for men of quality, where he continued vntill the yeare 1616. The loſſe of this battell by Conſtantine, gaue an eaſie entrance to Stephen into Moldauia, no man daring oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Turks forces, ſo as Fouſſeyen Aga cauſed Stephen to be proclaimed Prince of Moldauia in the city of Yas, and then diſmiſſed his army, and returned to Conſtantinople. Such was the fortune of the Prince of Moldauia, ruined by the Turks, and ſuch was the diſorder and confuſion of his miſerable countrey.

This Summer Conſtantinople and the countrey round about, was annoyed with aboundance of Graſhoppers, as it had been in the former yeare: but to free themſelues from this deuouring vermine, about the middeſt of Iuly, the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, and Alexandria, with diuers other Biſhops, and Calloires attyred in their copes and other ornaments, went forth in ſolemne manner at the gates of Andrianople, being the North gate of the City. Whereupon (ſaid the Greeks) they all periſhed: and indeed [illegible]ut this time infinit heapes of them were found dead; but not by reaſon of their curſe, for moſt were dead before they curſed them, and were to be ſeene dead vpon euery buſh and twigge of a tree before their curſe, and many liued after their curſe, and continued vntill the next Summer. The cold deawes which fell this Summer (being extraordinarie) were thought to bee the naturall cauſe thereof, God cauſing thoſe dewes to fall, to free the countrey from theſe deuouring creatures.

Let vs now deſcribe the miſeries of the Tranſyluanian, and of his Prouince, a table ſo often repreſented in this Hiſtorie. Gabriel Battori who gouerned Tranſyluania, as lawfully deſcended from the Souereigne Princes thereof, hauing made himſelfe a tributarie vnto the Turke, and by his impious actions mingled Mahomets impietie with the Chriſtian Religion, and moreouer, exceeding in his crueltie, became a memorable example to all poſteritie, that Princes which carry the glorious name of Chriſtians, when they haue once laid aſide all feare of the Souereigne of Princes, cannot attend, but a miſerable end in their reigne, conformable to the courſe of their enormities. So Gabriel Battori holding it a law of State, to ſettle his affaires with the ruine of religion, allyes himſelfe with the Turke, and with him afflicts the Chriſtian Prouinces. But ſeeing many factions made againſt him, as wel by the deſcendents of Botſcay, as by Giezi, Bethlem Gabor, and ſome other, hee ſupports himſelfe with the forces of Andrew Nage, the head of the Rebels in high Hungarie, who came vnto him to the ſiege before Cromſtad to aſſiſt him in his affaires. Battori entertained him withall ſhews of curteſie inuited him to dinner in his Tent, and for a greater demonſtration of friendſhip, after dinner they two went to take the air on horſeback. Nage had drunk after the Hungarian maner; Battori intreated him to run his horſe a career, and he refuſed it: the which Battori taking for an offence, ſpake many words of contempt vnto him, and hee anſwered him in the ſame manner, being more inflamed with wine, than gouerned by reaſon. Battori wonderfully offended, that a man of no ſort, being but a poore ſouldier of fortune, crept vp to ſome authoritie amongſt the ſouldiers but by degrees of rebellion, ſhould giue him ſuch words of indignitie, gaue him three blows on the head with a battle-axe which he held in his hand, and ſlew him. Thus Nage ſwimmes iuſtly in his own bloud, hauing wickedly, and to the ruine of his countrey, floted in the waies of vnconſtancie and popular tumults, and ſo he died as he had liued.

Battori kills Nage.

Parties againſt Battori.

But Battori found himſelfe daily oppreſt with many affairs, which draue him inſencibly to his ruine. Peter Decaci kinſman vnto the deceaſed Botſcay, annoied him on the one ſide with troups of ſoldiers. Andrew Giezi (who had betrayed him in his embaſſie to Conſtantinople) leuied forces to proſecute him: and Bethlem Gabor a nobleman of Tranſylvania, aſſiſted by the Turk, took many places from him, after that Giezi had forced him to raiſe his ſiege at Cromſtad, and generally all Tranſylvania reuolted againſt this Prince. To ſee more plainely in the obſcuritie of theſe confuſed diſorders, you muſt vnderſtand that this prouince is peopled by three ſeueral nations, the Sicules, Saxons, and Hungarians. The Sicules, deſcended from the Scythians, came with Attila King of the Hunnes, in Pannonia, now called Hungary; and taking their way toward their country, they inhabited that part of Tranſilvania which lies next to Moldavia, and diuiding themſelues into ſeuen colonies, they built the towns of Kiſdi, Orbai, Scipſi, Cykuduarheh, Aranios, and Maros. The Saxons mutinying againſt the gouernement of Charlemaign King of France, for certain impoſitions wherwith he had charged them, retyred into Tranſylvania, and by force ſeiſed vpon that part of the country which confineth vpon Valachia; where they built the towne of Hermenſtad (otherwiſe called Cibin) Cromſtad, Nezen (or Biſtric) Meduviſch, Scieſpourg, Clauſenbourg, and Alba Iulia. The Hungarians inhabited this prouince from the time of S. Stephen King of Hungary; and hauing maſtred the other nations, they obtained ſuch preheminence amongſt them, that ſince their ſucceſſors haue cauſed themſelues to be called Nobles of Tranſylvania, and the Vayuods or Princes of the Countrey haue bin taken from among them. The Towns of Varradin, Deuer, Zilahi, Gela, and ſome others, owe their beginnings vnto them. The greateſt part of theſe three nations which inhabit Tranſylvania, were reuolted againſt Battori; but particularly the Saxons had taken vp arms againſt him, his great crueltie hauing forced them to this etreame remedie.

Battori being thus abandoned by his ſubiects, proſecuted by his Nobility, and forſaken of all the world, knowing not whither to fly for ſuccour, and not daring to truſt vnto the Turke, who openly fauored Gabor; he reſolued to try if he could by preſents draw the Emperor Matthias to his aid. Wherfore he ſent Embaſſadours vnto him to promiſe all ſubiection and obedience: his preſents were, a long robe or ſacerdotal cloak of gold, ſet with pearle and pretious ſtones, certain plumes of blacke Herons adorned with pretious ſtones, a Turkiſh ſword, the ſcabberd being of ſiluer richly ſet with jewels, ten black horſes with rich furniture embroidered with gold and ſiluer, and a Turkiſh horſe, hauing halfe the body and legs of the color of gold, with his furniture of crimſon richly embroidered. He laboured to haue the Emperour giue notice to the Baſſa of Buda, That this attempt of the Turks againſt Tranſylvania was a breach of the peace. But the Baſſa made anſwer, That his Emperor was not to be blamed if he ſeiſed vpon that prouince, and kept it quiet from the practiſes of others, as belonging to himſelf. But Battori relying not wholly vpon this ſupport, but deſiring to haue more ſtrings to his bow, ſent Embaſſadours to the Sultan with rare and rich preſents, who had ſecret treaties and councels with the Baſſa's. The which Negronius the Emperors Embaſſador reſiding at Conſtantinople diſcouering, he ſent word vnto the Emperor, that he entertained a monſter among men.

About the ſame time there came Embaſſadours from the Saxon townes of Tranſylvania, complaining much of the crueltie and tyrannie of Battori. The Saxons (ſaid they) liuing

many years in Tranſylvania,and beautified the prouinces with townes, villages,and markets, and had by their vertue obtained many priuiledges from former Emperours: but Battori, againſt G his promiſed faith,and the oath which he had taken, had depriued them of their priuiledges, and afflicted them in ſuch ſort,as they were in a maner ruined. That from his firſt entrance, he had ſought to root out the antient family of the Saxons: That he had afflicted them with impriſonments and miſerable ſeruitude,and had detained Iohn Benner three years in priſon, for no other cauſe,but for that he knew hee had brought a great eſtate out of Germanie.
He had depriued honeſt widowes of their eſtates,and had oppreſſed others with vniuſt exactions: he had ſurpriſed Hermſtad the chiefe City of the Saxons, and ſuffered the Haiducks to ſpoil it,and to commit all ſorts of inſolencies. That he had expelled the Magiſtrates, baniſhed honeſt citiſens,rauiſhed women, ſlain the parents, to depriue the children of their inheritance, and commited all the barbarous cruelties that could be deuiſed. That hee had ſent H three hundred Captiues to the Sultan for a preſent: many he cut into ſmall pieces, ſome hee had thrown down from the tops of high mountains and towers, ſome he had hung vp by the feet,others he had drawn in pieces with wild horſes & trees; and to conclude, he had practiſed all kindes of barbarous cruelties. That hauing expelled religious Princes out of Moldauia and Valachia,hee had made them ſubiect to the Turke: for no other end, but that getting an occaſion to circumuent the Chriſtians,he might waſt all with fire and ſword, hauing multitudes of Barbarians to ſecond him. And for a concluſion of his notable crueltie, hauing fired the town of Gaudin, he had made choice of twenty of the principall inhabitants, and giuing euery one of them a pike, he forced them in his preſence to kil one another in the middeſt of I the market place.

But God reuengeth his exceſſe in his ruine,whereinto we ſhall preſently ſee him run headlong miſerably: for Bethlem Gabor his capital enemy, hauing joined his forces with thoſe of Baſſa Serder, they both entred together into Tranſylvania, forced Lugaſti, tooke Deue, and ſtrooke a great terror into the whole Country. Ogli Baſſa on the other ſide ſurmounteth the difficultie of the waies,and lodgeth with his troups in the ſuburbs of Cromſtad, and from thence went and camped ouer all the tract of Barry or Barſac. Thus Battori ſees himſelf opreſt by an enemy, from whom he can expect nothing but his miſerie and ruine. He attended ſuccors from the Emperor,vnder the conduct of the Palatine of Hungary and Fortgatſie; they came,but not ſuch as were able to reſiſt the Turks. This made him write to Trinau for the leuying K of ſoldiers,but the hatred they bare him generally, deceiued his hopes, no man would march vnder his enſignes. This refuſall makes him diſtruſtfull,he dares not confer with any man touching the affairs of the war. A treaty of peace ſeemes moſt fit for his affaires: hee makes an ouerture to his moſt familiar friends, & tels them he holds it neceſſary to purchaſe his peace with Serder Baſſa,at what price ſoeuer, yea were it in deliuering into his hands the places of greateſt importance. But hee receiues no other anſwers from them, but that they had rather die than aduiſe him to it. Thus he ſees himſelfe void of all hopes of ſafety in his affairs: he wanted mony,his ſubiects,yea euen his ſoldiers hated him, as a prince abandoned to all crueltie, and for his laſt remedy, and the moſt ordinary in baſe and cowardly mindes, he fel into diſpair,intreating one of his ſeruants to kill him: but the other refuſed him that L honor,ſuffering him to draw on his miſerable life,vntil that within ſome few daies after, going forth to view where his troups were lodged,being in an open chariot, accompanied only with two gentlemen,fifty of his ſoldiers which attended him in an ambuſh, ſhot at him, ſlew him,and hurt thoſe that did accompanie him. This accident happened in the yeare 1613. when as this vnfortunat Battori went to giue an account vnto God of the bad gouernment of his eſtate.

Bethlem Gabor made prince of Tranſylvania.

Some few dayes after, Bethlem Gabor was openly declared Prince of Tranſylvania by the Baſſa Serder; who gaue him this aduertiſement at his introduction; Battori ſhall ſerue for an example to bad Princes; I doe not thinke that you will follow his ſteps. Beware that you attempt not any thing without the priuitie of my Maſter. Maintaine peace with your neighbours,and make men of experience M and honeſty of your Councell. Tranſylvania did yet feare the continuance of a ſtorme of a fatall Warre; when as in leſſe than forty daies it ſaw it ſelfe ſetled in the calme of ſweet peace,by the general acknowledgement which all the Townes made vnto Bethlem Gabor, and

A the oath of fidelitie which they tooke vnto him as to their elected Prince; notwithſtanding that the Emperor had imploied all his credit to hinder it. But the deſire of peace, and feare of the Turks armies, drew all the Gouernors of towns to acknowledge Gabor. Such were the affairs of Tranſylvania, diſordred by the Turk. Now let vs make an end of the remainder of the year 1612, the which we haue deferred, for that we would not interrupt the relation of the affairs of this prouince.

We haue ſaid elſwhere, That the King of Perſia had offered conditions of peace to Sultan Achmat, much to his aduantage, ſeeing that he yeelded himſelfe the Turks tributary, in regard of certain lands which he had conquered from him. Now the Viſier Naſſuf, General of the army againſt the Perſian, brings his Embaſſadour to Conſtantinople to conclude this peace. B Naſſuf ariued with his army and the Perſian Embaſſador at Scudaret, right ouer againſt Conſtantinople, whither moſt of the Baſſa's of the Port went to ſalute him, and then returned. But the grand Viſier ſtaid there two days; on the third he paſt ouer to Conſtantinople, where hee was entertained at the water ſide by all the Baſſa's that accompanied him; an infinit number of Ianizaries going before with their pieces, and ſome of them in armor; after whom followed their Aga on horſeback: then came a great number of Iamoglans, and the Emirs or kindred of Mahomet with their green turbants, with many blind men ſhouting aloud: Theſe holy men caried the banner (as they ſay) of Mahomet, and the people ſtanding by kiſſed it with great deuotion as they paſt. After them came the Chaoux on horſeback, the Baſſa's, & then the chief Mufti, and laſt of all Naſſuf Baſſa himſelf: after whom followed the treaſure he brought with C him for the Emperor, being 234 Mules loden with gold and ſiluer. The Viſier as he paſt by the Sultans window bowed himſelfe very low vnto him, from whom hee had a nod with his head, and ſo ſet ſpurres to his horſe and rode away faſt, as the manner of the Turkes is when they ſalute a greater man than themſelues, preſently to run or ride away apace. The Viſier being come to the Serail, went in to the Sultan to kiſſe his hand; where hee continued a whole houre, the reſt of the Baſſa's attending without. There were preſent at this daies pompe the Emperors Embaſſador, the French, the Engliſh, Polonian, Low-Countries, and Venetian; the Perſian remaining ſtil at Scudaret. The grand Viſier as he paſt by the Emperors Embaſſador, put off his hat and ſaluted him, but not the reſt. The ſame day Tomſho, who had bin lately made Prince of Moldauia by the grand Seigniour, ſent many Polonians to Conſtantino- D ple, whom hee had taken in the Warres. All which (notwithſtanding they threw downe their Caps and offered to turne Turkes) were put to death. And within few daies after, the Viſier Naſſuf ſitting in the publique Divano, had three robes ſent him from the grand Seignior to grace him.

Achmat hauing a will to let the Perſian ſee the magnificence of his Court, went out of Conſtantinople; and vnder pretence to go take the aire at his Country palace called Darut Baſſa, he takes occaſion at his return to make a ſtately entry into his Imperial city. The generall Surueyour being aduertiſed of his will, cauſed all the waies from his palace of Darut vnto the City to be couered with ſand, the which containeth two French leagues, or four Engliſh miles. This done, the Emperour parted for his retinue, and entred in pomp into Con- E ſtantinople. The order of his entry was in this manner. A great number of men at Armes marched firſt on horſebacke, and after them ſome troups of foot, the Cadies of Conſtantinople or men of juſtice; and all the Taliſmans, or thoſe of Mahomets Law, in very great numbers followed after: and after theſe followed the Viſiers and Baſſa's in very great pomp. After whom followed the Sultans houſhold, that is to ſay, ten men leading in their hands tenne goodly horſes richly capariſoned, the laſt of which had the bridle and ſaddle all couered with pretious ſtones: the Sultans Target was made faſt vnto the ſaddle, and vpon it did hang euen almoſt to the ground a great taſſel of pearls; and ouer all this, a long horſe cloath or couering for an horſe, the which was embroidered ſo thicke with pearle, as the ground could not be diſcerned. After which followed the reſt of the Emperours houſhold in diuers troupes: F firſt, fifty Ianizaries on foot, euery one of them leading dogs in leaſhes, Maſtifs, or Iriſh greyhounds: the goodlieſt of all were thoſe which the French Embaſſadour had preſented vnto the Sultan. Secondly, the grand Seigniors footmen, called Pelks, who were Perſians by Nation, all wel attired, wearing on their heads bonnets of ſiluer and gilt, in form of pots. Thirdly, threeſcore archers on foot, in the middeſt of which the Sultan came, attired in a rich robe of G cloath of gold imbroidered with pearles and diamonds: his ſlaues were inricht after the ſame maner: his turbant couered with fiue plumes of black herons feathers, inricht with great Diamonds, and a chain of the ſame ſtones about the lower part of his turbant: vpon his little finger he had a diamond of a large bignes and ineſtimable price, which gaue a maruellous great light. He was proudly mounted vpon a goodly horſe richly capariſoned, the ſaddle was embroidred with gold, pearle, and Diamonds, the ſtirrops of pure gold ſet with many diamonds, and from the horſes neck did hang great taſſels of pearle, which were ſo great, that they were exceeding pretious. After the grand Seignior followed three men on horſebacke, carrying in their hands, the one his arms, the other his cloak, and the third his Imperial turbant; & theſe were attended on by certain Eſquires and gentlemen all on horſebacke. Then came the muſick after the Turkiſh maner, conſiſting of threeſcore men on horſebacke, which played vpon H Fiſes, Clerons, and trumpets. Next followed an hundred pages of the Sultans brauely mounted, and followed by many Eunuchs; fifty of which pages caried euery one a falcon vpon his fiſt, hauing their heads inricht with diamonds; and theſe were followed by thirty gards of the Port. Then came fifty falconers and huntſmen richly attyred and wel mounted; four whereof had either of them before him vpon his ſaddle bow a Leopard couered with cloath of gold: with a great number of other Pages who were very beautifull, choſen amongſt the infants of the tribute, and vnfortunatly appointed for the filthy and vnnatural pleaſures of their maſter; whoſe garments after the Turkiſh maner were pretious, and made of rich cloth of gold curled. They were followed by a great troup of yong men plainly attired in cloath, hauing vpon their I heads yellow caps pointed in form of a ſugar loafe, and theſe were ordained to ſerue the Sultans pages.

There were moreouer diuers Beglerbegs attending the Sultan in this pomp; as of Boſna, Buda, Romania, Natolia, and others; euery company going diſtinct, both of horſe and foot, with the Baſſa's ſeruants all gallantly attyred & wel mounted. And after them followed Naſſufs attendants, being fiue hundred in number richly armed. There were alſo the Kings Firemen, Calkers, Azappes, the Rices or officers of gallies with ſpears in their hands: all that belonged to the Arſenal, the Carters which gouerned the carts going to war, and their captains; then the ſhot-men with their banner, and the Armorers all in armor with their banner. There were alſo the banners of the grand ſeignior Mahomet, and of the grand Viſier, euery one in his K order before the grand Seignior: and after all followed the Capigies and officers of his Kitchen. The number of all ſorts of attendants in this pomp was ſo great, as they were reckoned to be forty thouſand perſons.

The Perſian Embaſſador, for whoſe ſake Achmat had made this ſtately ſhew, to the end he might carry back into his country a pattern of the Othoman ſtate and greatneſſe, cauſed to bee caſt out before his lodging, when as the Sultan paſſed by, 100 pieces of ſilke, the which were gathered vp by the archers of his gard, wherof they made good purchaſe. All theſe magnificences, added to thoſe we haue formerly related at the mariages of the Sultans daughter and ſiſter; with other pomp celebrated in France, Spain, Naples, and Germany, for the mariages of Lewis 13, King of France, with Anne of Auſtria Infant of Spain; and of the Prince of Spaine L with the Lady Elizabeth of Bourbon the Kings eldeſt ſiſter; and for the coronation of the empreſſe, and the Emperors entry into Noremberg, may giue vnto this yeare 1612 the title of magnique or ſtately.

The Perſian preſents to the Sultan.

Foure daies after Sultan Achmats entry into the Imperal city, the Perſian Embaſſador had audience, and was admitted to kiſſe his hand. He preſented vnto his Maieſtie in the behalfe of the King of Perſia his maſter, foure hundred Balls of ſilke, a Beſonard ſtone as bigge as a mans fiſt, with ſome others that were leſſe; nine bags of leather ful of Turquoiſes, the which were a foot and a halfe long, and aboue foure fingers broad; a great number of Tapeſtries of Wooll, Silke, cloath of gold and ſiluer, with many other things of great price, and very rare. Their complements being ended, they began to treat ſeriouſly of a peace betwixt two great M and antient enemies, the Turk and the Perſian; the which after ſome difficulties was concluded vpon theſe conditions: That the Perſian King ſhould pay yearly vnto the Turkiſh Emperor by way of tribute, a quantitie of ſilk to the burden of two hundred camels: that the King

A of Perſia his ſonne ſhould be called Baſſa of Tauris, and that the Cadi or Soueraigne Iudge of that towne ſhould be ſent from Conſtantinople. This peace thus concluded to the Turks aduantage, the Perſian Embaſſador returned vnto his Maſter, hauing left moſt of his traine dead of the Plague at Conſtantinople. Being arriued at Tauris, the King of Perſia ſeeing this peace to be ſo diſhonourable, and burthenſome for him, he cauſed his Embaſſadours head to be cut off; and ſent backe the Chiaux, who was come from Conſtantinople to ſee him ſweare the peace. Some write that he did him ſome indignities, which made theſe two great Monarchs returne againe to armes.

The Grand Viſier Naſſuf, after his returne to Conſtantinople, to ſhew his great power and authority, procured meanes to haue the Chimacham (who had formerly ſupplied the place B of the Grand Viſier in the abſence of Amurath Baſſa, and vntill the returne of Naſſuf) to be depriued of his Baſſaes place, and ſent preſently ouer vnto Scudaret, vnder pretence of preferring him to a gouernment neere vnto Trebizond in the confines of Turky, but with an intent to depriue him of his head. The friends of this Chimacham, (who were many and great in Court) ſeeing him ſo diſgracefully ſent away, and doubting Naſſuf his purpoſe, procured leaue of the Grand Seigniour to haue him ſent for backe againe, for that hee was an old man, and might from thenceforth liue at home in quiet; and for his former ſeruices done, a thouſand Aſpers a day allowed him for his entertainement: which Naſſuf tooke very diſcontentedly.

During the Perſian Embaſſadours abode at Conſtantinople, the Emperour Matthias (ſucceſſour C to Rodulphus his brother) ſent an Embaſſadour to the Sultan, to complaine of the enterpriſes which were made dayly vpon Tranſyluania, a Prouince which he ſaid belonged vnto him, as a dependance of his Realme of Hungary. This Embaſſadour called Negroni was receiued at the Court, and admitted to kiſſe the Sultans hand: but his Preſents were little eſteemed, for that they were of leſſe value than thoſe which they had lately receiued from the Perſian. His demands to haue the Prouince of Tranſyluania, were grounded vpon an Article inſerted among thoſe of the peace betwixt the Emperour and Botskay, at that time choſen Prince of Tranſyluania; that is to ſay, That Botskay dying without iſſue male, Tranſyluania ſhould remaine at the diſpoſition of his Imperiall Majeſty. This Article being read by Negroni in the Turks Councell, whither he had beene admitted; the Muphti or Soueraigne Prieſt of D Mahomets Law, anſwered, That it was contrary to his Law: ſo the demands of this Embaſſadour touching Tranſyluania were rejected, ſeeing that Botskay had no power from the Sultan (ſaid the Grand Viſier) to treat with the Emperour, and to giue him Tranſyluania after his death. Negroni grounded this gift of Botskay (mentioned in the ſaid Article) vpon the eighth Article of the peace betwixt the Turke and the Emperour, concluded in the Iſle of Dannow, by Amurath Viſier, and the Deputies of his Imperiall Majeſty, in theſe words; That all which had beene granted in the treaty of peace made at Vienna, to Botskay, ſhould be duely and faithfully obſerued. Naſſuf the Grand Viſier replied, That the Baſſa Amurath being then Viſier, might erre in ſigning theſe Articles of the peace vpon the Dannow: and at the ſame inſtant he ſhewed forth ſome other Articles, whereas that was not inſerted; ſaying, That the Sultan E would faithfully performe thoſe and no others, preſſing the Embaſſadour Negroni to ſigne them; the which he refuſed to do: ſo as Naſſuf vſed ſome threats to terrifie him; but Negroni replied, That he was in their power, and that in this caſe he had rather loſe his life, and die glorioully for the good of his maſters affaires, than to haue it taken from him at his returne to Vienna, with ſhame and infamy, hauing ſigned thoſe Articles. Finally, he promiſed to aduertiſe his Imperiall Majeſty, and to certifie them of his pleaſure: which promiſe for this time ended the contention.

The Emperour Matthias ſends an Embaſſador to Conſtantinople

The malice and falſhood of the Turks.

In the beginning of this yeare, Sultan Achmat, after the reception of the Perſian Embaſſadour, and the ſtately entry hee made into Conſtantinople, went to lie at Adrianople, where his Ianizaries and Spahics began to mutiny, ſpurning at their Bread and Rice which F was giuen them for their dayly entertainement: and being demanded the reaſon of their inſolency; they anſwered, That no Emperor before him had ſo carried out his men in the depth of Winter: which anſwer did much inſence Naſſuf Baſſa. This Viſier was in ſuch credit with the

the Grand Seigniour, as during his abode at Adrianople, hee came three times in perſon pri-uately to viſit him, who grew ſo powerfull ouer his maſters affections, as he obtained a priui- G ledge, That it might not be lawfull for any man to ſpeake with the Grand Seigniour priuat-ly, but himſelfe. Being returned to Conſtantinople, there hapned a great fire, in which there were fiue hundred houſes burnt. The Viſier Naſſuf comming to ſee it quenched, and finding ſome Ianizaries more carefull to breake open lockes, and rifle ſhoppes, than to doe any good ſeruice, he ſtrucke out the braines of one of them with his mace, and brake the arme of another.

It had beene an antient cuſtome in Conſtantinople, that the owner of the houſe with all his family where the fire began, ſhould be put to death for their negligence: but it happening that the Emperors owne Seraill, in the time of Mahomet father to Achmat, being ſet on fire, Cicala Baſſa preſented a petition vnto him, that this cuſtome might be aboliſhed, holding H it vniuſt that other men ſhould be put to death, and the ſame let paſſe in the Emperors owne houſe: whereunto he yeelded, holding it reaſonable. And ſoone after there hapned another great fire, at which the Viſier cauſed many of the Ianizaries to be hanged; finding them too buſie in rifling houſes; and he went vp and downe the ſtreets with his ſcimiter in one hand, and a Ianizaries head in the other, which he had cut off. The Grand Seignior ſent Holy Water vnto the Viſier, wherein he had dipt a piece of Mahomets garment, the which being poured into the fire, the Turks ſaid, it ceaſed preſently; yet by the report of viſible witneſſes, it burned foure houres after. The Grand Viſier Naſſuf was a cruell enemy to the Ianizaries, of whom he ſent ſixteene thouſand away into Aſia, and would not ſuffer any moe to be made, but onely I Spahies: and ouer ſuch Ianizaries as remained he made his owne ſeruants to be Churbagies, and Agaes or Captaines ouer fifties and hundreds; fortifying himſelfe by all means he could deuiſe, againſt the future time, to preuent his ſudden ruine; but all this could not preſerue him from a ſhamefull fall, as you ſhall hereafter heare.

Troubles in the Realme of Fez and Moroco.

In the meane time let vs paſſe vnto Affricke, to obſerue the troubles which fell in the Realmes of Fez and Moroco; the quarrels betwixt Prince Xerif Muley Cidan, and the Xerif Muley Achmet, Ben-Abdalla his nephew, and the victories of Cidan againſt Abdalla. The Family of the Xerifs Princes of Fez and Moroco, tooke its beginning ſome hundred and foure yeares ſince, from Mahomet Xerif, borne at Tigumedet in Dara, at this preſent one of the Prouinces of Moroco: he was Alfaqui or preacher of Mahomets Law, who ſeeing the diuiſions be- K twixt the Souereigne Princes of thoſe Realmes, and that the Portugalls had ſeiſed of the chiefe Forts of Moroco, he began with three of his ſonnes, Abdalla, Hamet, and Mahomet, to lay the foundation of a new Monarchy, ſupported by three pillars. That is to ſay, by a counterfeit piety and diſguiſed Religion; vpon a godly pretext to make warre againſt the Portugals Chriſtians which were in Affricke; and vpon a paſſionate deſire to retire the Mahometane Moores which were in their pay, to the end they might by that meanes weaken them, and chaſe them with more eaſe out of the territories of Moroco. The King who at that time held the ſcepter of Fez (ſeeing nothing but the outſide of the Xerifs deſignes) ſuffered his three ſonnes to diſplay their ſtandard againſt the Chriſtian Portugals in the Realme of Moroco: Innouations and nouelties are commonly pleaſing to the common people. At this beginning, L theſe three leaders were followed by a great number of ſouldiers; they vanquiſhed in many encounters, and the bruit of their new victories flying into the Realme of Moroco, retired the Moores from the Portugals ſeruice, whom they defeated ſoone after, with their Commander Lopes Bariga. True it is, that it was to their loſſe; for Abdalla the eldeſt of theſe three brethren loſt his life in this combat. But they ſeiſed vpon the great towne of Taradente in the Prouince of Sus, and of the Prouinces of Herra, Ideuaca, Vbideuaca, Cuz, Guzule, and in a manner of the whole country betwixt Moroco and mount Atlas, ſetling their principality in Taradente, whereas the Xerif their father carried the name of the Gouernour of the Prouince of Sus.

The King of Moroco fearing the greatneſſe of theſe new Conquerours, diſſembled the M deſire hee had to bring them vnder, aſſuring himſelfe that time would preſent him ſome good occaſion: ſo ſuffering them to enter into Moroco: but they preuented him, they tooke

A away his life by poyſon, and ſeiſed vpon his Realme. The King of Fez, who had by an indiſcreet ſimplicity ſuffered them to take arms, and by that means to open the way to a great fortune, hee ſaw afar off the tempeſt of theſe vnjuſt ſpoilers to fall vpon Moroco and other places.
The feare of the like calamity did much afflict his minde: but the Xeriſs entertained this idle Prince with faire ſhewes; they abuſed his bounty, and with the fourth part of the rich ſpoiles which they had taken in ſo many townes and Prouinces, they lull his diſtruſt aſleepe: moreouer, they ſend him the tribute due for the Realme of Moroco. Hamet takes vpon him the name of King of Moroco; Mahomet that King of Sus, in the towne of Taradente; and by a good intelligence betwixt them, they make themſelues fearefull to all thoſe countries; ſo as they haue nothing more to feare, than the threats and vengeance of heauen. They then began B to contemne the King of Fez, and plainly to deny the tribute of Moroco, pretending for their reaſon, that they were iſſued from the line of Mahomet. This contempt made the King of Fez to open his eies; he finds the faults paſt, by the intereſt of the preſent: he ſees the Xeriſs had abuſed the liberty which hee had giuen them: whereupon hee went to field with an army of 18000 men, and planted his ſiege before Moroco; but as his enemies party was ſtronger than his, ſo he was chaſed away, and his army defeated at the paſſage of a riuer. Thus the Xeriſs became peaceable poſſeſſours of Moroco. The peace of the country made theſe men idle, and idleneſſe drew the two brethren into quarrell; they muſtred vp their forces and came to fight, where after two bloudy battels, Mahomet being victor, he tooke his eldeſt brother Hamet, depriued him of his Realme and liberty, and made him end his daies miſerably in priſon. Thus C God doth puniſh the vnjuſt ſpoiler of another mans good: we ſhall ſee in their poſterity the continuance of the ſame quarrell.

The King of Fez beſiegeth Moroco, and is defeated.

Mahomet ſettled ſoueraigne in Moroco by bloud and fratricide, as monſtrous in ambition as in cruelty, he turned the ſame armes wherewith hee had beaten and vanquiſhed his eldeſt brother, againſt the King of Fez (whoſe improuidence had ſuffered Mahomet and his brethren to take armes, vnder the deceitfull title and pretence of making warre againſt the Chriſtian Portugals) he aſſaulted him with great forces, vanquiſhed him, tooke him priſoner, and depriued him both of Realme and life. Thus the Xeriſs in the perſon of this Mahomet became Soueraigne Princes of Fez ond Moroco. The victory ſo happily gotten of ſo many nations, made him fearefull; but by his cruelty hee drew vpon his deſcendents the juſt judgement of him D who puniſheth the exceſſe and enormity of crimes vnto the fourth generation. His poſterity was miſerable, the vnjuſt deſire of reigne (one ruining another) entertained the brethren in perpetuall diſcord. For Cidan now King of Fez and Moroco, was lately expelled by his brother Kequi; but afterwards Fortune changing her inconſtant fauour, Kequi was purſued by Cidan, defeated, and forced in the yeare 1610 to ſaue his life in Algarbe in Portugall. Abdalla the ſonne of Kequi ſeeing his fathers affaires thus deſolate, retires himſelfe towards the mountaines in the Prouince of Sus: where finding opportunity to annoy his vncle Cidan, he made daily incurſions vpon his territories, with ſome troups of Arabians who had joyned with him being 200 horſe and 200 foot. But finding this to be a long courſe to attain vnto the conqueſt of the Realme from whence he had been expelled, he bethought himſelfe that ſome certaine E counterfeit fiction in Religion, had in former times brought in his grandfather, and made him abſolute Lord of a great country; wherefore he made vſe of a propheſie forged in his ambitious ſpirit: and to worke an impreſſion in the peoples minds (eaſie to be moued with a paſſion of Religion) he ſent certaine religious Mahometans through the country, with a ſhew of holy ſimplicity, who went preaching from place to place, That one Falquere a man of holy life, had giuen vnto a ſonne of his a Drumme of an admirable power and vertue, commanding him expreſſely, to keepe it carefully, vntill that a Prince called Abdalla ſhould come into Moroco, being expelled by the injuſtice of his owne bloud: and that then he ſhould beat this Drumme, and that the people at the ſound thereof might go to the war with all ſafety; that it ſhould be helpefull to them, giue peace vnto the Realme, and ſettle all the cuſtomes and antient lawes to their common content. Thus they preached this propheſie, the which they ſaid F was now accompliſhed, ſeeing that this propheticall Drum had beene found, that Abdalla the eldeſt Prince of the houſe of the Xeriſs had cauſed it to be beaten, exhorting all men to follow the war for the common good of the country.

A propheſie inuented by Kequi, and preached by religious Turks.

Abdalla defeated and ſlaine.

Theſe vanities being preached by theſe ignorant and malicious Religious Turks, increaſed the number of Abdallaes party: whereof Cidan being aduertiſed, he ſent a great army againſt him into the Prouince of Sus, vnder the command of Alcas Elmye, to hinder the progreſſe of his deſignes: But Abdalla finding theſe forces to approch, retired himſelfe towards the mountaines, from whence he might charge the enemies army; the which he did ſo happily, as within few daies he cut off fiue thouſand of his men. This ſucceſſe did ſo aduance his affaires, as his troups encreaſed daily, ſo as Cydan was forced to go with new forces to fight with him, the which was the cauſe of his ruine: for at this time he was inueſted, and notwithſtanding the good ſucceſſe of his falſe propheſies, lightly grounded vpon the ſound of a Drum, he was defeated and ſlaine in this yeare 1612. G

Gotardus, diſcourſing of this miraculous King of Mauritania, whom he cals Muley Hamet, writeth that he was charmed with diueliſh incantations, and freed from all outward force, carying himſelfe for a Diuine Prophet: That with one hundred and eighty horſe, and two hundred foot, he went to make head againſt Cydan King of Moroco, hauing forty thouſand men: That his ſouldiers (who were ſo few in number) being ready to fly, he perſuaded them with a cunning ſpeech to prepare to fight: That comming neere to Cydans campe, they might ſee a great Army of enemies fighting againſt them, in which there were fiue thouſand of Cydans Army ouerthrowne, and the reſt put to flight, and yet Hamet had not aduanced with his troupes: That within few daies after, comming with his troupes tyred to a riuer ſide, hee commanded them not to drinke nor waſh in that riuer, which if they did they would die: but ſome neglecting his command, thinking to quench their thirſt died ſuddenly. He tooke many places in thoſe mountainous Regions, which no man had formerly ſubdued; his forces encreaſing dayly, hauing fiue and twenty thouſand men, and vowing to goe againſt the Chriſtians, more came vnto him: ſo as he went againſt Cydan with a good Army, who likewiſe attended him. Hamet perſuaded his ſouldiers that no ſhot could hurt them; ſo as they aſſaulted Cydans campe with ſuch fury, as within leſſe than an houres ſpace they had ſlaine aboue ſix thouſand men, and put the reſt to flight. They write that Hamet loſt not aboue foure or fiue, and that ſuch as were ſtrucke with any bullet, ſhewed markes but no wounds; aud that the great ordnance either ſhot ouer them, or the pouder vented out at the touch hole, and wrought no effect. Cydan hauing loſt his brother in the fight, fled with all his treaſure, to recouer new forces, and in the meane time Hamet made himſelfe maſter of the whold Countrey. There were certaine Hollanders admitted vnto him, whom they found ſitting vpon a carpet made of the barke of trees, hauing a white ſhirt, and a long garment vpon it, a red cap on his head, bare thighes, and red ſhooes, a bag about his necke, and in it he had his Alcaron, a ſhort crooked ſword and a dagger hanging by him. Being ſaluted by the Hollanders, hee willed them to ſit downe by him, telling them that hee was ſent from Heauen, to purge the World from euill, and to prepare the Law of God; to expell Cidan out of his Kingdome, and to reſtore peace vnto the World: wherefore hee aduiſed them not to haue any commerce with Cydan, nor to aſſiſt him in any ſort. They obſerued many markes vpon his body, he had one blew tooth, all the reſt beeing white, haire vpon either ſhoulder, a red circle in the palme of his right hand, and the proportion of a ſpurre vpon his right foot. Hauing gotten ſome victories againſt Cydan, and taken the towne of Moroco, in the end his diuelliſh art failing him, he was ſlaine as you haue heard. Such were the affaires of Affricke, in the Realme of Fez and Moroco. H I K L

Cydan King of Fez ouerthrowne.

A great drought & ſterility at Algier.

But in Algier a wonderfull drought had cauſed cruell combuſtions; it had ſo deuoured the fruits of the earth before their maturity, as there followed a wonderfull famine throughout the whole land. The Turks attributed the cauſe of their miſery ſometimes to their ſins; then to the comming of the Moores, who had beene expelled out of Spaine, as a pernicious vermine; and ſometimes to the licentiouſneſſe of Chriſtians, which liued in thoſe places. Wherefore in the beginning of May this yeare, the Iudge of the towne ordained, That all the Turks ſhould make their deuout praiers to Mahomet their Prophet to obtaine raine, ſo neceſſary in that country; that the Moores ſhould depart the towne within three daies vpon paine of death; and that all the Chriſtians, as well free as bond ſlaues, ſhould cauſe their heads and their beards to be ſhauen, this was ſpeedily executed; for the Turks decrees require a M prompt

A prompt obedience. But the miſerable Moores which could not get out of Algier within their three daies prefixed, detained either by ſickeneſſe, or ſome other impediment, were all cut in pieces. For thirteene daies, there was nothing ſeene within the towne but proceſſions of Turks without Turbants, crying and howling after their manner to obtaine raine from their falſe Prophet: but he which commands Soueraignty ouer times, from whoſe hand proceed faire weather and raine, and which makes the earth fruitfull, held the pipes of Heauen yet ſtopped, to open them at more religious and holy vowes than the ſuperſtitious clamours of theſe Infidels. For Bernard Murroy, of the Order of the redemption of captiues, hearing that the Turkes meant to reuenge their miſeries vpon them, and to ruine a little Chappell which the Chriſtian ſlaues had in the priſon, for the pious exerciſes of their Religion, B obtained (by the means of Bius Conſull of the French in Algier) permiſſion for the Douan, or Turkiſh Iudge, to make proceſſions, and to pray vnto God to ſend them the dew of Heauen, which was ſo neceſſary for them. All the Chriſtian ſlaues which were priſoners, continued their deuotions for the ſpace of fiue daies: but on the fourth day being the eighth of May, there fell ſuch abundance of raine vpon Algier, as theſe poore Chriſtians ſeeing their praiers heard in the middeſt of the enemies of their faith, gaue infinite thankes vnto God for his great mercy and grace.

Theſe miſerable Chriſtian ſlaues were ſtill detained in yrons and cruell ſeruitude, by this accident. This Murroy of the Order of the Redemption of captiues, accompanied with two others of the ſame Order, had redeemed to the number of one hundred thirty and ſix: but C when he was ready to embarke them, their euill fortune would haue it, that the gallies of Genoa running alongſt that coaſt, landed ſome men neere vnto Algier, where they tooke the Baſſaes ſonne of that towne, with many other Turks, and amongſt this number a Virgine of Algier, of a very noble Family, and of as rare a beauty, for the miſery of theſe ſlaues: for that whenas the Baſſaes ſon and the others were redeemed by a Frigot which the father had ſent, the faire Algerian Virgine was ſtill detained by a Captaine of the Genowaies, who had retyred to Caluy an Iſland adjoyning, there to ſatisfie his deſires with more eaſe, vpon the fraile and fading perfection of this faire ſlaue, which had depriued him of his liberty. In the meane time the Baſſa of Algier ſeeing his ſon returned with the other Turks, and not the Algerian Virgine, commanded that the hundred thirty and ſix ſlaues ſhould be put againe into yrons, D with the three Religious men which had redeemed them. Thus this feminine beauty, or rather the paſſion of the Genowaies, who holds the poſſeſſion ſo deare, makes a great number of Chriſtian ſoules to ſuffer by inſupportable ſeruitude, howſoeuer they of his Nation (flattering his diſordered luſt) ſay that his deſire was, to win her to God, and to make her a Chriſtian, cauſed him to keepe her ſo carefully.

Theſe ſuffered in Algier the loſſe of their liberty: But a Capuchen Frier, a Florentine by Nation, endured at Tunes the loſſe of his life, by the cruelty of the Moores chaſed out of Spaine, and retired into thoſe countries. This religious man being a ſlaue among the Turks, attended dayly from Florence, or from ſome other place, mony to redeeme his liberty: but it hapned one day diſputing in a Barbars houſe with a Moriſque, concerning Chriſtian Religi- E on, the zeale of his faith tranſported him ſo far, as to ſay among diuers Turks, That his Religion was better than that of Mahomets. Theſe words tooke criminouſly in that place, were reported by the Moriſques to the Cadi or Iudge of the towne, whom they preſt with ſuch horrible clamors and cries, as he pronounced ſentence of death againſt this Capuchen. He was deliuered vnto them, and they ſtripped him naked, leading him with infamy through Tunes, ſome ſpitting in his face, others caſting durt at him, and ſo they led him out of the towne, where they tyed him vnto a poſt, and they being cruelly inſenced by a ſpeech which a Morrabour or religious Turke ſaid vnto them, That he among them that gaue him not one blow with a ſtone, ſhould be no good Turke; they ſtoned him to death, where afterwards they burnt his body, and threw the aſhes into the winde.

A Capuchen of Florence in captiuity at Tunes.

He dies gloriouſly for the faith.

F The martyrdome of this Capuchen, was followed by the conſtant confeſſion (amidſt the violence of torments) of a penitent Renegado, a Florentine by Nation, and Captaine of the chiefe gallie of Chio; foure Frenchmen being ſlaues in the Iſland of Chio, in the patron or chieſe gally, belonging to the Bey or Gouernour of the Iſland, they reſolued to recouer their liberty with the hazard of their liues, to returne into France, and carry into ſome Port of Chriſtendome that gally, being the beſt appointed in the whole hauen. They drew vnto their party the Captaine which commanded, being a Florentine Renegado. Their enterpriſe ſhould haue beene executed when as they ſhould goe to land to cut wood. But whether that the ſcribe were trecherous to his companions, or tranſported with ſome raſh indiſcretion; being on land, hee ſpake theſe words aloud, the which ouerthrew both the deſigne, and them that projected it; Hoe, we will returne into Chriſtendome. A Turke which was neere, taking hold of theſe words, reported them vnto the Patron; who preſently layed hold vpon the Scribe, and drew from him the confeſſion of all the enterpriſe. He preſently ſends an hundred men towards the gally, to ſeiſe vpon the foure French ſlaues and the Captaine. But theſe fiue made ſuch a generous reſiſtance, as if the other ſlaues, who were for the moſt part Moldauians, or of the Prouinces which border vpon the blacke ſea, had had the courage to fight for their liberty, without doubt the French-mens enterpriſe had ſucceeded happily. But what could fiue men do againſt an hundred? yet they ſlew fifteene, and wounded many: the foure Frenchmen were all ſlaine, and the Florentine Captaine was taken aliue, and reſerued to the rigour of a cruell death. For they continued him ſix houres together in moſt violent torments, hee ſtill calling vpon the holy and ſacred name of Ieſus Chriſt, euen to the laſt gaſpe, and deteſting the errours and falſhood of the law of Mahomet. This hapned in October this yeare.

The Vnited Eſtates ſend an Embaſſador to Conſtantinople.

A little before, the Eſtates of the vnited Prouinces, and Count Maurice ſeeing the loſſes which the ſhips of Holland ſuffered in the Mediterranean Sea, many of them being taken by the Turkiſh gallies, and a great number of their men made ſlaues: to the end they might bee freed from that danger, and haue a ſafe paſſage for their ſhips, and procure liberty for their captiues, they reſolued to make a league with the Turke. Wherefore they ſent Cornelius Hage to Conſtantinople: who not onely willingly accepted of that Embaſſie, but performed it with ſuch diſcretion, as hee purchaſed great credit and commendation to himſelfe, and much profit to the Prouinces. He had reſolued at firſt to paſſe through Hungary; but he found ſo many croſſes and obſtacles, by ſome that were Creatures to the Pope and Spaniard, as he was forced to turne out of the way, and fetch a great circuit. Firſt of all, he fell into the hands of the Archduke Ferdinand, who cauſed him to be examined, and admoniſhed to deſiſt from his purpoſe: After which he was toſt at Sea, and in the end hauing ſurmounted all dangers, he recouered Conſtantinople, the firſt of May. Hee had expreſſe charge from the Vnited Eſtates to labour for three things. The firſt was, to treat of the deliuerance of the Hollanders that were ſlaues. The ſecond, to make a league with the Turke. And the third, to obtaine from him a free nauigation for the Hollanders, throughout all the ſeas and ports of his Empire.

Preſents ſent from the Vnited Eſtates to the Turke.

This Embaſſadour was brought to kiſſe the Sultans hands, and was fauorably receiued: he preſented vnto his Majeſty in the name of the Eſtates of the vnited Prouinces, his Letters of Embaſſie, with the Preſents which follow: Three birds of Paradiſe of rare & precious plumes, wonderfull goodly to behold, and valued at eight hundred pound ſterling: two veſſels of Chriſtall wonderfull rich and beautifull: foure other veſſels made of fiſhes bones, whereas the Art ſeemed miraculous in the grauing: forty pieces of cloath of gold of diuers colours: fiue pieces of ſilke, fiue of Damaske, fiue of ſilke watered, and fiue plaine: A ſtaffe of an Elephants tooth grauen with admirable induſtry. A Parret ſhut in a cage of Chriſtall, ſo artificially done, as no man could diſcerne the entry: and many faire and rich table-clothes of Holland cloth, moſt part powdred with floures to the life, and wrought in their liuely colours. The which the Sultan did accept with admiration. All theſe things ſhew ſufficiently, That the Eſtates from the beginning or ſoone after haue raiſed handy-workes as well as traffique and nauigation to the higheſt point of perfection.

A league betwixt the Turke and the Hollanders.

The ſixth of Iuly following, the league was ſworne betwixt the Othoman Emperour, and the Vnited Prouinces of the Low-Countries, by the which Achmat promiſed to cauſe to be ſet at liberty, all the Hollanders that were detained ſlaues within his Empire: That the

A traffique ſhould be free for the Hollanders ſhippes throughout all his ſeas and hauens: and moreouer hee granted, That the Eſtates ſhould haue an Embaſſadour reſiding at his Port. This alliance with the Turke, for the which they haue ſo often, and with little reaſon blamed the French, hath beene affected and ſought by the Engliſh and Spaniards, as we haue ſaid elſewhere; and now by the Hollanders, whoſe Eſtates proceed in all their affaires with ſuch weight and meaſure, as it ſeemes they doe nothing but with great reaſon, and to good purpoſe.

About the end of this yeare, the Iewes whoſe long ſlauery thoughout the Word, reprocheth their wretched and miſerable obſtinacy, receiued at Pera neere Conſtantinople the weight of a furious tempeſt which fell among them, ſtirred vp againſt them by the malice of B the Moriſques Granadines chaſed out of Spaine, and retired into the Leuant. Theſe hauing by Preſents wonne the fauour of the Cadi, or Iudge of the place, who was a Negro newly ſetled in that charge by the Grand Viſier Naſſuf; they obtained power from him to thruſt all the Iewes out of Pera, and to ruine their Synagogues. This power they executed with all violence: And yet theſe miſerable Iewes durſt not make their complaints vnto the Magiſtrate, except one of their ſect which dwelt in the Iſle of Chio, who being then at Conſtantinople, and ſuppoſing hee had more credit than the reſt, went to complaine to this Cadi Negro, who preſently cauſed to bee giuen vnto him fiue hundred blowes with a cudgell, in ſtead of doing him juſtice; ſo dangerous a thing it is to haue to doe with ſuch vnjuſt Magiſtrates.

C The inſolencies of the Moriſques tranſported them further: for after they had expelled the Iewes out of their dwellings, they threatned to doe vnto the Chriſtians at Pera, as much as had beene done vnto them in Spaine: and they bragged, That they would ſeiſe vpon their Churches, and eſpecially of that of the Franciſcan Friers, the which was reaſonable faire for the place. But the French Embaſſadour, hauing made his complaint to the chiefe Viſier, he prohibited them to make any attempt againſt the Chriſtians, vpon paine of rigorous puniſhment. This prohibition ſtaied their fury: but they did not forbeare in all other occaſions to ſhew the cruell hatred they owe vnto Chriſtians: ſo as through all the Leuant, in all encounters where they come, they do a thouſand times more miſchiefe than the Turks themſelues.

D At the ſame time the Sultan Achmat had drawne together a mighty army to go into Tranſyluania; he cauſed it to campe in tents neere vnto Conſtantinople, about his palace called Darut Baſſa, whither the people of Conſtantinople went to walke, and to ſee his forces: within few daies after, he went to Hadrianople; meaning from thence to proceed in his voyage, carrying with him all the chiefe men of his Port, except the Baſſa of the ſea, or Admirall, who remained at Conſtantinople, to haue a care of the city. And for the greater ſafety thereof, this Baſſa cauſed an edict to be publiſhed, That no man ſhould go out of his houſe, nor keep any light in it after the ordinary cry, which is made an houre within night, when as the Taliſmans crying from the tops of their Moſques, inuite the people to make the Sala, or prayer. After the publication of this ordinance, he ſent certaine Chiaux to entreat all the Embaſſadours E reſiding at the Port, not to ſuffer their people to goe out by night, to the end that their liberty might not ſerue as a dangerous example to others. But notwithſtanding all the Baſſaes entreaties and prohibitions, three Engliſhmen of the Embaſſadours traine, went out by night into the ſtreet, where they were met by the Prouoſt of Pera, who tooke them, and preſently (without reſpect of the quality) cauſed either of them to haue an hundred and fifty blows with a cudgell, and then committed them to priſon, the dores whereof are neuer opened but with a ſiluer key: ſo ſtrictly do they obſerue in Turky the orders of the Princes Lieutenants, without exception of Perſons.

About the end of the yeare, the Patriarch of Conſtantinople (by reaſon of diuers complaints made againſt him) was depriued by the Grand Viſier, and one Cyrillus, Patriarch of F Alexandria, (a learned and religious Biſhop) was (much againſt his will) preferred to the place. The former Patriarch hereupon excommunicated all ſuch as had wrought his ouerthrow; but he himſelfe was baniſhed into the Iſle of Rhodes. In his paſſage, the barke wherin he he went was caſt vpon Mytilene, in which place he renounced all right and claime to the Patriarchſhip before the Biſhop of that place, and reſigned it to the Biſhop of Patras: whereupon G the Biſhop came from Patras, to Conſtantinople, and laboured with the Viſier Naſſuf for the place: who vpon promiſe to pay him fifteene thouſand Chequines (which is ten thouſand more than they were wont to pay) made him a Grant thereof: which Cyrillus the late elected Patriarch vnderſtanding, he came with all the Grecians to expoſtulate the buſineſſe with the Grand Viſier: Who anſwered, That he was to do what he could for the Emperours profit, and nothing againſt it; wherefore if they would giue ſo much as the other had promiſed, Cyrillus ſhould continue in the place. Which the people were very willing to performe; but Cyrillus refuſed it, and ſo the other was made Patriarch: who preſently ſent for the old Patriarch to come from Rhodes to make peace with him, for that they held not his excommunication H juſt, being not depriued by a Councell, but only by the King. About the ſame time, Naſſuf the Grand Viſier ſent for the foure Embaſſadors, of England, France, Venice, and the States of the Low-Countries; and the reaſon why he ſent for them was, to raiſe their cuſtome on the hundred more than the Merchants had formerly payd.

The enterpriſe of the Great Duke of Tuſcany vpon Agliman.

Whileſt that the Sultan Achmats Army drew neere to Tranſyluania, and fortified the places which hee held in thoſe Countries, Coſmo de Medicis Great Duke of Tuſcany bent his generous deſignes againſt the Fort of Agliman in Caramania, in old time called Cilicia, a Prouince which in the writings of Antients hath beene honoured with two famous Cities, that is to ſay, Tharſis the Countrey of Saint Paul, and Seleucia, the Fort and Port whereof is called Agliman, a hauen which in old time hath continued within it's boſome the fearefull I forces of the Pyrats of thoſe daies: from thence in former times hath come forth a powerfull army of pyrats with a thouſand ſayle, ſo proudly rigged as many of them had their ſayles of purple, the tackling of gold thred, and the oares garniſhed with ſiluer, markes of the ſpoiles of aboue foure hundred cities ruined by thoſe pyrats, who ſtroke a terrour euen to the Romans, and forced them, to auoid their fury, to ſet to ſea that great fleet whereof Pompey the Great was Generall.

The number of the Dukes gallies, and the commanders.

The trophy erected vpon the walls of Agliman, of the heads of forty Florentines, loſt in a Ship called the Proſper, by the ignorance of the Captaine which commanded in it, made the Great Duke to ſtudy to haue his reuenge for this afront; and his deſire to abate the pride of the common Enemy, eleuated his minde to generous enterpriſes. In the end of March K this preſent yeare 1613, he armed ſix Gallies vnder the command of the Admirall Inghirami, the which hee manned with ſix companies of foot commanded by Iulio de Conty, called Montano, Generall at land, beſides forty Knights of the Order of S. Stephen, and a good number of Gentlemen aduenturers, among the which was Don Petro de Medicis. This fleet parted from Ligorne, and came to Ciuita Vecchia: in the beginning of Aprill they tooke in many Noblemen and Gentlemen of France, which attended them, and would be partakers in the enterpriſe; the which were, the Earle of Candale, eldeſt ſonne to the Duke of Eſpernon, Cipierre, Themines, De Vic, Monterrault, De la Tour, and his brother Boiſsiere, Villandre, Vernegue, Du Pleſsis, De la Motte magnus, Auenes, Del Tour, Sainct Cyre, Monplaiſir, and Loyres. About the middeſt of Aprill the gallies landed in the night neere vnto a little towne in Aſia the leſſe, L called Ieronda, held for that Geronda of the Antients: but their diſcent was fruitleſſe, they found it deſart by the flight of the Inhabitants, who had preuented all ſurpriſes. They returned againe to their gallies, and ſailing towards the Eaſt, they encountred three veſſels like vnto their Caramouſſals, the which they ſet vpon and tooke: and about the fifteenth of May, hauing ſcoured the Leuant ſeas, they reſolued to attempt Agliman. Vpon the way they tooke a Veſſell called Grippe, which inſtructed them of the eſtate of the Fortreſſe: they vnderſtood there were two Gallies of Cyprus in the Port, that the place was well furniſhed with all things neceſſary, and guarded without by a good number of horſemen, and that within few daies after, one of the ſaid gallies ſhould come out of the Port of Agliman, and go to the Iſland of Papadula, to fetch a new maſt. Inghirami thought to preuent it, carrying his M whole fleet thither, the which he layd cloſe in the Iſland to ſurpriſe the Turkiſh Galley; but it hauing diſcouered his fleet, put out to ſea, and with ſpeed returned to the Port of Agliman;

A togiue the alarme vnto the country. Notwithſtanding the Chriſtians reſolued to aſſault it, they went with their fleet to the port Caualier, twelue miles from Agliman, from whence they ſent a long boat to diſcouer: the which brings them word that the whole country was in armes. Theſe newes might well haue danted the courages of ſome that had been leſſe generous; yet they paſſe on and about three of the clocke in the morning they came neere the ſhore, being couered with the ſilence of the night, ſo as before ſix of the clocke they had made their landing about a mile and a halfe from the port. The Seignior of Montano and the Earle Candale with ſome few choice men landed firſt, to diſcouer: a mile from the ſhore they encountered the Turkiſh horſemen, yet notwithſtanding Montano commanded they ſhould finiſh their landing, leauing twenty men for the guard of euery gally.

B This fort of Agliman is ſeated vpon a little pleaſant hill, which looks towards the South: It extends from the hill vnto the ſea ſhore: the forme is ouall; that part which is next to the Sea is altogether Meridionall, and the other which riſeth vp to the top of the hill, lookes towards the North. The wals are built of good ſtone and lime, the which are fiue faddome high, and one broad. Within there was a wall drawne from the Eaſt to the Weſt, which diuides it into two vnequall parts, the which they enter by a port ſet in the midſt. The circuite of the wall is fortified with eight towers, whereof fiue be whole, and three are but halfe towers: thoſe which be whole are of a ſquare forme, and haue fiue faddome in breadth on either ſide: the halfe towers haue the ſame greatneſſe on the one ſide, and halfe as much on the other; their height exceeds not the wall, vnleſſe it be that which is built on the top of the hill, C which is raiſed aboue eight foot aboue the wall. Within the place were aboue three hundred fighting men; with ſtore of victuals, munition for war, and many pieces of ordnance: without, there were an hundred horſe ſcouring vp and downe for the ſafegard of the place: and within the port there were two gallies, a Caramouſall, and a Greeke Brigandine, with ſome hundred and fifty fighting men. The order of the combat was diuided after this manner, by the Seignior Montano Generall at land: for the principall port, and that of the retreat, he ſent two companies of foot, which were thoſe of the Admirals gally, of the captains gally, and of Saint Stephen, with the petards, all vnder the charge of the Earle of Candale, who leading this forward, diſcouered a Corps de gard of Turks, horſe and foot together: whereof he preſently aduertiſed the Generall, ſending him word that he would march on towards the fort, and if the D Turks came to charge him, he would cut them all in pieces. Many aduiſed him to returne to the gallies: but Montano allowed the reſolution of the Earle of Candale, who paſt on without charge vntil he came within an hundred and twenty paces of the wall, where he was charged before by the muſket ſhot of the fort, behinde by the gallies, and in flanke by them of the mountaine, with ſuch horrible howling and crying out, as the mariners which carried the Petards being wonderfully amazed and terrified, let them fall to the ground and fled away. The Baron of Mont-terault, and Tiel, a ſouldier of Langueza tooke them vp. They continued their way vntill they came within fifteene paces of the walls, when as twenty Turks ſallyed forth with a ſhew to make head againſt the earle of Candales troups: but ſeeing themſelues too weake, they fled preſently backe againe into the towne. The Earle aduanced to enter with E them, but the port was ſo ſoone ſhut as they were in: wherefore they muſt of force ſet the Petard to worke. But whileſt they were making it faſt vnto the gate, there fell a ſhowre of great ſtones vpon the troupe, wherewith Don Pedro de Medicis (who would needs bee preſent) was ouerthrowne and halfe ſlaine; Callonge, Mont-terault, La Tour, Dauanes, and Deltour had taken vpon them the charge of the Petard, euery one carrying a part, to put it ſpeedily in execution.

The deſcription of Agliman.

Whileſt they were thus buſied to force the Port, the Sergeant Maior came vnto the Earle of Candale and told him, that there was a troupe of three hundred muſketiers come to charge him: theſe were two Beyes which came out of the gallies with their troups, by reaſon of the bad guard which the two companies that Montano had left to hinder their landing, had F kept. The Earle of Candale had left part of his troupe with the Petard, and turned head with the reſt againſt theſe Beyes to charge them: but they had no meaning to fight, but onely to make a ſhew, and ſeeing they ſhould be forced if they ſtaied longer, they tooke their way towards the mountaine, and in their retreat made many ſhot. The Chriſtians purſued them not, not, holding it fitter to returne to the Petard, the which plaied ſo happily, as it made a breach capable for three men to enter in front.

The ſquadron of the Knights of S. Stephen, commanded by the Commiſſary Lenzoni, and the company of the gallie of S. Mary Magdalen, with two ladders were to aſſault the high tower. The company of the Admirall gally with one ladder, had charge to ſorce the Port of the retreat; and the company of the Gally S. Iean was to fight with the gallies and veſſels in the hauen: all theſe troups (being led by the Generall Montano, and by Captaine Alexander of Tarentum, Sargeant Major) marched in order towards the fort. But the petard hauing effected as we haue ſaid, the Earle of Candale entered firſt with all his troup, and ſuddenly ran vnto the port of the retreat, there to apply a petard, the which alſo very fortunately made a breach. The Turks amazed at the noiſe and forcing of their gates, fled vnto their walls; ſome retiring into their towers, and others into the barricadoes which they had made in the ſtreet. At the ſame inſtant they planted two ladders on the lower part of the towne ſomewhat neere adioyning to the ſea, whereof one was broken with the loſſe of them that were vpon it: by the other (notwithſtanding that the Turks horſemen charged them behind) a good number of Chriſtians got vp to the wals, making their way by their arms, whileſt that the reſt put the Turks to route: hauing taken their Cornet, they forced the reſt for to flee vnto the mountaines. The ſquadron of Knights with the company of the gallie of Saint Mary, hauing had a longer way to march, came not to the tower vpon the hill, vntill that after the petards had wrought their effects: ſo as the Turks being retired thither, they found very great reſiſtance, beſides the attempts of the enemies horſe which charged them behinde; thrice they planted their ladders againſt the wall, and could not make them hold. Wherefore the Commiſſary Lanzoni, hauing performed as much as a braue and reſolute man could doe in that extremity, reſolued to leaue that place, and go to ſome other where he might be more neceſſary: but being the laſt to make the retreat, hee was ſhot through with two musket bullets, and ſuddenly ſlaine. The company of the gally S. Iohn, vanquiſhed the two gallies in the port, whereof Inghirami the Admirall at Sea went to take poſſeſſion as ſoone as they had giuen him a ſigne, hauing the other two veſſels at liberty.

A bloudy combat within the fort.

The Chriſtians get the victory.

Within the fort in the towers, and at the barricadoes, the combat was hot and dangerous, the Turks had deſpaire and the aduantage of the place on their ſides. The Chriſtians thruſt on by their valour and conſtant reſolution, preſt them on all ſides; there was nothing to be ſeene but bloud, wounded, or dead men; but much more of the Turks ſide than of the Chriſtians. In the end after a combat of foure houres, the Turks fainted, ſome were taken, many were ſlaine, and the Chriſtians obtained an abſolute victory: but as it could not bee made without loſſe of their enemies, who made great reſiſtance: ſo there were fiue and fifty Chriſtians wounded, of which number De Vic a French Gentleman was one, who had a musket ſhot through his thigh, going to charge a troupe of Turks which were retired into a tower: and ſome Gentlemen were ſlaine; amongſt the which was young Boiſſierre, a French-man, whoſe valour in this action made them that ſaw him fight ſo generouſly, conceiue a certaine hope that hee would haue prooued a valiant Captaine, if Heauen had lent him longer life. The ſorrow for his death was generall, as well among the Italian troupes, as among thoſe of his owne Nation. Vernegue and Villandre, two other braue French Gentlemen were alſo ſlaine. The dead and wounded were carried vnto their Gallies: they emptied the Fort of all the Artillery, munition for warre, and victuals; the trophy of forty Florentines heads was beaten downe and all the houſes ſet on fire. Agliman beeing thus ruined, they ſhipped their booty, with three hundred and fifty Turkiſh ſlaues, hauing freed about two hundred and forty Chriſtians which were in yrons. The two Turkiſh Gallies were drawne out of the Port, and carried away with eight other veſſels. In this triumph as the Admirall Inghirami bent his courſe towards Ligorne; vpon the way a Turkiſh Caramouſall came into the middeſt of the fleet, as into a toyle: It prepared to defend it ſelfe, the patrons gally inueſted it, but not without loſſe; for the Turks made ſo great reſiſtance, as there were aboue foureſcore Chriſtians hurt or ſlaine; the Earle of Candale fighting alone at the prow of the Gally, by the permiſſion of the Generall. But this Caramouſall being taken, and the Florentine marriners entered, it ſplit and ſunke ſuddenly. The great Dukes gallies encountered ſome other

A ſmaller veſſels, the which they tooke, and afterwards arriued happily at their Port.

The Voyage of the gallies of Sicily in the Leuant.

The twelfth of Auguſt following, Octauio of Arragon Generall of the gallies of Sicily, by the commandement of the Duke of Oſſunna, Viceroy in that Realme, parted from the hauen of Palermo, with eight gallies well armed and manned, to ſaile into the Leuant. His firſt touch was vpon the Iſland of Cerigo, where he vnderſtood that the Admirall Baſſa of the ſea was gone from Conſtantinople with thirty gallies, bending his courſe to the Iſland of Negropont, whereas ſixty others attended him in the hauen; and moreouer, that the gallies of Rhodes prepared to goe and ioyne with him, all which Nauall fleet was to fall vpon Soria, againſt the Turks Rebels.

They ſet vpon ten Turkiſh gallies.

Notwithſtanding theſe news, Octauio continues his courſe vnto the Iſland of Nicaria, where B he vnderſtood by a Greeke veſſell, that the Turkiſh Admirall meant to ſend twelue gallies to Rhodes, to guard certaine veſſels of the fleet, which came from Alexandria by the Channell of Samos. True it is, that of twelue which were together when they parted, two were ſent by the Bey or Captaine which commanded them, into the Iſland of Chio, ſo as there remained but ten together. Octauio reſolued to charge theſe ten, cauſing his fleet to row that day, and almoſt a whole night as ſecretly as they could, along the ſhore of the firme land of Natolia, and at the breake of day hee arriued at the cape of Coruo, twenty miles from Chio; from whence hee ſent his long boat to diſcouer. But in the meane time he himſelfe eſpied the ten Turkiſh gallies not far from him; at ſight whereof he ordred his gallies for battell, with ſuch diligence, as at Sun riſing he was about the enemies gallies, and had inueſted them. At his firſt C approch he diſcharged all his ordnance, and then with his Admirall gally he ioyned with the Turks gally which carried the ſtandard; the Spaniards entered, ſlew and maſſacred all that made reſiſtance: the combat began at the prow, from whence they went to the poope, whereas the Bey or Commander of the ten gallies ſtood, whom they forced to yeeld. In the meane time the other gallies of Sicily charged the Turks ſo furiouſly, as they tooke fiue, all great veſſels carrying lanthornes; two fled towards the land, hoping to ſaue themſelues, but the Turks had ſcarce leiſure to leape to land, and to fly into the country, abandoning their veſſels to the Spaniards, who purſued them; the other three gallies hauing gotten ſome aduantage eſcaped by flight: ſo ſeuen only came into the Spaniards power, in the which they had a very rich booty, freeing aboue a thouſand Chriſtian ſlaues, which were at the chaine, and by a D ſtrange change of fortune, putting into their places the Turks which had inchained them.
Among the moſt remarkeable of the priſoners, were the commander of the ten gallies called Sinan Bey of Grigna in the Iſland of Cyprus; the Bey of Alexandria (ſonne to Piall Baſſa, who was defeated in the battell of Lepanto, by Don Iohn of Auſtria) and ſome Raiſe or Captaines, and Patrons of gallies.

Sigiſmund Battori Prince of Tranſyluania dies at Prague.

This Summer the Emperor Matthias being gone to an aſſembly of the States at Presburg in Hungary, in the meane time Sigiſmund Battori, who had beene Prince of Tranſyluania, and ſo great a terrour and ſcourge vnto the Turks, as hee made Sinan Baſſa, hauing an army of one hundred and fifty thouſand men, to fly thrice within ten daies from before him, and would neuer endure the ſight of him, hee hauing but forty thouſand men in his army. But afterwards E being the author of his owne misfortunes and miſeries, by his inconſtant humours, he came and liued a priuat life at Prague, and there died of an Apoplexie. The Eſtates aſſembled at Presburg, conſulted of the fortifying of their Frontier towns, and manning them with good garriſons, knowing the infidelity of the Turks, and doubting that they would not obſerue the truce. But there was ſome queſtion in the aſſembly, touching the admiſſions of Germans into their garriſons: for that the Hungarians maintained they had a decree to the contrary; and yet they could not defend themſelues without the aſſiſtance of Germanes: but in the end it was concluded, that the Germans ſhould be admitted equally with the Hungarians into their garriſons, but all other ſtrange ſouldiers ſhould be excluded. The Turks in the meane time had burnt and ſpoiled many villages in Hungary and Tranſyluania, carried F away many Chriſtians captiue, and committed many other acts of hoſtility, ſo as all men feared a new warre in Hungary; but by the prouidence of God it was diuerted. For Sultan Achmat marching towards Tranſyluania with a mighty Army, hearing vpon the way that Bethlem Gabor was acknowledged Prince, vnder his protection, he turned head towards Conſtantinople.

ſtantinople. But rather for the affaires of Aſia, whereas the Rebels of Natolia had ſpoiled G and burnt many places; and a certaine Arabian had reuolted againſt him, and vſurped the title of King, hauing drawne vnto his party fifty thouſand Rebels, the which did ouerrun and ſpoyle the Countrey which yeelded obedience vnto him, threatening his Dominions with a greater ruine. Moreouer, the Portugals and Spaniards had made many incurſions vpon his places joyning to the Red Sea, and had taken and ſpoiled Aden, a place of importance: ſo as all theſe diſorders haſtened his returne into Thrace, to ſend forces againſt his Turkiſh Rebels, and his Spaniſh enemies. But approching neere vnto the Imperiall city of Conſtantinople, the Plague was ſo violent, as hee ſtaied at Adrianople vntill the end of this yeare, when as that horrible contagion ceaſed. Hee then came vnto the City, whereas he made a very ſtately entry; before him there marched his ordinary guard of fiue and twenty or thirty thouſand H Ianizaries, all the Baſſaes of the Court following him in very great pompe, and before him there marched on horſebacke two of his ſonnes, the pillars and hope of his affaires, the eldeſt beeing about ſeuen or eight yeares old. Paſſing before the Moſques, the Taliſmans or Prieſts of his law, made ſacrifices in his preſence for his proſperity, they ſlew ſheepe and oxen vpon Altars erected for that purpoſe, then they cut them in pieces, and gaue them vnto the people.

All the Dogs ſent out of Conſtantinople.

The Grand Seigniour beeing returned to Conſtantinople after the great Plague, notwithſtanding the Turkes hold a firme opinion of Predeſtination, and that they ſhall not die before their appointed time, and that the time of their death is written in their foreheads; yet apprehending the infection, by the aduice of ſome about him, hee commanded I all the dogges in the City of Conſtantinople, to bee tranſported vnto Scutary in Aſia (a Towne antiently called Chriſopolis) and for the due execution thereof, euery houſholder was to bring in his dogge firſt to the Cadi (which is the Iudge of the place) and to receiue from him a Tuſcany or Ticket for his paſſage, or elſe hee was to pay foure Chequines; by which meanes there were tranſported to the number of fifty thouſand dogges. The reaſon of his ſending them away, was, for that reading the Acts of his father, hee found that thirty yeares before, hee had ſent away all the dogges for feare of the infection. The Sultan commanded allowance of bread and fleſh to be carried euery day to ſuſtaine them, which not ſufficing, the inhabitants were much oppreſſed, and ready to fall into mutiny; but by the aduice of his Muphti, they were at length tranſported from thence to an Iſland that was not K inhabited, ſome ſixteene miles from Conſtantinople, where they all periſhed. Before their ſending away, the Grand Seigniour had propounded to his Muphti, to haue them all ſlaine: who made anſwere, That euery dogge had a ſoule, and therefore it was not fit to kill them.

The care of the Turks to win men to their Religion.

The Turkes are wonderfull glad when they win any one to their Religion, and ſeeke by all meanes to ſeduce them either by force or by faire perſuaſions; whereof you may ſee an aſſured proofe, by a Iew, who being turned Turke, ſoone after buying of grapes of another Turke, fell at variance with him about the weighing of his grapes: from words they fell to blowes, and the Iew-Turke beat the other, which hee endured very patiently to encourage him as it ſeemed in his new Religion. Soone after, another Iew came to the Turke who had L beene beaten, and demanded of him why hee had ſuffered himſelfe to be ſo abuſed? Who anſwered, You ſhall beat me as much as you will, turne Muſulman: ſo zealous they are to winne Proſelites.

A ſeuere puniſhment of a drunkard.

This yeare in October, the Turks obſeruing their feaſts of Bairan (which is our Eaſter) the which they obſerue twice a yeare; a Turke hauing drunke Wine too freely (the drinking whereof is forbidden amongſt them, although they loue it well, and drinke in priuate) was apprehended, and carried before the Grand Viſier: who ſeeing the fact verified, inflicted this puniſhment vpon him, to haue boyled lead powred into his mouth and eares, the which was ſpeedily executed.

Bethlem Gabor as you haue heard was ſeated quietly in the Principality of Tranſyl- M uania, the Sultan ſupported him, and had ſent Sarder Baſſa with an Army againſt Gabriel Battori who was then in poſſeſſion; but weake both of men, money, and friends, hee was not able to make head againſt them; ſo as beeing abandoned of his friends, and hated of his ſubjects,

A ſubiects for his tyrannie, he grew into deſpaire, and was ſlaine by his owne ſouldiers. Whereupon the countrey yeelding obedience to Gabor, Sarder Baſſa retired out of Tranſyluania with his Turks. Yet afterwards, ſome neerly allyed to Battori (deſiring to reuenge his death) cauſed ſome alterations; and others ſeeking to get a Prouince from the Empetour, had ſurpriſed Huſt and other places in his name. The Sultan hearing this, wrote his Letters to the Noblemen and States of the Prouince. They were not ignorant he ſaid, that ſince the time that Tranſyluania yeelded obedience to his predeceſſors and him, they had alwaies liued in peace vnder his protection, and had often deſired, and obtained ſuccour againſt their enemies: That when as Botſcay had been annoied by the Germans, aſſiſting him with great forces, he had ſhaked off the yoke: That when as Battori his ſucceſſour had liued after his owne will, they ſent B Bethlem Gabor with complaints to his Court by their generall conſent, and did eaſily obtaine forces to free the Prouince from tyrannie. Hee being taken away, now a wiſhed day began to ſhine, the clouds of tribulation being all diſperſed: That he had held Bethlem worthy to ſucceed Battori, and to enioy that Prouince. Wherefore he had commanded all the Noblemen to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, and to enioy a wiſhed peace: That Bethlem had ſent to aduertiſe him of the new practiſes of the Germans; wherefore he had giuen charge to the Baſſaes of Temeſwar and Agria, and to the Prince of Valachia, to be watchfull to repell all theſe iniuries; admoniſhing the Noblemen to yeeld ſpeedy obedience to Bethlem: to which end hee had ſent them thoſe letters, that vpon the ſight therof they might be admoniſhed of their duties; and if the Germans ſhould attempt any thing, they ſhould make reſiſtance till the comming C of his forces: and following Bethlem in al things, they ſhould acknowledge him for their true and lawfull Prince, and continue conſtant in their fidelitie, leſt they ſhould prouoke his wrath againſt them, and draw vpon themſelues ſome great miſery: writing much more to the like effect, concluding, That he had fully purpoſed and reſolued not to ſpoile any one village or any Fort in Tranſyluania, nor to do any wrong to any man, nor ſuffer it to be done by any other, but would defend that Prouince from all oppreſſion. Wherefore he would haue the Emperor aduertiſed, that if he meant to haue the peace inuiolably kept, hee ſhould cauſe the ſaid places of Tranſyluania to be preſently reſtored vnto the Prince, or ſignifie his mind vnto him by letters.

On theſe Rebels of Aſia, whereof wee haue made mention, the Gouernour of Sarepta or D Sidon in Syria, called Armill or Emir Facardin; he who gaue entrance into his Port to the Florentines, and receiued them in their courſes to the Leuant; hearing that the Baſſa of Damas, and the Baſſa of the ſea, with the gallies which he brought from Conſtantinople, and the threeſcore which he tooke at Negropont (whereof wee haue made mention) came to fall vpon him with a mighty and fearfull army, hee left his eldeſt ſonne within Sidon with forces to command there, and in other Forts about it, and flying from a furious tempeſt of enemies, hee went to ſea with three ſhips, to retyre himſelfe into Europe, with his foure wiues, ten children, ſeuenty Turks, and fourteene thouſand pound weight in gold. Hee arriued at Ligorne, and went from thence to Florence, vnder the protection of Coſmo de Medicis great Duke of Tuſcanie, whoſe hands hee kiſſed, preſenting vnto him a Cuttelas very curiouſly E wrought, and enriched with ſtone, and two jewels to the great Dutcheſſe, to the value of ſix thouſand Crownes. This Turke though hee had no faith, yet he found faith with this Prince of Tuſcanie. Coſmo receiued him, defrayed him and all his traine, furniſhed him with money, whether it were by way of gratification, or that Emir had conſumed his owne: and by all kinde of courteſies made this Infidell ſee what difference there was to flie vnto the protection of a Chriſtian Prince, or to haue recourſe vnto a Mahometane. They ſay that Emir had many goodly ouertures for the ſetling of the Chriſtians in Aſia: but to attempt it with a good and happy ſucceſſe, it ſhould be neceſſarie that moſt of the Chriſtian Princes would ioine their wils and armes together for the generall good of Chriſtendome. It is true, that the great Duke Ferdinand deceaſed, and Coſmo his ſucceſſour had made proofe of their F good intentions, by many generous enterpriſes againſt the Turke. But one Prince alone cannot do all.

Emir Facardin abandoneth Sidon.

These things paſt in the yeare 1613. the end whereof concludes with the fury of terrible tempeſts in the Mediterranean ſea. The tenth of Nouember a fearefull tempeſt full of lightning, thunder, and furious winds, was the cauſe of the loſſe of many gallies and ſhips in the port of Genoa, with a great number of perſons which were miſerably drowned. Which G loſſe was valued at aboue 800000 crowns. The port of Naples was not free from this ſtorm; and the gallies of Malta, with a great number of other veſſels receiued great loſſe.

The grand Signior hauing this year and the year before ſuſtained great loſſe of his gallies and frigots in the Mediterranian ſea, by the gallies of Naples, Malta, and Florence, and in the black ſea by the Coſſacks, who had taken two gallies well manned and richly laden; hee now impoſed a great tax vpon all his Chriſtian ſubiects, towards the reparation of that loſſe: ſo as he charged the Armenians to build him nine gallies at their owne coſts, and the Grecians twenty. Such is the Turks tyrannie, as he ſuffers not the poore Chriſtians to enioy any thing, but he finds means to pull it from them.

The grand Viſier Naſſuf held his credit with the Prince: at whoſe returne from Adrianople, many of the Ianizaries (to whom he was very odious) conſpired to kil him as hee ſhould H enter in at the North gate comming from Adrianople: and had placed themſelues there for the effecting of what they had intended: but comming neer the gate, the Sultan (ignorant of what was plotted againſt the Viſier) called for him to ſpeake with him, keeping him by him vntil he was entred into the city, by which means he eſcaped the intended practiſe. Soon after Naſſuf inuited the Sultan to a ſumptuous feaſt, and within few daies after the Emperour feaſted the Viſier; who preſuming vpon his great credit, cauſed all the croſſes in the Church of S. Sophia (which is one of the goodlieſt monuments in Conſtantinople) to be caſt downe, and all the images to be defaced: the which had ſtood entire euer ſince the Chriſtians Gouernment. I cruelty of the Perſian King.

The year before, the King of Perſia had put to death 1200 Armenians, vpon a falſe ſuggeſtion as if they had intended to reconcile themſelues to the Pope; as hating the Papiſts, yet ſuffering diuers Ieſuits to liue in his dominions. The Engliſh Embaſſadors Chaplein deſiring to know the reaſon of the Perſians cruelty, conferred with the Patriark of the Armenians which reſided at Conſtantinople (for there are two Patriarks, one vnder the Perſian, and the other vnder the Turk) who told him, that it was true he had miſerably ſlain many of their nation, by the cunning practiſes of an Armenian, who had counterfeited letters from the Patriark of Armenia to the Pope; by which the Patriark with his whole church of Armenians offered to reconcile themſelues to the Church of Rome, and to acknowledge the Pope for their head; intreating the Pope to write to the king of Perſia to giue them leaue to doe it freely. K Which letters the Pope receiuing, he rewarded the meſſenger bountifully, and returned Letters by him to the Perſian king, wherby he intreated him to ſuffer the Armenians in his country to vſe their conſciences freely. The King of Perſia hauing receiued theſe letters, grew into a great rage, cauſing many of them to be put to death; ſaying, That if they would be obedient to the Pope, he could expect no ſeruice nor obedience from them. Although the Papiſts ſay this was don directly by the Patriark, the Armenians affirm it was the practiſe of a counterfeit rogue. Soon after there arriued three Embaſſadors at Conſtantinople; the one was a Circaſſian, the ſecond a Georgian Biſhop, and the third a Mingrelian; all of them complaining of the Perſians oppreſſion and cruelty, and imploring ſuccors from the grand Signior for their ſupport. Preſently after there arriued a Perſian Embaſſador, whom the Sultan would not admit to audience, vntil all controuerſies were concluded betwixt himſelf and the Emperour, which was L then in queſtion; the Sultan hauing ſent one Gaſparo (ſometime a ſeruant in the Engliſh Embaſſadors houſe) to treat with the Emperor, by whoſe means at length all matters were reconciled betwixt them.

The fall of Naſſuf.

The year 1614 began by the horror of great prodigies, which were ſeen in diuers parts of Hungary and Sileſia. Ouer the ſtrong town of Vienna in Auſtria, the heauens grew ſored and fearfully darkned, as they feared that either the laſt day was come, or elſe there would follow ſome horrible effuſion of bloud. But all theſe ſignes had no other effect this year, but the ruine of the fortune and prodigious authoritie of Naſſuf Baſſa the great Viſier of the Turkiſh Empire; formerly one of the greateſt and moſt fearefull enemies which had caried arms M in Aſia againſt the ſoueraigne power of their Sultan. But to comprehend more plainly the fall and declining of his fortune, let vs behold him in his beginning and firſt riſing. He was the ſonne of a Greek Prieſt, borne in a little village neere vnto Solonica, and hauing beene taken by the Tribute, which the Turks exact from Chriſtians vpon their miſerable children, The beginning & progreſſe of Naſſufs fortune.

A taking one of three; hee was carried very young to Conſtantinople, and there ſold for three Chequines or Sultanines (euery one of which is not aboue eight ſhillings ſterling, to an Eunuch of the Sultans, who nouriſhed him and bred him vp vntill hee came to the age of twenty yeares, and afterwards ſold him to a ſteward of the Sultana's houſe, to ſerue him in his charge.
Who finding this ſlaue to haue a ſpirit capable of greater affaires than the houſhold, employed him in the ouerſight and building of a rich and ſtately Moſque, which the Sultana cauſed to be erected at her charge. In this place he gaue ſuch proofe of his wit and judgement, to the Sultana's content, that ſoone after ſhe gaue him the gouernment of her houſehold.

The Sultan had a will to imploy him in his ſeruice, and retyred him from the Sultana's B houſe into his Seraglio, where he was honored with the charge of the Capigi Baſſa or Captaine of the Porters or Vſhers of the Seraglio: from thence he was aduanced to the dignitie of the Baſſa of Aleppo, and ſoone after hee was made gouernour Generall of Meſopotamia.
The commodity of his gouernment, frontiring vpon Perſia, ſtirred vp his ambitious thoughts and his diſordinate deſire to become Soueraign of that countrey, and made him to entertain many practiſes with the King of Perſia, an antient enemy to his maſter. The report of his practiſes came to Conſtantinople, the Sultan is aduertiſed thereof, he knowes the ambitious and ſtirring ſpirit of this Naſſuf, and findes that he is very profitable for his ſeruice, if hee can by any milde courſe withdraw him from his diſloyalties and intelligences with the Perſian.
Wherefore he diſſembled the knowledge of his treacherous deſignes, and to gaine him the C more powerfully, he gorged his ambitious appetite with the greateſt dignitie of his empire.
After the death of Murath Baſſa hee honoured him with the place of grand Viſier, and gaue him a great part of his goods, and in his place made him Generall of the army againſt the Perſian, with promiſe to giue him his daughter in mariage. Thus was Naſſuf aduanced by his dexteritie, wit, diligence, and treacherie, to the greateſt charges of the greateſt Empire of the World.

He entred into Perſia as Lieutenant General of his maſters Army, with the which he made ſo great a ſpoile, that he forced Ka Abbas King of Perſia then reigning, to demand a peace.
And after that he granted him a ſurceaſe from armes, he brought his Embaſſadour to Conſtantinople, to conclude this peace to his maſters benefit, as we haue formerly obſerued. He D enters in pompe, preſents a million of gold vnto his Emperor, is wel receiued at the Seraglio, much made of by the Baſſa's, but more by the Sultan, who cauſed him to marry his daughter.
Fortune hauing thus aduanced him to the height of greatneſſe, not being poſſible to climbe higher, ſhe ouerthrowes him, and doth precipitate him to the loweſt degrees of miſerie. The Sultan fears his ſpirit, too head-ſtrong by reaſon of his ambition, he grows jealous of his actions, and about the end of the year concludes his ruin and death. The commandment is giuen to Boſtangi Baſſa, that is to ſay, the Sultans chief gardiner, and ouerſeer of his Seraglio and all his houſes, one of the goodlieſt dignities in the court. Naſſuf was at that time ſick in his houſe; Boſtangi goes thither to viſit him, and to cauſe him to bee ſtrangled, being accompanied onely with ſeuen or eight men; for that he would not giue any ſuſpition of the commandement E he had receiued from his maſter. Being come vnto his lodging he demanded to ſpeak with him, and Naſſuf excuſed himſelf by his ſeruants, by reaſon of the diſcommodities of his health. But the Boſtangi (who would needs execute his commiſſion) replied, That hee could not return to the Sultan (who had ſent him to haue certain newes of his health) before he had ſeen him, to be the better aſſured. At this reply Naſſuf grew diſtruſtfull, and would without all doubt haue bin far from thence in ſome place of Meſopotamia: but beleeuing whatſoeuer hapned to him was ineuitable, he commanded them to ſuffer the Boſtangi to enter: who at his firſt approch entertained him with many complements of curteſie; and hauing demanded ſome queſtions of him concerning his health, he drew out of his pocket a commandment from the Sultan to Naſſuf, to deliuer vnto him the ſeales of the Empire. The which beeing F preſently don, he drew out another commandement vnto him, by which hee was injoined to ſend him his head. Then Naſſuf cried out aloud, and deſired to ſpeak with the Sultan; but the Boſtangi anſwered, That he had no commiſſion to conduct him to the Seraglio, but to cauſe his life to be taken away preſently. Vpon this refuſall hee intreateth him to giue him leaue Naſſufs throat cut.

to waſh himſelfe in the next chamber, to the end that his ſoule (ſaid he) ſhould not depart G the world in the ſtate of pollution, according to the Turks beleefe, who hold the waſhing of the body for a true purification. This fauour was alſo denied him; hee ſaw there was no remedy in his miſery, nor any hope of grace. Boſtangi Baſſaes followers (which were ſeuen or eight Capigies) being come to take away his life, and enuironing his bed, which was an vndoubted ſummons that he muſt die; in the end hee reſolues, and turning himſelfe vnto theſe executioners, hee willed them to do their duties: whereupon they fell to worke, and caſting themſelues vpon him, they put a cord about his necke, and ſought to ſtrangle him; but ſeeing that the fatneſſe of his repleat body would not ſuffer them to take away his life preſently, they cut his throat with a knife. His death could not be diſpleaſing to the Chriſtians, ſeeing that all his deſignes tended to their ruine: he had perſuaded his Maſter to breake H the peace with the Emperour, the French King, and the Venetians, promiſing him to make him ſouereign Monarch of the whole world, to the end he might keep his ſpirit in action, and make himſelfe neceſſarie to his Maſter, and liue more ſafely in combuſtions than in a calme; whereas the enuy and malice of his enemies gaue him a thouſand furious aſſaults. Thus Naſſuf Baſſa ended his dayes and fortune; before Gouernour of Meſopotamia, Generall of an Imperiall army, and Grand Viſier of the Turkiſh Empire; aduanced to theſe ſupreme dignities by the great actions of his mind, but ouerthrown ſhamefully to his ruine by his boundleſſe ambition. Doubtleſſe it is a difficult thing for a fauorite that is inſolently audatious, to continue long in grace with his Prince; eſpecially when his vnreſtrained ambition hath once broken the bounds which reaſon preſcribeth to thoſe that Fortune aduanceth by the fauour I of her blaſtes; and that hee followes obſtinately that pernitious curioſitie to know by experience how high Fortune can aduance him: for then the deſire to enioy that which is aboue his condition, blinding the eyes of reaſon, he doth precipitate himſelfe by his raſh and inſolent actions, to the loweſt ſtep of ſhamefull ruine. The riches of Naſſuf were ſo great and proportionable to his fortune, as after his death they found about two buſhels of diamonds and pearles. Doubtleſſe this rich and ſtately ſpoyle deſerued to be enioyed by ſome great Prince. So the Emperour Achmat ſeiſed thereon, and applyed it to his Chaſna, or Treaſurie.

Another diſcourſe of Naſſufs death.

This death of Naſſuf is related after another manner by one who was then preſent in Conſtantinople, the which I haue thought good to ſet downe as I haue receiued it from him, K The Grand Seignior being much diſcontented with his Viſier, whither inſenced with ſuch as were neere about him, who both hated and feared Naſſuf, or doubting his great power; hee diſſembled his ſpleene, vntill he might find ſome opportunitie for reuenge: yet it was not ſo ſecretly carried, but Naſſuf had diſcouered the Sultans diſcontent, and laboured by great gifts both to the Sultana and others to pacifie him, prouiding notwithſtanding in the meane time for his owne ſafety, ſending horſemen dayly ouer into Aſia, meaning to paſſe himſelfe when he had gathered together a ſufficient ſtrength. But it fel out on the ſeuenth day of October, it being the Turks Sabbath, that the Moone about eight a clocke at night was much eclipſed, which made the Turks expect ſome great accident. The Grand Seigniour hauing formerly cauſed it to be bruited, That hee would about that time paſſe to viſit a new Moſque L which was then in building; whereupon all the ſtreets were hanged with cloth and arras, and as the cuſtome was, a crie went before, that The King commeth; at the noiſe whereof, Naſſuf (being then in his houſe) could not but deſcend to ſalute the Sultan as he paſſed by: But it was not the Grand Seigniour himſelfe, but his Boſtangi Baſſa, whom he had cauſed to be attyred like himſelfe, who being come before Naſſufs dore, and finding him ſtanding there, hee ſuddenly leapt vnto him, and told him that the Sultans pleaſure was he ſhould deliuer vp his ſeal: whereat Naſſuff being amazed, demanded what the Sultan meant to do? to whom the Boſtangi Baſſa replyed, That he knew not what the Princes pleaſure was, but if he would not deliuer it, he would returne with that meſſage vnto him. Whereupon Naſſuf drew the ſeale out of his boſome, and deliuered it. Then the Boſtangi Baſſa ſhewed him a warrant for his head, whereunto M he preſently ſubmitted himſelf, and then two Iamoglans ſtrangled him: his head was preſently cut off, and carried to the Grand Seigniour, and his body thrown into the ſtreet to be trampled on.

A It was thought that his death was procured by the wife of Cicala Baſſa of Babylon, who had been manzoled or depoſed from his gouernment there by Naſſuf, and was a little before returned to Conſtantinople, but could not be allowed by Naſſuf to haue any acceſſe vnto the grand Seigniors preſence. Wherupon he wrot a letter vnto the Sultan, wherein hee accuſed Naſſuf to haue conſpired with the Perſian to kill him; charging him with many things that were capitall. This letter he ſent by his wife, who was ſiſter to the grand Seignior, who comming to his ſpeech (although ſhe was watchfully obſerued by Naſſuf who was then preſent) left the letter in his chamber, and ſo departed. The grand Seignior finding this Letter, and reading it, was much inſenced againſt Naſſuf, and neuer quiet in mind vntil hee had his head.
He writes, that there were found in Naſſufs houſe eighty bags of gold, each bag containing ten B thouſand Chequines. After Naſſufs death, Mechmet Baſſa Admirall at ſea (who had married Sultan Achmats eldeſt daughter) was made chiefe Viſier. He was born in the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, and the firſt naturall Turk that was euer chiefe Viſier ſince Conſtantinople was won.

You haue heard in the laſt yeares relation, of ſome combuſtions which were growing in Tranſylvania; and how the Sultan had written his letters of an imperial ſtile vnto the Nobilitie and States of the Countrey; which letters were fixed vp in form of a Mandate thorowout all Tranſylvania, and in places that were neereſt vnto thoſe noblemen which held the Emperors party againſt Bethlem. At the ſame time Bethlem defeated certaine troups of the Garriſons at Lippa and Genoa, which ouer-ranne and ſpoiled the Countrey; ſo as the gouernors C of thoſe places were forced to ſend to Vienna, to demand ſuccors of men and money. A Chiaus arriued at that time at Lintz, bringing letters vnto the Emperor from the grand Seignior: The firſt point contained in them was, That his Imperial Maieſtie ſhould haue a care, that the peace made betwixt them for twenty yeares ſhould not be violated; and that for his part he deſired to obſerue it faithfully. 2. That in the name of his Imperial Maieſty they had ſeiſed vpon certain places in Tranſyluania, a Prouince which had been alwaies vnder his protection; which receiued her Princes from his hand, and the which he was bound to defend againſt all her enemies. 3. That the tyrannie of prince Battori had conſtrained him to giue forces to Bethlem Gabor, to diſpoſſeſſe him of the principalitie of Tranſylvania. That after the death of the ſaid Battori, he had inueſted Bethlem to gouern it in peace. 4. That ſince, he D had bin aduertiſed, how that ſome troups of ſouldiers in the name of his Imperiall Maieſtie, contrary to the articles of peace concluded betwixt them, had by force ſeiſed vpon the forts of Huſt and Viuar, and the townes of Nagipan and Tonaſe. 5. That hee had giuen charge to Bethlem, not to ſuffer any enterpriſe, no not vpon the leaſt village of his principalitie; to the end that nothing ſhould be ſeparated, and that he ſhould repel the iniury of the aggreſſor by force. 6. That hee exhorted his Imperiall Maieſtie, if hee deſired the continuance of the peace, to command his people to make reſtitution of the places vſurped; or to ſignifie his intention by the ſame Chiaus which he had ſent vnto him, to the end he might be fully aſſured: for the miſchiefe increaſing daily, the affection which hee bare to the good of peace might grow cold.

Achmats Letters to the emperor.

E The Emperour receiued this Chiaus at Lintz very honourably, and gaue him an anſwer of his Letter, wrapped in a piece of cloath of gold. The ſence whereof was, That this buſineſſe being of great importance, his Imperial Maieſtie deſired to confer with the Princes Electors and States of the empire to heare their aduice: after which he would acquaint him with his laſt reſolution. And finally, That hee ſhould reſt aſſured, that for his part hee would not attempt any thing contrary to the peace. In the meane time there was a petty Warre in Hungary, the incurſions and ſpoiles betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks beginning the ſame againe.
The Turkes of the garriſon of Agria going forth, tooke a great number of cattel from the Chriſtians. Eight hundred Haiduckes aduertiſed of this ſpoile, purſued them ſo ſpeedily, as they ouertooke them before they came within halfe a league of their retreit; when F they made them to leaue their prize, and put them to flight. The Baſſa of Agria aduertiſed of the defeat of his out-riders, goeth forth with a thouſand ſouldiers, to recouer the bootie from the Haiduckes, which they had but newly before taken from his men. But after a ſharp incounter, hee loſt his horſe and two hundred of his men, and was forced to make his retreit.

From thence the Haiduckes went and ſpoiled the Countrey about Solnoc: ſome others holding the waies of Strigonium or Gran, took a Turkiſh Bride with her baggage, who was going from Gran to Buda; and foure hundred Boot-halers (ſome of them Haiduckes, and the reſt Turkes, men which hold no party but their owne, to robbe with the more impunitie) ſeiſed vpon Balaſter, Micolut, and Felak: but at the recouerie of them they were ſo ill intreated by the Hungarians, as that moſt of them loſt their liues there, and the reſt were taken priſoners.

But the Emperor, who deſired to be reſolued in the important buſineſſe of Tranſyluania, aſſembled the Eſtates of Bohemia, Auſtria, Stiria, Carinthia, Carniola, Sileſia, Luſatia, Morauia, and Hungarie, his hereditarie countries; whom hee gaue to vnderſtand, That the peace was violated in Hungarie by the hoſtilities of the Turkes vpon the Chriſtians: to whoſe preiudice Sultan Achmat had ſubiected vnto himſelf the prouinces of Valachia, Moldauia, and Tranſylvania: this laſt being vnder the gouernment of Bethlem Gabor, who had made himſelf his Vaſſall. That the Sultan had ſent word vnto his Imperial Maieſty, That hee ſhould not pretend any thing there, to the end this countrey might bee wholly vnited vnto the Turkiſh Empire. Whereupon he earneſtly exhorted the aſſembly to conſider wiſely: Firſt whether Tranſyluania ſhould be left wholly in the Turks power: Secondly, why the Sultan would not conſent to the ratification of the Truce: Thirdly, of the means to make war, if the neceſſity of his affairs ſhould force him: Fourthly, to what end the Turke would hinder his Imperiall Maieſty, that he ſhould pretend no right to Tranſyluania: Fifthly, that the Turke had ſent him an Embaſſador, who contrary to the articles of peace, had not brought any Preſents: Sixthly, if they ſhould make a new accord with the Turke, to conſider aduiſedly, what aſſurance they might take, ſeeing that he would not conſent vnto the ſixth article of the peace.

The reſolution of the Eſtates.

The deſignes of Bethlem vpon diuers places.

He receiues forces from the Turks, and beſiegeth Lippa.

There opinions were diuers vpon theſe propoſitions; but all ioyntly conſented to maintaine the authoritie of the Imperiall Maieſtie. The Hungarians only intereſſed in their reſolutions to warre, by reaſon of the ſpoyle of their countrey, as a paſſage for all their troupes, they beſought the Emperour, that if hee meant to ſend any forces into Tranſyluania, they might haue commandement to march ſome other way, and not ouer their lands. Bethlem Gabor in the meane time laboured to recouer thoſe places which had been loſt. Wherefore he prouided himſelfe to make ſome attempts vpon Lippa, and other places; as at Borene, Genoë, and Arach. The Gouernours of theſe places gaue aduice vnto Forgatſi Lieutenant Generall to the Emperour in high Hungarie; repreſenting vnto him the eſtate of their garriſon, and the feare they had, that if Bethlem ſhould once get them into his poſſeſſion and power, he would deliuer them ouer vnto the Turke: That if they would ſend them ſuccors, they would rather endure all extremities than yeeld them to the enemie. Yet for all this, they make no haſte to ſend them ſuccours: and Sander Baſſa according to the commandement hee had receiued from the Sultan, hauing brought forces to Bethlem, the ſiege of Lippa was reſolued in the Eſtates of Tranſyluania. On the fiue and twentieth of October the Cannon being drawne out of Veradin to batter the Fort; Bethlem went to inueſt it, made his approaches, and battered it ſo furiouſly, as hauing made a reaſonable breach, it ſerued firſt for a paſſage for foure hundred men to eſcape, who left the Gouernour with very ſmall meanes to defend the place, and without hope of ſuccours from Hungarie; which made him come to a parley, promiſing to yeeld the place, to haue their liues and goods ſaued. The Forts of Genoë and Arach, were deliuered by the ſame capitulation. That theſe three places ſhould not be put into the Turks hands, but ſhould remaine perpetually vnited to the principalitie of Tranſyluania: and to take all intereſt from the Turks, the Eſtates of the Countrey ſhould pay vnto Sander Baſſa the charges and entertainment of his troups. Theſe places thus gotten by Bethlem, he manned them with new garriſons: the Imperials which were within them, being retyred to Forgatſi the Emperours Lieutenant in high Hungarie. But the Eſtates of Tranſyluania being aſſembled at Veradin, diſputed diuerſly, whether they ſhould reſigne theſe three places into the Sultans power: ſome repreſented the diſcontentment hee would haue if they were refuſed, and the inconuenience that might enſue: others were not of opinion that the Prouince ſhould be ſo diſmembred, giuing

A the moſt important places thereof vnto the Infidels. Thus without conſenting, or refuſing to deliuer theſe places vnto the Turk, the Eſtates concluded that prince Bethlem ſhould do therin what he held moſt neceſſary for the tranquilitie of the country; beſeeching him moſt humbly to free them from the Imperials, who had ſeiſed vpon Huſt and Viuar. Such were the affairs of Tranſylvania this year; a prouince diſtracted from the Emperors power by the Turks practiſes.

The Sultan cauſeth a platforme to bee made at Conſtantinople.

At Conſtantinople, Sultan Achmat being deſirous to beautifie the outward part of his Seraglio, with a goodly and ſpacious place vpon the ſea ſhore, he cauſed a platforme to bee made within the ſea, beeing eight hundred paces long, and one hundred and twenty broad.
The Prouoſt of Conſtantinople cauſed this his reſolution to be proclaimed; when as preſently B euery houſe ſent forth a man, and the chiefe of families themſelues laboured there in perſon. There might you ſee the Baſſa's ſerue as the ouerſeers of the Workmen, and the Ianizaries and Spahies carrying ſcuttles with a wonderfull alacritie; and at all houres of the day there was muſicke of diuers ſorts of inſtruments to eaſe their labour, and to incourage them to continue. The Viſiers going to view the Workemen, cauſed a largeſſe of pieces of ſiluer to be caſt among them. Thus the Sultan being ſerued with admirable diligence in this his worke of pleaſure, hee ſaw it finiſhed in three moneths, hauing beene begun in October this yeare.

Certain Ieſuites go to Mingrelia or Cholcos.

Whileſt that the Sultan imployed his leiſure after this manner in the ſtructure of a platform within the ſea at Conſtantinople, certain religious men departing from Pera, had a deſigne C to build another in the waues of infidelitie, but more profitable for the health of ſouls.
This was an imployment of the Ieſuites into the countrey of Mingrelia, in old time called Cholcos. Lewis Grangier a prieſt of this ſocietie, and two others of his order, with an Armenian for their Interpreter, parted from Thrace with this godly reſolution, to preach to the people far from God, the truth of his holy Word, and to guide them happily in the way to heauen.
He paſſed the Boſphorus of Thrace, and the famous caſtles of Leander and Hero, and cut thorow thoſe waues, whereas he that could not quench the fire of his paſſion, quenched the flame of his life: he paſſed beyond Pompeyes pillar, or rather that of the moſt happy Daniel Stylita, who erected his toward the mouth of this ſea; and about the ſixt of Iune this year they arriued at Verna, a famous town in Thrace; whereas a company of French ſoldiers (whom the D violence of neceſſity had ſome years ſince forced to leaue the Emperors ſeruice in Hungary) were in garriſon for the Turke, to defend his ſubiects againſt the incurſions of the Coſſacks: yet theſe Frenchmen do ſtil obſerue the Catholique Religion inuiolably. From thence hee ſailed toward Cordula, and by the incounter of a little gallion he entred into the port of Trabizond.
Within few daies after, he was caried in the ſame veſſel to Eriſſa in the countrey of Laxia or Laſſia, which on the one ſide lookes toward the countrey of Georgia, and the other that of Trabizond. The Chriſtian religion hath bin for a long time planted amongſt thoſe people, but very ill manured; for the fathers to free their miſerable children from the tribute wherewith the Turkes doe oppreſſe them, cauſe their children to be circumciſed after the Mahometan manner; and for the ſame conſideration they marry their daughters vnto Ianizaries.
E Moreouer, they abandon themſelues to the Mahometan impietie, to the end they may be deliuered from their inſupportable oppreſſions, and their Turkiſh yoke. The Ieſuits found there a good ſubiect to worke vpon for the help of ſoules: during their abode there, for certaine dayes they catechiſed the men, baptiſed the children, and aduertiſed the women married vnto Turks, what they were to do for the maintenance of their faith. But for that their commiſſion or charge was to goe vnto Mingrelia or Cholcos, they went againe to ſea, and ſailed towards Gouea, which is the fartheſt corner of the Black ſea. This hauen being verie vnfit to caſt anchor in, they followed the gallies which caried a Baſſa called Oneze from Conſtantinople, who ſhould treat of a peace on the behalfe of Sultan Achmat with the Prince of the Mingrelians, and diſpoſe him to pay a certain tribute. With theſe Veſſels they went F into a port called Macrogalo, nine miles from that of Gouea, holding this place more ſafe than the other. But doubtleſſe there is very little aſſurance whereas the waues and windes command ſoueraigntie. A North-weſt wind riſing about midnight on the fifteenth of September, draue their gallies neere vnto the ſhelfes and rockes, wheras one was broke and caſt away.

away. This tempeſt continued many daies,and during the violence therof another gally was loſt, in which the Ieſuits had bin, but by good aduice they retired to land during the fury of G the ſea and winds. The Ieſuits imputed the cauſe of this loſſe to the prohibition which Oneze the Baſſa had made vnto them, Not to paſſe into Mingrelia before the peace was concluded betwixt the Princes of that country; the which grew long, by reaſon of the difficulties which hapned in the treaty. In the end thoſe princes reſoluing to pay the tribute to the Turk,it was concluded.

The libertie of trauel followes peace; Grangier and his Companions proceeded in their journey: twenty daies after they departed from Macrogalo,they arriued at Satrapella,a place of Georgia; wheras the princes Viſier came to viſit them,and after the Georgian maner ſaluted them bare headed,and kneeling vpon one knee. Gorel Prince of the Georgians (who was H then at Barlet,wheras the Court was to paſſe the feaſt of Chriſtmas) being aduertiſed of the arriual of theſe new Chriſtian and French preachers,ſent for them, receiued them fauorably, and ſaluted them bare headed and kneeling. After that he had made them to bleſſe his court, he held many diſcourſes with them of the truth of the Roman church,& of the Popes power as Father of all Chriſtendom: being mooued partly thereunto, by a feeling of pietie to the Church,and partly from the inſtructions he receiued from the Ieſuits, ſo as inlightned with a new beam of the true light,he intreated Grangier to craue abſolution of his ſinnes from the Pope, the which (ſaith he) he may giue me by the power hee hath from God; promiſing to ſend him his confeſſion in writing. But vnderſtanding that the Ieſuite had power from the Pope to abſolue him,hee purged his conſcience of all his ſins, by a generall confeſſion of his I life. Without doubt the zeal of theſe ſoules,ſo far from ſuccor,ſhews plainly what the harueſt would be,if ſo many labourers were ſent as were neceſſarie. A Monke of Georgia,who had liued at Rome for the ſpace of twelue yeares,had in former time planted pietie there,the which they of this miſſion did now alter. This Prince Gorel intreated the Ieſuits to ſend him ſome of their company at their return into Europe,promiſing to make great eſteem of them, and to giue them a Church, an houſe, and all things neceſſarie for their maintenance. The prince offered them ſiluer, which they refuſed, modeſtly excuſing themſelues vpon the rules of their inſtitution,which forbids them to receiue any temporall recompence for the adminiſtration of holy things. Thus they parted from this prince, who commended much their maner of liuing,and cauſed them to be conducted to Satrapella, to continue on their journy K into Mingrelia.

The third of February, in the yeare of our Lord God 1615,they parted from this towne with the Turkes who came to conclude the peace; and paſſing by the banks of Faſſo (a riuer which doth water the Countrey of Cholchos, now called Mingrelia) they arriued at Herailcano,otherwiſe called Heraclea, and from thence they went to Margoula, whereas the Prince of the Mingrelians,called Dodran,then remained,being buſie in the reception of Threbis Cham King of Georgia,who was come thither to viſit him,being expelled his Country by the king of Perſia. The Ieſuites were brought to kiſſe the hands of prince Dodran, and of Lipartia his Vncle, who was Regent for the Realme during the time of his minoritie. They both promiſed them aſſiſtance in their affairs,ſending them to the towne Macaurie,to make their abode L there whileſt they were buſied in the affaires of their Countries, the which at that time were ſomewhat confuſed. The Biſhop of that place entertained them with very great demonſtration of loue, and ſoone after making a feaſt to Threbis Cham, or Prince of the Georgians, he would needs haue the Ieſuites aſſiſt at this banquet, for a great teſtimonie of his loue. It is the manner of thoſe of Cholchos or the Mingrelians,as well as the Georgians,to ſing at their meat. The Threbis Cham deſired, that the Ieſuites might ſing ſome note when it came to their turne, whereof they excuſed themſelues diuers times: But there was no remedy, they muſt do as others haue done: whereupon they ſung the hymne of Plange Lingua, &c. appointed for Holy Thurſday. Being thus fauourably entertained in Mingrelia, they make their reſidence at Mocaury, with hope to labour profitably for the health of ſoules, which erre in M that countrey through the darkneſſe of ignorance, for want of men to teach them the way of truth. They are Chriſtians of the Greeke profeſſion, vnder the commandement of diuers Princes, alwaies in warre either againſt the Turke or the Perſian: They carry the name

A of Cham,which is as much to ſay, as King or Souereigne Prince : The Sophie had diſpoſſeſt Trebis Cham chiefe King of Georgia of all his countries, in the yeare 1613, who had retyred himſelfe into Mingrelia, as you haue heard.

The Hiſtorie of Sultan Iacaia, held by many to the Emperour Achmats brother.

Whileſt thoſe men labour to ſow the ſeeds of true doctrine of the Apoſtles in the ſoyle of Mahometiſme,a Turke paſſing out of Aſia,comes into Chriſtendome to ſeeke the light of truth,and demands fauorable aſſiſtance and ſuccors from Chriſtian Princes, to enter into the poſſeſſion of the Empire,wherunto his birth and the degrees of a lawful ſucceſſion ſeemed to cal him by a iuſt title. The diſcourſe of his birth,of his fortunes,and of his pretenſions to the Turkiſh Empire,is comprehended in this following relation. He termed himſelfe the ſon of Mahomet the third,father to Achmat,now ſitting in the Imperiall Throne at Conſtantinople; B he maintained,that his father by foure wiues or concubines had had foure ſons; viz. Muſtapha who was ſtrangled,for that he would haue diſpoſſeſſed his father of his kingdom; Iacaia(which was himſelf) Achmat now reigning,and Oſman;yet it ſeems by the ſequell of the Hiſtorie,that he had another Muſtapha : that hauing bin ſent for to come out of Magneſia to Conſtantinople,his mother(who had bin a Chriſtian,and baptiſed vnder the name of Hellen,but was afterward ingaged in the company of Mahomet the third, for the worth of her beauty, and knowne in Turky by the name of Sultana Lalpare)could not conduct him to his father,for that he was dangerouſly ſick of the ſmall pocks. And this Princeſſe deſired much,to find ſome fauorable occaſion, wherby ſhe might be freed from the damnable errors of Mahomets law,and return to the wholeſome way of the Chriſtian faith, and retyre her ſonne Iacaia farre from the power of C thoſe bloudy lawes,which ſprinckle the Imperiall Scepter of him that comes to the Crowne with the bloud of his brethren;ſhe well foreſaw that Iacaia being but the ſecond of Mahomets ſonnes, ſhould one day by his death ſecure the life of Muſtapha his elder, and that the onely meanes to preſerue him, was to retyre him into Chriſtendome. Wherefore ſhe laboured ſeriouſly in this deſigne,and made vſe of a fauourable fiction; giuing it out,that her ſonne Iacaia was dead of the ſmall pockes; and hauing ſuppoſed in his place the ſon of an Eunuch dead of the ſame diſeaſe,aſſiſted at his funerall,and by her conſtrained teares ſubtilly diſguiſed her de-ſigne. An Eunuch called Aſtam Mehemet was the faithfull ſecretarie of her enterpriſe; with him ſhe leaues Magneſia,a Prouince in Aſia,and vnder pretext to goe vnto certain baths there by, ſhee gets her downe to the ſea ſide, paſſes into Europe, and tranſports her ſon into Mo-D rea, ſometimes called Helleſpont, and lodgeth him (as vnknowne) in the Biſhops Palace in the towne of Miclo. Iacaia was aboue nine yeares old; ſhe held him not ſecure at Miclo,but tranſported him into Macedonia, vnder the habit of a Greeke Monke,and retyres him into the towne of Caſſandria; where ſhe diſcouers vnto the Archbiſhop of Theſſalonica, a man learned and of a holy life, the qualitie of her ſonne, and the deſire ſhee had to make him a Chriſtian : intreating him in charitie to take them both into his protection. This Archbiſhop lodgeth the mother in the Monaſterie of Religious women of our Lady of Theſſaloni-ca, and giues the cuſtody of the ſonne vnto an Abbot of Saint Michael, a man learned in all Sciences, vnder whom hee profited wonderfully, as well in the Greeke Tongue as in many goodly arts. I do well know this to be true, for that I haue conuerſed with him for the ſpace of E ſix moneths, and haue ſeene him often in the companie of learned men ſpeake the Greeke with as great facilitie as his Turkiſh and mother tongue. He continued in this Monaſtery vnder the care and gouernment of this learned Abbot, vntill the age of ſeuenteene yeares; that is to ſay, for the ſpace of eight whole yeares; during which time, his Mothers tears,the holy inſtructions of the Abbot (but rather the Diuine fauour) made him to enter into the way of his ſoules health,and become a Chriſtian. The Archbiſhop of Theſſalonica clenſed his ſoule from the pollutions of the Law of Mahomet,and baptiſed him in the Church of Saint Anaſtaſius, without the City of Theſſalonica; yet ſecretly, for feare leſt the Eunuch comming to diſcouer this miſterie, ſhould abandon him, and publiſh abroad the place and eſtate of his ſolitarie aboad,and ſo be miſerably taken. Thus Iacaia calling himſelfe Sultan,being already F in ſome aſſurace of the Crowne of heauen by the promiſes of Holy Baptiſme, whileſt that hee was in the beginning of his pretenſions to that of the Turkiſh Empire, he leaues the Monaſterie where hee had been inſtructed; and in the companie of the Eunuch trauels vp and down Greece,paſſing away (in the length and varietie of his voyage) the impatiencie of his age & deſires,for that he would not be known,he takes vpon him the habit and the licenſe of a Dervis or religious Turk. But when he came to the city of Siopia,hee vnderſtood of the death of the Emperour Mahomet the third his father,and the rejoycing for the new aduancement of Sultan Achmat to the Empire; learning at the ſame inſtant, that Muſtapha his elder brother had bin ſtrangled by the commandement of his father. The diſpleaſure which hee conceiued for that he had not bin bred vp at Conſtantinople with the reſt, to receiue ſo rich a Crown as that of the Turkiſh Empire,made him to wauer in diuers reſolutions; ſomtimes he would go into Perſia to haue ſuccours from him, and with him to make warre againſt his brother: ſomtime he would ſerue for a ſupport and countenance to the Rebels in Aſia, and juſtifie their party.

After many diſcourſes with the Eunuch touching his affairs,he ſends him vnto the ſon of Peri Baſſa,a Rebell againſt Achmat: the Eunuch treats for his maſter, and receiues from him the Rebels oath,and returning to Tarlis, where the Sultan Iacaia remained,he conducted him to Peri Baſſa, to be the head of his troups. Iacaia arriues, and ſees himſelfe obeyed by an army ready to fight: for the Deſtarder or Treaſurer beeing ſent againſt the rebell Peri, with ſeuen thouſand horſe,and three thouſand foot, was already vpon the banks of the riuer Bardate,ready to giue him battel. The Baſſa's troups (being leſſe in number of fighting men) went to aſſail him. There was a ſharp incounter,but in the end the Deſtarder was victor, & the troups of Peri Baſſa defeated, and Iacaia being wounded in four places of his body,was forced to ſaue himſelfe on the other ſide of the riuer,where wandring vp and down the fields, hee found relief with a poore countrey peaſant, and ſoone after with an Abbot there by, who entertained him,and cauſed him to be cured; holding him to be one of the Deſtarders pages,as he himſelfe ſaid.

His wounds being cured,Iacaia returnes again towards Greece,where he finds his mother, conferres with her,and ſoone after with the Eunuch,of the eſtate of his affaires;and concludes with both of them,to ſend to Conſtantinople,to the Viſier Deruis (who at that time was diſcontented with the Emperor Achmat) to ſound his diſpoſition,and to ſee if hee might gaine him to his party: The Eunuch vndertakes the voyage,he ſpeaks with the Deruis,and finds him diſpoſed to entertaine the offers of Iacaia: The conſpiracie was concluded,and they ſweare to kill Achmat,and to ſettle Iacaia in the Imperiall Throne. Hereupon he tranſports himſelfe to Conſtantinople,in a diſguiſed habit:but when as they were ready to execute their enterpriſe (ſay they) the Deruis died;be it that the Emperor Achmat had diſcouered their deſigne, or otherwiſe. Thus Iacaia being fruſtrate of his hope to effect any thing by this means, he left the City and fled towards the blacke ſea, and then wandred into the countries of Valachia, and Moldauia,following the Carock of a Poland Embaſſador on foot, vntill he came to the City of Cracouia, whereas Fortune had laid a ſnare for him, which brought him in danger of his life;for a Chiaus being come from Conſtantinople, and knowing him,he deſired the King of Poland in his Maſters name, to ſtay him, aſſuring him that by this meanes he ſhould ſtrictly bring vnto him the affections of Sultan Achmat: the King refuſed his vniuſt demand,holding himſelfe much honoured to ſee his Court the refuge of vnfortunate Princes. After this refuſal the Chiaus flies to trecherie;he corrupts certaine Tartarians of the Kings guard with money,who promiſed to murther Iacaia;and doubtleſſe they had performed it,if a Flemiſh Embroiderer had not aduertiſed him,and lent him his lodging for certain daies to hide himſelfe; after which he freed himſelf from danger,and paſt to Prague towards the Emperor Rodulphus who was then liuing.

In this Imperiall Court hee found reliefe, and meanes to eaſe his forepaſt miſeries: The Emperour furniſhed him with all things neceſſarie: Hee ſpent a whole yeare there, and was acknowledged during his abode, by many Turks which came to Prague, for brother to their Emperour Achmat. There wanted nothing but ſuccours to effect his deſignes: But hee finds nothing but good words and faire wiſhes at Prague; ſo as hee was forced to ſeeke the effects elſewhere. Certaine Saxons that were his friends, aduiſed him to paſſe to Florence to Ferdinand the great Duke of Tuſcanie: hee takes directions from that Princes

A Embaſſador reſiding at Prague, and goes on his journy: but entring into Italy, he heares that Ferdinand was dead; theſe mournfull news made him to reſolue to ſeeke ſome other place, if Coſmo ſucceſſor to Ferdinand, and the great Ducheſſe his mother, had not called him backe. He came then to Florence, where he was honorably entertained, and lodged for the ſafety of his perſon in the Fort of S. John, where he was ſupplied with all ſorts of commodities. The great Duke Coſmo gaue him the title of Excellencie, appointed him horſes and caroches, and ſuch companie as he delighted in, for the pleaſure of hunting. He had not ſtaid long at Florence, but he ſaw himſelfe aſſiſted with ſuch forces as he deſired. The great Duke Coſmo cauſed his gallions to be armed, ſending them into the Leuant, vnder the command of the knight Beauregard, where hee had conference with Naſſuf Baſſa, at that time chiefe of the Rebels of B Aſia. He offers him men, armes, any money, if he would come to land, and march towards Perſia, whither many Rebels were retyred. But he who commanded the Florentine gallions, had no commiſſion to leaue him in the hands of Naſſuf: wherefore hee carried him backe to Florence to his Highneſſe.

During the time that Iacaia was aboord the gallions, the great Duke ſent diuers perſons into many parts of the Leuant, to informe themſelues carefully of theſe things which he had deliuered, not onely touching his owne perſon, but alſo of his Mother; and they all brought backe certaine proofes of the truth of his diſcourſes. This gaue the great Duke ſubiect to impart this faire occaſion vnto Spaine, to labour for the common good of Chriſtendome. He wrote vnto the Catholique King, and informed him of the quality of Iacaia, to the end that C contributing ſuccours to his perſonage, they might vndertake ſome happy enterpriſe againſt the Turke. The King of Spaine was content he ſhould be ſent to Naples: commanding the Viceroy to giue him a reception fit for his quality. Iacaia went on his journy, being accompanied by ſome, by the great Dukes commandement: but according to the newes which he receiued from Naples, he ſtaid at Auerſo, where he was receiued by the Gouernour with much honour. The Viceroy came to viſit him, gaue him the right hand, and the title of Excellency. But as the councell of Spaine was tedious in their reſolutions, and delayed too long (as Iacaia ſuppoſed) the ſuccours which he expected; hee parted from Auerſo to go to Millan, and from thence in a diſguiſed habit paſt again into the Leuant, to ſound their wils that might aduance his pretentions, and bring them to a happy end: but he preuailed as little as he had don before. D Beſides all theſe voyages which we haue deſcribed, to the end he might leaue no means vnattempted to aduance his affaires, he went to Rome to kiſſe his Holineſſe feet. Cardinall Bellarmine receiued him, gaue him the right hand, and the title of Excellencie: the Pope aſſured him of his affection and ſuccors; but it was neceſſary the ſecular powers ſhould begin to leuy men, and make the firſt ouerture to war.

Since, we haue ſeene him at France and at Paris, vnder the protection of the Duke of Neuers, entertained by the bounty of this Prince, and aſſiſted by his Councell: and doubtleſſe if the troubleſome combuſtions of a ciuill war had not diuerted the armies of this duke, we had ſeen ſome happy ſucceſſe of the affairs which he treated in Loraine, Germany, and other places, to the ruine of the Turks, and the good of Chriſtendome. Finally, as for this Turke called E Iacaia, terming himſelfe eldeſt brother to the Emperor Achmat now reigning at Conſtantinople, and for ſuch acknowledged by many: yet ſome affirme (yea ſuch as haue conuerſed in the Eaſt) that Sultan Mahomet had but three ſons, which were Muſtapha, Achmat and Oſman? Notwithſtanding it is hard to diſcouer in this perſonage any ſignes of an impoſture. I haue often frequented with him, and carefully obſerued his carriage and actions: and haue alwaies noted in him a carriage and minde borne to great matters. This is all that wee could learne of this man.

Tyrannie of Stephano.

Stephano or Tomſha, of whom we haue made mention in the yeare 1612, hauing ouerthrown Conſtantine the lawfull Prince, and made himſelfe Vayuod of Moldauia, by the ſupport and tyrannie of the Turke; as he held it by vſurpation, without any iuſt title, ſo he gouerned with F all cruelty and inhumanitie, preferring crueltie before clemencie, and imitating that tyrant, who ſaid openly, That he reſpected not the loue of his ſubiects, ſo as they feared him. Euen ſo this Stephano at his firſt entrance plotted how hee might root out all the Noblemen in the Countrey, whom in their language they call Boyets, with all others of credit and authoritie in the countrey, both for that they ſupported Conſtantine, as for the jealouſie he had of them, being beſt able to reſiſt his tyrannous deſignes: being alſo the common diſpoſition of ſuch as vſurpe any eſtate by wicked practiſes, to be alwaies in feare to be diſpoſſeſſed, and to be entreated according to their merits. He began firſt with the Lord of Botacan brother to the Princeſſe widow to Ieremy, whom he cauſed with two others of the chiefe Noblemen to bee miſerably and inhumanely empailed, as if they had been two notable theeues and murderers; and not content herewith, ſoone after, hee cauſed threeſcore and fifteene Boyers to be apprehended, cutting off all their heads, and would not pardon any one, notwithſtanding the great inſtance that was made by their kinsfolkes, charging them with the crime of treaſon, as if they had conſpired againſt his perſon, hauing no proofe at all: but theſe his cruelties did nothing daunt the Boyers, as Stephano had perſuaded himſelfe; but contrariwiſe they were the more inſenced, and many of them tooke armes openly, and had then ſeiſed vpon him, bin reuenged of his cruelties, and ſet their country at liberty (which had not been ruined as it was afterwards) if he had not bin aſſiſted by the Citiſens of Yas; whom he conjured to ſecond him in this occaſion, promiſing them immunities of all ſubſidies: In regard of which promiſe, theſe poore wretches preferring their priuat profit before their publique ſafety, imploied themſelues in the ſeruice of this tyrant, and fought valiantly againſt the Boyers, who were come to aſſault him in the City of Yas; But finding that he was better aſſiſted than they expected, after ſome light skirmiſh they retyred as well as they could, whereof many were taken priſoners, whom the tyrant cauſed to be ſlain in cold bloud, or empailed to terrifie the reſt.

The Boyers which eſcaped from this defeat, knowing that there was no hope of mercy in Stephano, who was full of reuenge; nor by conſequence any ſafety in Moldauia during his gouernment, they reſolued to haue recourſe vnto the Princeſſe (widow to Ieremy) who had fled into Polonia when as ſhe receiued news of the taking of her ſonne Conſtantine. This Princeſſe vnderſtanding from the Boyers of the tyrannous gouernment of Stephano, and that moſt of the Moldauians were reſolued to ſhake off the yoke of his tyranny, and deſired to haue prince Alexander in his place, remembring the good vſage they had receiued from the deceaſed Prince Ieremy his father. Theſe conſiderations, together with a deſire of command vnder her ſonne (who was then but ſixteen yeares old) were ſtrong motiues to perſwade both her and her ſonne to imbrace this occaſion, the which they imparted to Prince Viſinouiskie ſonne in law to the Princeſſe; and to Prince Coresky, who at that time aſpired to marry her yongeſt daughter: Theſe Princes not only allowed of this deſigne, but they offered themſelues willingly to accompanie Prince Alexander into Moldauia, and to take the whole care of his army. This reſolution being taken, they preſently imploied all their credit to leuy men, and had within leſſe than two months drawn together ten or twelue thouſand foot and horſe, Polonians, Coſſacks, and Tranſyluanians: whereof the Vayuod Stephano being aduertiſed, he preſently leuied what forces he could, of Moldauians, Tartarians and Valachians, hauing drawne together an army of almoſt 20000 men, which hee kept about Yas, and there reſolued to attend the Princes of Polonia.

The Fort of Cochina yeelded vnto Prince Alexander.

Prince Alexander being aduanced with his army within two leagues of Caminithe in Podolia, hee was much troubled to paſſe the riuer of Nieſtre, which diuides the countrey from Moldauia, fearing the Fort of Chochina, in the which there was a ſtrong garriſon of Moldauians, and ſtore of munition to defend the paſſage of the ſaid riuer: but it fell out happily for Prince Alexander; for the Captaine which commanded in the ſaid Fort, being much diſcontented at the cruelties of the Vayuod Stephano, came voluntarily of himſelfe to offer his ſeruice to Alexander, and brought him the keyes of the Fort, leauing all to his diſpoſition; ſo as hee paſt his army eaſily into Moldauia, and in ſigne of ioy diſcharged many vollies of his great Ordnance, which made Stephano diſtruſt the affections of the Moldauians, and to feele a pricking in his conſcience, which doth neuer abandon tyrants and vſurpers.

1500 Tartarians defeated by the Coſſackes.

Prince Alexander making ſome ſtay with his army at Cochina in the yeare 1615, aduanced towards Yas, and being come within halfe a daies journey, he ſent forth eight hundred Coſſackes (choſen out of a great number) to diſcouer the countenance of his enemies army: but they were not farre aduanced, before they encountred 1500 Tartarians, ſent by

Stephano

A Stephano to giue ſome charge to the Polonians. Although the Coſſackes were fewer in number, yet finding the Tartarians in diſorder, they charged them ſo reſolutely as they defeated a great part, and put the reſt to rout. After which exploit they brought word to Prince Alexander, that Stephano's army might be about the number of fifteen thouſand men; but they were ſuch as were gathered vp in the country, and not trained vp to armes, who were rather drawne to it by conſtraint than of their free will, and therefore were not much to be feared. This happy ſucceſſe, together with the report made by the Coſſackes, did greatly encourage Alexanders army, being alſo much inſenced againſt Stephano for certaine letters which he had written to their Prince, full of threats, as if both he and they had been already at his mercy, the which did the more encourage the Polonians, and made them reſolute rather to die fighting, than to B fall into the hands of this cruell tyrant. The ſame day there came certain deputies of the Moldauians to Prince Alexander, without the priuity of Stephano, to know what his deſigne was, and to intreat him to take pitty of Moldauia, which was threatned with a ſpeedy ruine, if the war continued any longer: to whom the Prince made anſwer, That his intent was not to oppreſſe Moldauia, but to free it from the tyranny of Stephano; that he had beene inuited by a great number of the Boyers, who had come vnto him into Polonia to that end, and had giuen him aſſurance, that it was the common deſire of the Moldauians. That vpon this confidence he had marched with what forces he could draw together, and that if he did preuaile in his deſignes (as he aſſured himſelf with their aſſiſtance) he would gouerne them with no leſſe mildneſſe than his father Prince Ieremy had done, whoſe ſonne and lawfull ſucceſſour he was. The C deputies returned well ſatisfied with this anſwer, and hauing publiſhed it in diuers places, many Moldauians came and joyned with the Prince his army, and aſſiſted him faithfully in this action.

In October Prince Alexander aduancing about three leagues with his army, hee made a ſtand in a faire Champion where there were good Springs to refreſh them, and in the meane time he called a Councell at warre, to reſolue what courſe he ſhould take, and when he ſhould draw the enemy to fight. In the meane time he had ſent a troupe of Coſſackes to diſcouer the army; who brought word that they were ranged in battell, and that they had twenty cannons ready in front, the which did not much amaze Prince Alexander, for that ſome daies before, the Generall of Stephano's artillery had ſent to aſſure him, that if he gaue battell, he would D annoy his men as little as he could, hauing a deſire to ſerue the Prince, and by this meanes be reuenged of Stephano, who had cauſed his brother in lawes head to be cut off, vpon a falſe ſuſpect which he had conceiued againſt him being innocent. The which ſhould teach Princes, that nothing doth procure them more ſecret enemies than cruelty, and that at one time or other they in whom they moſt rely abandon them when as they leaſt expect it. The Vayuod Stephano meaning to make a ſecond diſcouery of the Princes army, ſent 1200 Tartarians, and two or three hundred Moldauians, who being ſeene a far off (for that it was in a plaine champaine) the Prince ſent 500 Coſſacks with 400 Polonian lances to encounter them: The Tartarians perceiuing it, made a ſhew at the firſt as if they would retire, to draw them by little and little from the campe; and being about a league off, they made a ſtand, thinking that they E durſt not charge them: but they were ſoone deceiued, for the Polonians fell vpon the Tartarians with ſuch fury, as they ouerthrew them, and ſlew moſt of them, ſo as there eſcaped not aboue fiue or ſix hundred, who retyring to their campe cauſed a great amaſement. The Princes army was much encouraged by this exploit, and increaſed daily in number, as it is vſuall in ciuill war to follow that party which hath the firſt aduanced.

The Generall of Stephano's artillery reſolues to betray him.

Preſently after this execution, the Prince meaning to aduance his army towards the enemies campe, his forewardneſſe was ſtaied by a battalion of one thouſand horſe, who had the night before ſeiſed vpon a narrow paſſage, betwixt a poole and a mariſh, by the which they knew the Polonian army muſt paſſe: but this obſtacle was ſoone taken away, by the aduice which was giuen by certaine Moldauians, to ſend a company of horſemen by a way vnknown F to the enemy, by which meanes they might ſurpriſe them behinde, before they ſhould be diſcouered. The execution of this ſtratagem was giuen to the Coſſackes, who ſpeedily went, being guided by certaine Moldauians; who comming within fifty paces of the enemy vndiſcouered, they charged them, and were ſeconded ſo fitly by the foreward, that ſtaid on the other ſide; as of one thouſand horſe there returned not aboue fifty to their campe, to carry G newes of their bad ſucceſſe.

Prince Alexander hauing happily opened this paſſage, he aduanced with his army within cannon ſhot of Stephano's campe. Prince Viſnouiskie was of opinion, that they ſhould make a kinde of incloſure with their carts, which might ſerue them as a fort, hauing no place of retreat within ten leagues; the which being diſcouered by Stephano, hee ſhot certaine vollies of cannon through their fort, ſo as there were ſome ſouldiers ſlaine, and ſome hurt: and the Prince anſwered him with the like, but to ſmall effect, for that night ſurpriſed them, neither had they aboue eight ſmall pieces. Prince Viſnouiskie ſpent the night to encourage his ſouldiers, letting them vnderſtand that they had no reaſon to be amaſed, although their enemies were more in number, for that moſt of them were peaſants, neuer trained vp in armes H nor ſeene battell; whereof they had had good proofe in many encounters, where they had euer beene victors ouer their enemies, although they were inferiour in number: That they were ſo many teſtimonies and aſſurances that God did fight for them, and would vſe them to puniſh the tyrannies of Stephano, and his cruelties againſt Moldauia. Finally, if they were victors (whereof he doubted not, if they did their duties) there was not any one but ſhould returne loaden with rich ſpoiles and recompences from Prince Alexander. This did ſo encourage the ſouldiers, as they proteſted all with one voice, rather to die than to faile of their duties. Moreouer, the Princes gaue the Collonels and Captaines to vnderſtand of the intelligence they had with the Generall of Stephano's Artillery, wherewith they were much comforted. I

The diſpoſition of the two armies.

The next day being the eleuenth of October, they began to put their Armies in battell, during the which there were diuers skirmiſhes, wherein Alexanders party had ſtill the aduantage; ſo as it ſeemed they were ſo many preſages of good Fortune which ſhould befall them that day. The Princes army was ordered by Viſnouiskie, to whom Prince Alexander had giuen the charge of Generall, as moſt capable, hauing ſundry times giuen ſufficient proofes of his ſufficiency and valour in other battels. This Generall ſeeing Stephano's horſemen diuided into three ſquadrons, and the Tartarians moſt aduanced, he appointed the Coſſackes to encounter with them: the which was judiciouſly and diſcreetly done, for they both goe freely to the charge, neither are they couered with any armes, but only with the skinnes of certaine beaſts, wherewith they make themſelues to ſeeme as fearefull as they can, obſeruing no order K in their fighting, and vſing cries which are fearefull to ſuch as are not accuſtomed vnto them; and being once broken, they ſeldome returne againe to their charge. The Polonian Lanciers called in their language Houſſarskie, being about one thouſand and fiue hundred men well armed, made the ſecond battalion of Alexanders army, led by Prince Coreskie, and were placed on the right hand againſt three thouſand Tartarian, Valachian, and Moldauian horſemen. The Hungarian foot being about three thouſand men were in the middeſt of Prince Alexanders Army, with the cannon, vpon a little hill of ſome aduantage; and on the left hand was the reſt of the Chaualry, who were led by the Princes Alexander and Viſnouiskie; and the baggage was a little behinde the foot of the campe where they lodged the night before. L

The battell betwixt Prince Alexander and the Vaynod Stephano.

The tyrant Stephano hauing diſpoſed his Army into diuers ſquadrons, began about nine of the clocke in the morning to play with his cannon vpon Alexanders Army, who found that the Generall of the Artillery had kept his promiſe, for moſt of the bullets flew ouer his men and hurt them not; vpon which confidence hee commanded the Coſſackes to charge the Tartarians which were aduanced, whom they ſoone defeated. At the ſame inſtant two thouſand light horſe gaue charge to the Hungarian footmen which guarded Stephano's cannon, and in an inſtant cut moſt of them in pieces, and the reſt yeelded themſelues; ſo as Alexander became maſter of his cannon. The tyrant ſeeing his Infantery in danger to bee defeated, and his cannon loſt, cauſed a battalion of three thouſand Valachian and Moldauian M horſemen to aduance, who without doubt had recouered the cannon, but the generous Prince Coreskie with his Polonian Leunciers charged them ſo furiouſly in the flanke, as that they ſlew almoſt the one halfe of them vpon the place, and put the reſt that remained to rout. Preſently after this followed another ſquadron, the which Coreskie perceiuing, he

A he wiſely retyred towards his campe, ſeeing his men wearied and tyred with the ſlaughter of their enemies, and not able to maintaine the fight without ſome reſt. Then came Prince Alexander, and Viſnouiskie who was his faithfull guide, with the reſt of his horſemen to encounter this laſt battalion of the enemy, whereunto they went with greater courage, for that they were aſſured the Vayuod Stephano was there preſent; which charge continued for the ſpace of a quarter of an houre, during which time Prince Coreskie had leiſure to take breath, and to gather together what poſſibly hee could of thoſe of his party, to ſuccour them that were then in fight, who were almoſt tyred, and Prince Alexander farre ingaged. But ſeeing theſe vnexpected ſuccours, hee and his men recouered their forces, and their enemies were ſo much amaſed at it, as that all them that remained aliue were put to rout and B fled.

Stephano's army defeated.

But Stephano (being naturally a coward) apprehending blowes, had retired himſelfe to the reſt of his footmen, who had not yet come to fight, making a ſhew that hee would rather die with them than fly away; but ſeeing the euent of this laſt charge, and his horſemen all in rout: he ſoone reſolued to ſaue himſelfe by flight, hauing neuer giuen one ſtroke in this battel. The footmen which remained being about foure thouſand men, ſeeing the ſucceſſe of the battell, yeelded to the mercy of the victors, and cryed out, God ſaue Alexander Vayuod of Moldauia. The day of the victory Prince Alexander made his entry into the City of Yas, hauing the Princes Coreskie and Viſnouiskie on either ſide, after whom followed his whole army. Entering into the caſtle he was there proclaimed Prince and Vayuod of Moldauia by all the No- C bles and Boyers of the country, the which he would neuer accept vntill that time. The next day Prince Alexander vnderſtanding that a great number of the chiefeſt of the inhabitants of Yas were fled into the mountaines and forreſt to attend the euent of theſe troubles, he ſent certaine Boyers to inuite them to returne backe againe (with all aſſurance) to their houſes, cauſing part of his Army to diſlodge, and to be quartered in the country thereabouts; and there were one thouſand and fiue hundred foot, and fiue hundred horſe (vnder the leading of Prince Coreskie) ſent to the city of Vaſſelloy, for that Stephano had fled that way, and might returne backe againe into Moldauia. As for the Artillery, ſome were ſent into Polonia, and ſome were put into the fort of Çochina, the which is as it were the Arſenall of Moldauia.

Alexander proclaimed Prince of Moldauia.

D At the ſame time Prince Alexander knowing that it was no leſſe glory to preſerue than to get, hee called the chiefe Noblemen of his Court to Councell, to reſolue what was fit to doe to maintaine him and his eſtate, which hee had newly gotten by the ſword: where it was concluded among other things, that hee ſhould ſpeedily ſend an Embaſſadour to the Grand Seigniour, to let him vnderſtand that hee had neuer any intent to take armes againſt his Majeſty, nor to withdraw Moldauia from his obedience; but that hee had beene ſought vnto being in Polonia, and inuited by the Boyers of Moldauia, for the vnſpeakeable cruelties of the Vayuod Stephano, who had reſolued to root out the Nobility of the ſaid Countrey, hauing put many of the chiefe to death without any occaſion. They had alſo charge to giue the Sultan to vnderſtand, That when his Majeſty aduanced Stephano to E be Vayuod of Moldauia, he had falſely ſuggeſted that hee was ſonne to a Prince of Moldauia; that hee was not truely aduertiſed by his Baſſaes and Counſellours, that his predeceſſour had promiſed to the deceaſed father of Prince Alexander, and to Prince Semeon his vncle, that after his deceaſe his ſonnes ſhould ſucceed him in the ſaid eſtate, if they ſhewed not themſelues vnworthy, and did pay the yearely tribute of forty thouſand Chequines, which tribute ſince the death of Ieremy had beene offered by Prince Conſtantine, his eldeſt ſonne, to Houſſine Aga, when as hee was ſent to ſettle the ſaid Stephano: as alſo that Prince Alexander promiſed to pay it hereafter; and if need ſhould be, he would giue Prince Bougdan his brother as a ſure and certaine pledge for the performance of his promiſes during the firſt yeare.

Embaſſadours ſent by Prince Alexander to the Grand Seigniour.

F The Embaſſadours hauing receiued theſe inſtructions, they tooke their journey ſpeedily to Conſtantinople: But in ſtead of paſſing through Thrace which was their directeſt courſe, they were forced to goe by Tranſyluania, fearing to be hindered by the men of warre which then troubled all Thrace. Comming to Buda they went to ſalute the Baſſa which G commanded there, who being a ſpeciall friend to Stephano, put them in priſon, violating the Law of Nations obſerued by the moſt barbarous; and afterwards he ſent them to Braille whither the tyrant Stephano had fled. They ſay he gaue fifteene thouſand Chequines in recompence to the Baſſa, and to reuenge himſelfe in ſome ſort of Prince Alexander in the perſons of his Embaſſadours; he cauſed their heads to be cut off one night after ſupper, and their bodies to be caſt into the Danowe. The death of theſe Embaſſadours was very prejudiciall to Prince Alexander, by meanes whereof the Grand Seigniour was not truly aduertiſed of what had paſt in Moldauia, not receiued the complements, offers, and ſubmiſſion of Prince Alexander, ſo as he was wonderfully inſenced againſt him, and ſware his ruine, as you ſhall heare hereafter.

Stephano hauing receiued foure thouſand men from Michna Prince of Valachia, and gathe- H red together the reliques of his ſcattered army, he marched towards Valachia; whereof Prince Alexander being aduertiſed, he ſent Prince Coreskie with ſix thouſand horſe, Polonians and Coſſackes to Ticouch a ſtrong frontier towne, to guard that paſſage: And Prince Alexander and Viſnouiskie, they ſtaied at Yas with the reſt of the army to preſerue the country, and to preuent all alterations in fauour of Stephano, who had ſome intelligencers. Within few daies after, the Prince had newes that the Inhabitants of Horreoua (a Countrey in Moldauia conteining about fifteene or ſixteene French leagues in circuit) were in armes, and had ioyned with a great troupe of Tartarians to come and inueſt him, knowing well that Prince Coreskie was otherwiſe emploied with part of the Polonian army. Alexander ſtaied not to haue theſe Re- I bels come to Yas; but ſent Viſnouiskie his brother in law with ſuch forces as he could draw together to encounter with them. They met together within two leagues of the city, where Viſnouiskie charged the Tartarians with ſuch fury, as halfe of them were ſlaine vpon the place, and the reſt of them fled: there were a great number of priſoners taken, and all the poore inhabitants of Horreoua were brought vnto Yas in token of triumph. The dead being numbred, there were found about eight hundred Tartarians and others ſlaine, and of the Polonians only fifty, and ſome hundred hurt.

Prince Alexander hauing receiued newes of this defeat, was wonderfully glad, and went preſently to horſebacke with his company of French, which hee had onely reſerued about him, to goe and meet with Viſnouiskie, and to congratulate his happy victory. This being K done with many complements and embracings, he caſt his eie vpon the poore inhabitants of Horreoua, whom they led like a troupe of ſheepe; and had ſuch commiſeration on them, as he preſently ſent them backe againe, hauing taken their oath of fidelity, hoping that this his clemency would draw the moſt factious to obedience, hauing formerly tried the oppreſſions of a moſt cruell Prince. Prince Alexander hauing giuen thankes to God for this new and vnexpected victory, he ſent a Gentleman vnto Prince Coreskie, to aduertiſe him thereof, who at the ſame inſtant was buſie to diſpoſe of his troupes to meet with Stephano, who returned into Moldauia. The encounter was in a plaine Champaine, hauing on the one ſide the riuer of Sirette, the which diuides Moldauia from Valachia: the skirmiſh continued from tenne of the clocke vntill it was noone with like aduantage; but Prince Coreskie L being aduertiſed that Stephano was in a ſquadron of horſe which was ſome two hundred paces diſtant from him; he ioyned vnto his troupe foure hundred Gerbeyes, who were well armed, and led by a very valiant Captaine, with the which he charged him with ſuch violence and fury as hee forced them to giue backe, yet fighting in ſuch ſort as the euent ſeemed to be doubtfull: the which being diſcouered by another of the Princes Captaines, who led a troupe of foure hundred light horſe: hee came ſo fitly to ſuccour him, as Stephano and his horſemen were forced to fly, whom the Prince purſued and cut in peeces. Stephano eſcaped with a troupe which he had reſerued rather for the guard of his perſon, than to fight. Prince Coreskie at his returne from the chaſe of his enemies, cauſed the dead to be numbred, where he found that of Stephano's ſide were three thouſand and foure hundred men ſlaine vpon the M place, beſides thoſe that were priſoners and wounded; and of his part only three hundred and fifty.

Stephano defeated the ſecond time.

Preſently

A Preſently after this victory, the ſeaſon of the yeare being cold (it beeing the twelfth of Nouember) Prince Coreskie put his troupes into garriſon, and returned with one hundred and fifty horſe to Yas, where hee was receiued with much honour and joy. The princeſſe mother to Alexander, was yet in Poland, but being aduertiſed of her ſonnes fortunate ſucceſſe, ſhee returned to Yas, and brought with her Prince Bougdan her youngeſt ſonne, with Alexandrina her daughter, who was yet to marry. At whoſe arriuall there was great feaſting and joy; then they began to treat of a marriage betwixt Prince Coreskie and the princeſſe Alexandrina, the which had beene then conſummated, if Bellona had not oppoſed it, ſtirring vp new and more powerfull armies than the precedent, to exerciſe the vertues and valours of the ſaid princes, and to try the patience of the two louers, who loued one another reciprocally from B their youth.

To continue the deduction of new affaires which troubled the quiet of the ſaid Princes more than euer, you muſt vnderſtand that about the end of Nouember this yeare 1615, they were aduertiſed that Michna Prince of Valachia with a Baſſa called Hebraim, came againſt them with an army of forty thouſand men, Turks, Tartarians and Valachians, to ſuccour the Vayuod Stephano: and moreouer, that Bethlem Gabor prince of Tranſyluania, had charge from the Grand Seigniour to arme againſt them, and to aſſaile them; which in effect was a falſe alarme; for the ſaid Baſſa had beene ſent by the Grand Seigniot to bring Caphtanes (which are robes of cloath of gold which the Grand Seignior doth vſually ſend in fauour to Princes that are vnder his power) both to Michna and Stephano, who he held to be in peaceable poſſeſſion C of Moldauia; but not with any army, nor with an intent to make war againſt the ſaid Princes; for he was yet ignorant what had paſſed againſt Stephano. Notwithſtanding the Princes holding this aduertiſement to be true, aſſembled a Councell of the chiefe Noblemen in Court, where it was reſolued, That an Embaſſador ſhould be ſpeedily ſent to Prince Michna, both to know his intent, and to diſcouer whether he marched toward Moldauia, and with what forces. This charge was giuen vnto a braue Gentleman of Polonia called Boyartſkie, who parted preſently from Yas, and being entred into Valachia, he vnderſtood that prince Michna was then in his towne of Bonza, ſome twenty French leagues diſtant from the frontiers of Moldauia. The Embaſſadour being arriued demanded audience before Michna, by whom he was ſent vnto the Baſſa, who at his firſt enterance (without hearing the ſubject of his Embaſſage) D demanded, who had made his maſter Alexander ſo bold, as to carry armes in the country of the Grand Seigniour without his authority; for the which hee ſhould be puniſhed, and thoſe that did aſſiſt him: commanding the Embaſſadour preſently to be put in yrons, as if he had beene a theefe or ſome miſerable caitife. The Embaſſadors ſeruants ſeeing how they entreated their maſter, eſcaped as they could, fearing the like; who returning to Yas, enformed prince Alexander what had paſſed, aſſuring him that Michna had no army ready, nor any intent to enter into Moldauia at that time. The Baſſa diſdaining to ſpeake any more to the ſaid Embaſſadour, he gaue charge to ſome of his officers to examine him particularly of all matters concerning Alexander, and what forces he had: and within few daies after he returned to Conſtantinople, leading the ſaid Embaſſadour thither with him. But as ſoone as they were E arriued, they ſent the Embaſſadour vnto the Diuano, where he was againe examined by a Viſier, and in the end he was condemned by him to the gallies there to remaine perpetually. So little account do theſe barbarous people make, to violate the Law of Nations, eſpecially with Chriſtians, preſuming that all the World ſhould bow vnto them, as if they were gods vpon earth.

An Embaſſador from Prince Alexander to prince Michna.

There was another Embaſſadour ſent by Prince Alexander vnto Bethlem Gabor who was prince of Tranſyluania, being at Fureuar or Alba-Iulia, whom he receiued very courteouſly; to whom the Embaſſadour deliuered the ſubject of his charge. That Prince Alexander his maſter had beene aduertiſed that he made ſome leuie of men to joyne with Michna prince of Valachia, and to make war againſt him; the which he could not eaſily beleeue, for that he F had made profeſſion of friendſhip to his deceaſed father, and had no cauſe now to leaue it; entreating and conjuring him, not to meddle in the affaires which hee had to decide with Michna; and that in requitall (if any occaſion were offered to ſerue him) he would employ all his meanes. The Embaſſadour hauing ended his ſpeech, he deliuered his Princes letters of credit: To whom Bethlem Gabor made this anſwer, That hee neuer had an intent to take armes, nor to attempt any thing againſt Prince Alexander, whoſe father was his true friend; neither would he euer giue any cauſe to diſcontinue this loue and friendſhip betwixt them, wherefore he would giue good proofe in all occaſions, eſpecially in this ſubject now in queſtion. The Embaſſadour was much ſatisfied with this anſwer, the which was alſo confirmed by letters; yet he afterwards leuied forces againſt prince Alexander, but he would not joyne with Michna his army.

To returne to the courſe of our Hiſtory; preſently after the Baſſa his departure from Cicouch to returne to Conſtantinople, prince Michna ſent an Embaſſadour to Alexander with Letters, by the which he excuſed himſelfe for the ill vſage of his Embaſſadour by the Baſſa, proteſting that he was much grieued, and that it was not with his conſent that he had carried him with him, promiſing to employ his beſt meanes to mediate his deliuery. Moreouer, that hee was not ignorant what authority and power the Grand Seigniour had ouer him, whom he might not reſiſt, nor by conſequence his Baſſaes; that he had no army on foot, as he was giuen to vnderſtand, and that his deſigne was not to ſupport the cauſe of the Vayuod Stephano, vnleſſe he were forced by the commandement of the Grand Seigniour. And whereas he entreated him to deliuer his enemy Stephano into his hands, hee could not do it, vnleſſe hee ſhould violate the lawes of hoſpitality, in betraying his friend who had fled vnto him for ſuccour, and withall hee ſhould incurre the indignation of the Sultan, and be in danger to be diſpoſſeſſed of his owne eſtate, hauing no ſufficient meanes to maintaine himſelfe againſt ſo great a power. Prince Alexander hauing heard this Embaſſadour, and receiued an anſwer from the prince of Tranſyluania, by the aduice of his Councell diſmiſſed all his footmen, and part of the Coſſackes, retaining only fiue or ſix thouſand men with him during the Winter.

Prince Viſnoniskie poyſoned by a Prieſt.

About this time there was one of the moſt curſed and impious acts committed that euer was heard of. Prince Viſnoniskie who was a Proteſtant of the Greeke Church, hauing prepared at Chriſtmas to receiue the communion after their manner, the Prieſt (who had vſually ſerued him in that deuotion, being corrupted with money by his enemies) poyſoned the bread; which the prince hauing receiued, he ſuddenly fell ſicke, and his torments were ſo violent, as he died the next day. This bred a ſuſpition that he had beene poyſoned; whereupon the prieſt was apprehended, who preſently confeſſed that he was guilty, and had beene prouoked by his enemies. As his offence was terrible, being committed by a man of that Coat, who had made vſe of ſo reuerend a Sacrament, to poyſon a prince beloued of all men for his rare vertues; ſo his puniſhment was very ſeuere and long: being bound in a chaire made of copper wire, and a fire made round about him, ſo as he was heard for twelue houres crying out fearefully for the inſupportable paines which he endured. Whileſt that prince Alexander and his whole Court mourned for this fatall and vnexpected accident, there arriued a ſpy which hee had ſent into Valachia to obſerue the actions of prince Michna, who gaue him to vnderſtand that there was a Baſſa arriued called Skinder, with a great and powerfull Army, and that Stephano was there in like manner, who preſſed them dayly to march into Moldauia; and to begin the warre, hee ſent foure hundred men to ſurpriſe the Towne of Berlada, whereas prince Coreskie had left part of his men in garriſon during the Winter: who keeping bad guard, were ſurpriſed and moſt of them cut in pieces; which ſo puffed vp Stephano with pride, as he aſſured himſelfe of an eaſie victory. But Prince Alexander hearing of this defeat, hee ſent foure hundred Coſſackes, who made ſuch ſpeed, as within three daies after they arriued at Berlada a towne not walled, no more than the reſt, where hauing ſet fire in many places, they forced his men to come forth, cutting them in peeces, and the reſt were burnt; ſo as there eſcaped not aboue fiue or ſix to carry this bad newes vnto their maſter, who was much afflicted.

At the ſame inſtant, when as the Coſſackes were ſent vpon this expedition, prince Coreskie deſiring to be reuenged for the defeat of his men, tooke two thouſand fiue hundred choice horſe, and put himſelfe ſpeedily into Vaſſelloy, fearing the garriſon he had left there would

A be in like manner ſurpriſed: whereof the Baſſa being aduertiſed, by ſome of the countrymen, he ſent his ſonne (being twelue or thirteene yeares old) and gaue him an old Turke of great experience for his conductor, with ſeuen thouſand men, holding this a good occaſion to get reputation to his ſonne. Prince Coreskie being aduertiſed of his march by ſome Moldauians, and that they ſhould ſurpriſe them early in the morning, knowing that they were of neceſſity to paſſe a bridge of wood ouer a riuer that runs by the towne, he diſpoſed his men in ſuch ſort as that the enemy could hardly diſcouer them: ſome of them were lodged within Vaſſelloy, and the reſt were couered with a little mountaine that adjoyned vpon the towne: when as ſome of the Turks had paſſed the bridge, two ſquadrons ſallied from the towne, and charged their forward ſo furiouſly, as they were in a manner all put to the ſword, and amongſt B them the conductor of the whole troupe, the which was no difficult thing to execute; for that the Turks who had marched in a maner all night, to arriue early in the morning, were benummed and halfe dead with cold; the reſt of the Turks which had not yet paſt, hearing the noyſe of this hot alarme, durſt not aduance, but retyred ſpeedily, fearing perchance that the Baſſaes ſonne might be loſt as well as his conductor. Prince Coreskie purſued them vnto a village foure leagues diſtant from Vaſſelloy, killing and taking priſoners all he found in the way. Among the priſoners there was one who gaue it out that he was neere kinſeman vnto the Baſſa, who being brought to prince Alexander, he receiued him very courteouſly, and gaue him a garment fit for him, hauing beene ſtript of his owne, he alſo gaue him a horſe, and ſent him backe vnto the Baſſa with a good conuoy, to whom he ſent a letter, by the which he in- C treated him not to aduance in fauour of Stephano, promiſing that if the Grand Seignior would ſuffer him to enjoy Moldauia quietly, hee would be moſt faithfull vnto him afterwards, and pay him the yeerely accuſtomed tribute: whereof the Baſſa made no great account; for hee was wonderfully incenſed, both for his ſonnes bad ſucceſſe in this enterpriſe, and for the death of the Turkiſh captaine.

Vpon the day of this victory, prince Alexander ſent fifteene hundred horſe to fortifie prince Coreskie, whereof eight hundred were lodged in a certaine Borough ſix leagues from Ticouth, whereas the Baſſa and Michna were then with their army, being about fiue and twenty thouſand men. Theſe eight hundred men neglecting their guards, did nothing but drinke drunke, and moleſt their hoſtes with all kinde of inſolencies, and forcing their wiues and daughters, D which made them take a reſolution to be reuenged, and to that end they called vnto them certaine Boyers out of the country, who chuſing their time, cut all their throats when they were aſleepe, and moſt of them drunke.

About the end of this yeare prince Alexander called a generall councell, whereas the princeſſe his mother, prince Coreskie, and all the chiefe noblemen and captaines aſſiſted: where it was reſolued that they ſhould returne to Chochina, being thirty French leagues off; for that it was the ſtrongeſt place and the beſt furniſhed of all Moldauia, and withall they ſhould be far from their enemies, and neere vnto Polonia. According to this reſolution, prince Alexander parted the next day with his whole army, and came in ſome daies march to Cochina, in the extreameſt cold ſeaſon that could be; hauing lodged his troups, the princes ſent di- E uers Gentlemen to all their friends and confederates, to coniure them to come ſpeedily to ſuccour them, and in the meane time they gaue order to make prouiſion of victuals, and of all other things neceſſary for their army. The Baſſa being aduertiſed of this retreat, he marched with Michna and Stephano towards Yaſſi, notwithſtanding the extremity of the cold, which was ſo violent that many died vpon the way; whereupon they ſtaied vntill the time was more milde.

Prince Alexander returnes to Cochina.

In the beginning of March, the Lord of Viſchneuitki came vnto prince Alexander with 3500 Coſſackes, and within few daies after arriued the Lord Potoskie, nephew to him who had been taken at the firſt battell, and carried priſoner at Conſtantinople, who brought with him a troupe of fifteene hundred Polonians well armed: there came alſo other ſuccours vnto him, F ſo as by the end of that moneth the princes army was ten or twelue thouſand ſtrong foot and horſe.

Succours come to Prince Alexander.

Prince Alexander hearing of the enemies approch, he ſent forth a thouſand horſe with his company of French Caualliers to diſcouer the enemies army, who ſtaying to refreſh themſelues within halfe a league of the towne of Eſpanocha, whereas Michna his Tartarians were lodged; they were diſcouered and preſently inueſted by them and by a great number of Turks; and although that there were little hope to reſiſt ſo great a multitude, yet Alexanders men (who had alwaies beene accuſtomed to vanquiſh) behaued themſelues very valiantly, deſiring rather to die, than to yeeld baſely without giuing proofes of their valour. This fight continued from ten of the clocke in the morning, vntill night; and of the whole troupe there eſcaped but twelue, ſeuen Polonians, and fiue French, the reſt were either ſlaine or taken priſoners, among the which was the captaine of the French company called Mounteſpin, whom they would haue ſent with the reſt to the Grand Seigniours gallies: But Stephano preſerued him, vpon promiſe that he would doe him good ſeruice. Heere Fortune (which had hitherto beene fauourable vnto Prince Alexander) began to ſhew her inconſtancy, to teach Princes not to runne raſhly into dangers, although they haue had ſome aduantage ouer their enemies.

At Conſtantinople about the end of Auguſt this yeare 1616, Enuie, the moſt furious of all the windes that ſhake the affaires of the World, ſtirred vp a horrible tempeſt, whoſe violent guſts fell dangerouſly vpon the Ieſuites ſettled at Pera by the Sultans permiſſion, at the perſuaſion of Henry the fourth, the French King; and labours to caſt them vpon the rocks where they might ſuffer ſhipwrecke, ſhamefull to their Order, and prejudiciall to the Chriſtians which liue in the middeſt of Mahometiſme. And to ruine them without all hope of helpe or reliefe, they accuſed them before the Grand Viſier, to be ſpies to Spaine; to giue abſolution to renegadoes; to baptiſe Turks, to conceale fugitiue ſlaues, and to ſend them into Chriſtendome; and withall they objected the doctrine of killing of Kings, if they were tyrants, the which had beene raſhly written by a Spaniard of their Coat: all which crimes are commonly puniſhed at Conſtantinople with death. They ſeiſed vpon their perſons, and lodged them in a dungeon, they were ſix in number, that is to ſay, Francis Bouton, Denis Guilier, Dominick Maurice of Chio, and Iohn Baptiſta Iobert their ſuperiour, all foure Prieſts, and two aſſiſtants, and with them a Franciſcan Friar, Vicar to the Patriarch of Conſtantinople. A ſuſpition of danger in an eſtate is eaſily beleeued vpon the leaſt accident. In the meane time the Emperours Embaſſadour came to Conſtantinople, to renew the truce; they entered with their drummes beating, and their enſignes diſplaied. They which thought to erect trophies to their glory by their ruine of the Ieſuites, made vſe of this entry, and gaue falſe aduertiſements to the Seraglio, that there were in Conſtantinople, and at Pera many thouſands of Chriſtians diſguiſed in the habites of Greekes and Turks, which came with this Embaſſadour, with an intent to put that in execution which the Ieſuites had projected. Moreouer, they enformed the Grand Viſier, and the Muphti, that the Churches in Pera, and the Embaſſadours houſes were full of armes; and that now when as the Turks eſtate, and eſpecially Conſtantinople, was vnprouided of forces, hauing employed their armies in diuers places, and at one inſtant, as in Poland, Perſia, and both the ſeas, that they meant to draw the Greekes into rebellion, and giue an entry to the Coſſackes, by the blacke Sea. The Sultan and his Baſſaes tooke an alarme, they commanded euery man to weare the habit of his owne Nation, with a prohibition to weare any hat except the Frankes, and they to weare a Grecian habit; They alſo inrolled all the Chriſtians in Conſtantinople and Pera. But the Sultan did not thinke his Imperial City of Conſtantinople free from the danger of ſurpriſe by this diligent ſearch, but he would ſeeke his aſſurance in the bloud of the Chriſtians, ſo as he commanded that all the Frankes ſhould be ſlaine without exception. But yet this commandement took no effect, by reaſon of the remonſtrances which the grand Viſier and the Mufti made him, repreſenting vnto him, That by this cruelty he ſhould draw vpon his eſtate a dangerous Warre from all the Chriſtian princes in generall. But all this freed him not from fear; he walks all night vp and down the City, contrary to his vſuall cuſtome, and he cauſed a Frier, Vicar to the Patriarch, who had beene taken with the Ieſuits, to be executed in his preſence; and hee doth expreſſely forbid the paſſage from Conſtantinople to Pera, and from Pera to Conſtantinople.

During this prohibition, the French Embaſſador had paſt from Pera to the city, to ſolicit the Ieſuits libertie. At his return he had found the paſſage ſtopt, he goes vnto the Mufti, and leaues

A leaues his people in the meane time at the ſea ſide (for it is the cuſtome, to goe to the Soueraigne of Mahomets law with a ſmall traine) during the time of his being there, a multitude of people ran downe to the ſhore, to ſee theſe men, thinking for certaine, that they went to put them to death: They lamenting their miſerable fortune, and the Turks charging them furiouſly with injuries, as the men whom they thought practiſed by conſpiracy their ruine. But the grand Viſier hauing written with his owne hand, and ſent one of his people to them that kept the paſſage, the Embaſſadour with his whole traine was ſuffered to paſſe to Pera, but he found the ſtorme as raging at Pera as from whence he came: for one night after, the people of that place fell into ſuch a fury, as it was to be feared the law of Nations would haue beene violated by the inſolency of ſome furious people, although the ſubject were of ſmall importance. B About fiue hundred paces from the French Embaſſadours quarter, there fell out a diſpute in a lodging, betwixt ſome who ſpent the night in ſome kinde of emploiment: the Turks that dwelt neere, being awaked with this noiſe, ran to armes, and trouped together in the ſtreet, beeing in all a thouſand men armed, crying out, that this noiſe came from the Franckes, (that is to ſay from the Chriſtians in the Weſt, as Italians, French, Spaniſh, Engliſh, and others) who meant to riſe; and they reſolued to force the Embaſſadours houſes, and to put all to fire and ſword, if ſome better aduiſed of the troupe had not perſuaded them to delay the execution vntill day, the which being come, the French Embaſſadour had meanes to get the Sultan to interpoſe his ſoueraigne authority, to bridle the inſolency of a multitude inconſiderately inſenced. Such is the danger in the which many times the miniſters of C Chriſtian Princes find themſelues, who for their Maſters ſeruice liue at the mercy of a Nation barbarouſly furious, as the Turkiſh.

A tumult at Pera.

The Ieſuites in the meane time continued priſoners in the dungeon, vntill that the Baron of Sanſy Embaſſadour for France, had let the Grand Viſier ſee their innocency, and procured their liberty, and the Sultan by his letters Patents did publiſh the falſehood of the malicious accuſations inuented againſt them: but to auoid the fury of a multitude blind in their paſſions, and dangerous in their fury, they went to ſea to returne to France: but after they had ſojourned ſometime at the Dardanels, they were againe committed to priſon, by reaſon of ſome certaine aduertiſement that was giuen to the Sultan of the ſame ſubſtance: the Sultan informed himſelfe truely of their probity, gaue them their liberty, calling backe to Pera, to D liue there, with the ſame priuiledges they formerly had, and ſuffered the reſt to returne into France.

The Ieſuits ſet at liberty.

Alexander Prince of Moldauia hauing loſt a thouſand horſe neere vnto Cochina, the laſt yere as you haue heard, the Baſſa and Stephano were puft vp with this good ſucceſſe; but Michna had no joy of it, who hearing that the Princes attended him at Chochina, with a reſolution to defend themſelues, remembring that a certaine Italian making a profeſſion to foretell future things, had told him, That if he euer came to fight with the Polonians, he would be in danger of his life. Wherefore by the aduice of his Chancellor and Campe-maſter, called Spaterlecha, he pretended that he had receiued news from his Lieutenant, that there was a great troupe of Tartarians entered into Valachia, and ſpoiled the country; vpon which pretext he E tooke leaue of the Baſſa and returned, leauing all his ſouldiers in the army, reſeruing only an hundred horſe for his guard. Being in Valachia, Stephano wrote vnto him, that he had defeated the Polonians in battell, in the which there were ſlaine ſix thouſand men vpon the place, and had taken a great number of priſoners, which they meant to ſend to the grand Seignior: all which was but a meere inuention to mocke Michna, and to make him ſorry that he was not in the action: whereupon he was ſo much diſcontented, as he cauſed the heads of his Chancellour and Camp-maſter to be cut off for their bad counſell, charging them that they had ſome ſecret intelligence with the Polonians.

About the end of March, the Baſſa with Stephano, and a Tartarian Prince called Moneza, reſolued to aduance with their whole army (being twenty thouſand men) towards Chochina, F and being within two leagues, they made a ſtand a whole day to refreſh their men. In the meane time the Princes put their army in order of battell, in a little plaine within a quarter of a league of Chochina, leauing a thouſand choice horſe within the towne vnder the command of of Prince Coreskie, aſſuring themſelues that the Turks would not faile to campe betwixt the towne and the Princes army, that if they were defeated they might haue no meanes to retire G into the fort, which was held impregnable. The Princes drew eight pieces of cannon out of the fort, which they planted within a trench which was couered with a wood. The Baſſa on the other ſide thought that he had the Princes at his mercy, being aduertiſed that they had not halfe ſo many men in their Army; early in the morning hee cauſed his men to march in good order, who arriued neere to Cochina by ſeuen of the clocke in the morning, where hauing made a ſtand to diſcouer the Princes army, he went and encamped betwixt them and the towne, as it had beene foreſeene. His men being put in order, the Tartarians who had a great deſire to be reuenged of the Coſſackes, who had defeated them in many encounters, intreated to haue the point: the which was granted, and the trumpets ſounding, they aduanced towards H a battalion of Coſſackes, nothing diſtruſting the cannon which was planted on that ſide, and not ſeene. Comming within the ſhot, they preſently plaied vpon them, and ouerthrew a great number of the Tartarians, and terrified the reſt, the which the Ccoſſakes perceiuing, they charged them furiouſly, and cut the reſt in peeces, and ſo returned towards their army, ſeeing another ſquadron of Valachians and Moldauians come to ſuccour the Tartarians. The Lord of Tiſchewich with his troup of fifteene or ſixteene hundred horſe well armed, went to encounter the ſaid ſquadron, which aduanced brauely towards the Princes cannon. The combate was long without any ſhew of aduantage, which made the Marſhall of the Turks Army to ſend three thouſand Turks to ſuccour them: and the Princes cauſed a ſquadron of Coſſackes and Moldauians to aduance, who carried themſelues ſo valiantly, as they forced the Turks to I retire aboue an hundred paces. Then Prince Alexander cryed out, Now my companions, behold the enemy is in diſorder, let vs charge them reſolutely, and the victory is certaine. After which he aduanced with the reſt of his Army, commanding two cannons ſhould be ſhot off together, for a ſigne to Prince Coreskie that he might ſally forth, and charge the Turks rereward, as it had bin reſolued: But he ſtaied not for the ſignall, being already aduanced aboue three hundred paces, fearing that the party would be ended without him, or that he ſhould fayle at need.

Flight of the Baſſa and Stephano.

The Baſſa ſeeing this ſtratagem, which he feared not, and the bad ſucceſſe of his men which he had ſent to fight, and that he was charged both before and behinde, he began to be amaſed, and hauing cauſed a ſquadron of two thouſand horſe, Turks and Valachians, to aduance, to K ſecond his troupes, he retyred apart with Stephano (who was no leſſe afraid than himſelfe) with the reſt of the Turkiſh Cauallary, to attend the euent of the battell. There was neuer a more furious combat ſeene (which continued for the ſpace of two houres) full of fearefull how-lings of Turks, who in the end fainted, ſeeing no ſuccours come vnto them: whereas if the Baſſa and the cowardly Stephano had joined with them, they had without doubt fortified their carriages and renued their forces, and by all apparance woon the victory, which they loſt beyond all mens expectation. When as the Baſſa and Stephano ſaw that their forces were in rout, and no meanes to draw them againe together, they began to make a retreat with aboue two thouſand horſe, which had not yet fought. In the meane time the Princes Tiſchewich and Coreskie (like two thunderbolts of warre) cut all in peeces they could meet; and fearing leſt L they ſhould make a new head, the Princes drew all their men together, and made a ſtand vpon the place of battell, not ſuffering their ſouldiers to go to the ſpoile, before they were aſſured that the enemy was retired in great haſte, fearing the Princes would haue purſued them, the which they would willingly haue done, if their men and horſes had not beene almoſt tyred in the former battell, in which there were ſlain aboue twelue thouſand men beſides the wounded and priſoners.

Prince Coresky marries with the Princeſſe Alexandrina.

Prince Alexander being returned to Cochina with the other Princes and Noblemen, they gaue thankes to God for the victory they had obtained againſt the Turks and their confederates; and there was much joy with the Princes and all the Ladies, who were retired into the fort, attending the euent of this fearefull battell. Prince Coreskie burned with deſire to enjoy M his Miſtreſſe, whom he loued as his owne life; ſo as by a free conſent of all parties, they were married within two daies after the victory, to the great content of all the Court.

A Whileſt that the Princes began to enjoy the fruits of their victory, the Baſſa and wretched Stephano returned to Yas, but finding no ſafety there, they parted preſently; the Baſſa to Conſtantinople, and the tyrant into Valachia to Prince Michna, who was his onely ſupport, notwithſtanding that he had mocked him apparantly. But before this wretch departed from Yas (hauing no hope euer to returne againe) he cauſed the towne to be ſet on fire in many places; ſo as of two and twenty thouſand houſes, there were not aboue ſix hundred vntouched. The Princes hauing aduice hereof in the beginning of Aprill, they marched ſpeedily thither, where finding it ſo deſolate, they reſolued to purſue Stephano into Valachia, and puniſh him according to his deſeruing. The next day they marched towards Valachia, being to paſſe the riuer of Siretta, there being on the other ſide a Borough in which Michna had B foure hundred men in garriſon, to keepe the Frontiers. The Princes arriuing at this place, the garriſon put themſelues in defence, but they were ſoone forced and cut in pieces, ſo as there eſcaped not one, and as for the inhabitants, they were well entreated, hauing made no reſiſtance, and withall they hated Michna for the vexations they receiued from the ſaid garriſon. The Army hauing reſted there three dayes, aduanced with all ſpeed towards the City of Bonza, whereas Michna then remained with wretched Stephano, who had no care but to make good cheere. The Army beeing come within a league of Bonza, it was diſcouered by ſome countreymen who ran to aduertiſe their Prince, wiſhing him to ſaue himſelfe ſpeedily, for that they had diſcouered the Polonian Army neere the City. Michna was ready to ſit downe to dinner, hauing inuited Stephano to accompany him: but he was ſo amaſed at this C vnexpected comming of the Princes, as hee ranne himſelfe to his ſtable, and mounted vpon the firſt horſe hee could finde, without ſaddle, and ſo tooke his way towards Tergouiſt, beeing followed by few of his people, one of which gaue him his owne horſe, which was better furniſhed, and as for Stephano hauing ſaddled his owne horſe, he fled all alone towards Nicopolis.

The Princes being entered Bonza without reſiſtance, they were wonderfully grieued that they had not found Stephano, which was their whole deſigne, and that Prince Michna (to whom they intended no harme) had beene ſo amazed. The Army at the firſt enterance ſpoyled the city, which the Princes could not hinder, nor yet the rauiſhing of many wiues and virgines, which drew the wrath of God vpon them, and in all appearance was the true cauſe of the D miſeries which afterward befell the Princes. During their abode at Bonza to refreſh their men, many Boyers or Noblemen of the Countrey (deſiring to ſhake off the yoke of Prince Michna's command, who gouerned inſolently) came vnto Prince Alexander, beſeeching him to ſtay in Valachia, promiſing that the whole Nobility would willingly yeeld him all obedience and fidelity. But the Prince (hauing no intent to diſpoſſeſſe Michna) thanked them for their good will, the which the Boyers vnderſtanding, they told him, that they would bee glad (ſeeing he refuſed it) that Prince Cherbanne (who had beene their Vayuod before Michna, and had beene expelled Valachia by Bethlem Gabor, and forced to retire into Germany to the Emperour) might returne and take vpon him the gouernment of Valachia, entreating him to giue him paſſage through Moldauia if he preſented himſelfe, the which Prince Alexander E willingly granted, deſiring much that Prince Cherbanne were reſtored, for that Michna fauoured his enemy, and had himſelfe a deſigne vpon the eſtate of Moldauia, which in the end he obtained.

Prince Alexander refuſeth the eſtate of Valachia.

Prince Michna being come to Playa, which is betwixt Bonza and Tergouiſt, he ſtayed ſome dayes there attending his traine, during the which he ſent ſpeedily to his wife being at Tergouiſt, willing her to goe with all ſpeed to Nicopolis: for that he feared the Princes would ſeiſe both vpon them and their eſtates, as they might eaſily haue done, if they had foreſeene what afterwards befell them. Michna being come to Tergouiſt, he preſently ſent an Embaſſadour to Prince Alexander, to know vpon what deſigne hee had entered Valachia with an Army, hauing no cauſe; but contrariwiſe, that he had giuen good teſtimony that F he was his friend, for that hee would not aſſiſt the Baſſa and Stephano, when they purſued him to Cochina, notwithſtanding that they were much ſtronger in ſhew; That if his intent were onely to ſeiſe vpon Stephano, hee aſſured him that hee was not with him, but was fled another way; promiſing that if he could euer take him, he would deliuer him into his hands:

intreating him withall to retire out of his eſtate, not ſuffering his army to ſpoyle it any more, and that they might continue good friends. Prince Alexander receiued this Embaſſadour very courteouſly, who hearing the ſubiect of his Embaſſie, made anſwere, That hee had the day before ſent vnto his Maſter to informe him of his intent, which was not to attempt any thing againſt his perſon nor eſtate, but onely to purſue Stephano who had ſet fire on the City of Yas before he parted: and to let Michna know, That he meant not to wrong him, nor to enrich himſelfe with any thing that was his, he had ſent him backe his plate, with all his rich mooueables. Michna's Embaſſadour hauing thanked Prince Alexander, returned to Tergouiſta, and found all true that the Prince had ſaid; the which freed Michna from further feare.

1500 Tartarians defeated by Troianoskie.

Before Prince Alexanders departure from Bonza, he ſent the Lord Troianoskie with two thouſand horſe to purſue Stephano: but it was without effect, for he vnderſtood that he had paſſed the riuer of Danow with his wife, and a ſmall traine. At the ſame time a troupe of fifteene hundred Tartarians, being aduertiſed that the Polonians purſued Stephano onely with a thouſand horſe, and that they were tyred with their long marches, aduanced to charge them; but it was not with that ſucceſſe they expected: for Troianoskie diſcouering them a farre off in a plaine champion field, had leaſure to put his men into foure ſquadrons, and there attended them, who approching neere to diſcouer the number of the Polonians, would gladly return without blowes, but it was too late: for Troianoskie commanded two of his ſquadrons to charge them ſuddenly, ſo as within leſſe than a quarter of an houre they were defeated, and aboue foure hundred ſlaine vpon the place, the reſt fled the ſame way that they came: of the Polonians there were not aboue fiue and twenty ſlaine, and about fifty hurt.

The Princes had reſolued to leaue Valachia, forbidding all Captaines and ſouldiers vpon paine of death to carry away any Valachian of either ſex with them, hearing they had ſeiſed vpon ſome, and meant to draw a ranſome from them: after which they began to march, and being vpon the way, they were aduertiſed that the inhabitants of Horreoua were againe reuolted and in armes, refuſing to acknowledge Prince Alexander, or to pay the accuſtomed tribute, vnleſſe he would make it appeare that he was confirmed by the Grand Seignior. Prince Coreskie was ſent thither with fiue thouſand men, whoſe comming did ſo amaze them, as they yeelded without any reſiſtance. This Prince being loath to loſe any time, laid ſiege to the towne and fort of Bialigront, ſeated vpon the riuer of Bohou, the which was held by the Tartarians Præcopences, in which fort there was a garriſon of Ianizaries, and many Boyers of Moldauia, who defended themſelues valiantly, and made many ſallies, in which they ſlew aboue three hundred of the Princes men, and he himſelfe was in danger to be taken, if he had not beene ſpeedily deliuered by the Lord of Tiſcheuich and his troupe, who charged the Ianizaries ſo reſolutely, as they forced them to retire, leauing many of their men dead vpon the place. The Prince ſeeing there was no hope to take the place without cannon, raiſed his ſiege and returned to Yas to Prince Alexander.

Stephano in diſgrace with the Sultan.

Soone after, Hebraim Baſſa wrote to Prince Alexander (as if he had beene his friend) giuing him to vnderſtand, That from thenceforth hee ſhould liue quietly in Moldauia, for that the Grand Seigniours Lieutenant Generall or chiefe Viſier (from whom Stephano had alwaies drawne his chiefe ſupport) was in diſgrace, promiſing the Prince to employ himſelfe for him to his Maſter: the which he did either to make him careleſſe of his owne ſtrength, or to draw ſome recompence or reward from him, if the Grand Seigniour ſhould confirme him in Moldauia, as there was ſome likelihood, ſeeing that Stephano had made himſelfe altogether vnworthy; as well by his flight, as by his wicked actions, which made him in the end ſo odious to the Grand Seigniour, as hee reſolued to ruine him. So as ſoone after they were aduertiſed, That the Grand Seigniour had giuen commandement vnto the ſaid Baſſa to ſeize vpon Stephano, who had retired himſelfe to Brahile, and to bring him vnto him aliue or dead, with whatſoeuer did belong vnto him: the which he executed after this manner: the ſaid Baſſa marched with all diligence towards Brahile, carrying a Chiaux with him, and being within foure or fiue leagues of the towne, he ſent one of his people to aduertiſe Stephano of his comming, and that he meant the next day to dine with him. Stephano (who diſtruſted nothing)

A nothing) holding the Viſier to be ſtil his friend, parted early in the morning to meet him, and comming neer him he alighted from his horſe to do him reuerence, and the Baſſa did the like; where after ſome little conference together, he drew out the commiſſion he had to ſeiſe vpon his perſon, and to cary him to Conſtantinople. The which Stephano perceiuing, he turned him to his ſeruants, and willed them to ſhift for themſelues, for that hee ſaw hee went to his death.
His men being retired, the Chiaus who had his mace in his hand gaue him a blow betweene the ſhoulders, and then cauſed him to be bound hand and foot, and caſt into a cart drawne by four good horſes, and in this maner they caried him to Conſtantinople: where being arriued, to auoid the puniſhment he had deſerued, he denied his faith and became a renegado, & withall he became very poor and miſerable; for at the ſame inſtant when he was taken, the Baſſa B ſent to ſeiſe and carry away whatſoeuer he had at Brahile & Nicopolis, where his wife remained; ſo as he had nothing left him but remorſe of conſcience, which tormented him continually, for the barbarous cruelties he had practiſed in Moldauia. Some of his men returned to Yas, and there declared what had befallen Stephano in their preſence, for which they generally gaue thanks vnto God, and were very ioyfull.

Soon after, newes came to Yas, That the Sultan had appointed prince Michna to ſucceed Stephano in the principalitie of Moldauia (which is far better than that of Valachia) and that he ſent Skinder Baſſa his General in Europ, with a powerfull army to ſettle the ſaid Michna, and to expel Alexander. The which proued ſo true, as on the 25 of Iune this yeare 1616, the ſaid Baſſa came to Tergouiſt, where prince Michna attended him, with great preparatiues C both to receiue him and to refreſh his army. The Baſſa entring into Tergouiſt, had amongſt other things of note, thirty or forty muſitians on horſeback, playing vpon certain inſtruments almoſt like to gitterns, which made but ſilly muſick; he had alſo many pages, who in ſtead of cloaks ware the skins of leopards, lions, and tygers, as if they meant to terrifie the world; and his army conſiſted of about 20000 men, ſome Turks, ſome Tartars; to whom Michna joyned his forces, hauing 10000 horſe and foot which he had drawn from Valachia and the neighbor countries. The Baſſa being entred the caſtle wheras prince Michna attended him, after many complements they entred into a great hall wel appointed, where the Baſſa preſented him with his letters patents, and a robe which his maſter had ſent to Michna, which hee cauſed to be put on in the preſence of all the noblemen of his court, proclaiming him prince of Moldauia, D with many ceremonies too long to relate. After which, prince Michna led the Baſſa into another great hall, where a feaſt was prepared, both for himſelfe and ſuch as hee would admit to his table; Michna offering to ſerue the Baſſa, but he would not ſuffer him, cauſing him to ſit down right againſt him. On the ſecond of Iuly they departed from Tergouiſt, and marched into Moldauia: wherof the Polonian princes were aduertiſed; but the princeſſe mother to Alexander maintained, that the Baſſa came only to bring the patents to her ſon. Which dangerous opinion of hers grew by reaſon of the letters which Hebraim Baſſa had ſent to prince Alexander; not remembring that it came from a Turk his ſworn enemy, and therefore not to bee credited, eſpecially in a matter of that importance; ſo as ſhe was the cauſe of their vtter ruine.

Michna proclaimed Prince of Moldauia.

About this time, the General of the king of Polonia's Army, called Zolkelchy, enuying the E honor which the Polonian princes had gotten by ſo many victories, and withall drawn by his own priuat intereſt, writ to prince Michna and the Baſſa, That if they would promiſe to procure the Sultan to aduance the eldeſt ſon of the deceaſed prince Simeon (who liued with him) to be Prince of Valachia (whereof his father had bin formerly Vayuod) he would ſo weaken the Princes army, as they ſhould be forced to yeeld or flie. Whoſe demand being eaſily granted, this traitor writ to certaine Captaines of the Coſſacks, that they ſhould leaue the Princes army, and come with all ſpeed into Poland, to accompanie Vladiſlaus their Kings ſon, who had been choſen Duke of Muſcouie, and meant to go thither with a great army by reaſon of ſome croſſes; and that they ſhould be very well paid. The Coſſackes (who depend vpon the Crowne of Poland, ſeruing thoſe that promiſe) moſt began to mutiny, ſaying plainly, That if F they had not money ſpeedily, they would retire into their countrey, yet concealing that they had bin called to any other ſeruice; and without any long ſtay, there parted early in a morning about 8000, carrying with them great ſtore of oxen, ſheepe, and other cattell, with all the ſpoyles they had gotten in the precedent victories.

The Coſſackes mutinie and leaue Prince Alexander.

After their example, Bicho General of Prince Alexanders army, whether corrupted by bribes, or for that he had an apprehenſion of this powerfull army that came againſt them, retired alſo ſecretly toward Michna and the Baſſa, being followed by 2000 horſe. This much amaſed G the princes army, & yet as if they had bin inchanted by ſome diuelliſh charms, they could not reſolue to make a retreit while they might haue don it without danger. Many aduiſed prince Alexander to this courſe, yea prince Michna by letters perſuaded him to return into Polonia, before his army came neerer to Yas. Which he did for fear of the ſucceſſe, wherof his falſe prophet had forewarned him, as is formerly noted. Wherupon Alexander went to councel the 25 of Iuly, but they could not reſolue; the commaunders and ſouldiers being much diuided, moſt of them demanding their pay, elſe they would not fight; the which they took for a pretence of their retreit. In the mean time the Tartars, who made the vantgard of prince Michna's army, approched; which made the princes to leaue Yas, & to march toward Cochina: but they could not do it ſo ſecretly but the Tartars heard of it, who paſt ſpeedily thorow the city H and charged them in the reare. In which incounter George Potoskie, Nephew to him that was taken with Conſtantine, hauing fought valiantly, & ſlain many Tartars with his own hand, was in the end ſhot thorow the body with an arrow, wherof he died preſently. The lord Tiſchevich came ſpeedily to the charge with a troupe of Coſſacks which he had ſtaied, and charged the Tartars ſo furiouſly, as he ſlew 800 vpon the place and put the reſt to rout.

Alexander hauing receiued the forementioned letter from prince Michna, made anſwer, that contrary to his promiſe to continue his friend, & neuer to take arms againſt him, he had craued aid of the Turk to diſpoſſeſſe him of Moldauia, to which his predeceſſor had neuer pretended, neither could they according to the fundamentall lawes of the country, and the conuentions I accorded by the grand Seignior when as the Moldauians ſubmitted themſelues vnder his ſoueraignty, by the which no man could be Vayuod of Moldauia vnleſſe he were born in the country. Moreouer, he ſhould remember that it was in his power to diſpoſſeſſe him of Valachia, when as he entred Bonza with his army in purſuit of Stephano: the which he would not do, nor detain any of his pretious moueables, but had ſent them all vnto him. That if hee abuſed the power which he then had, God would not ſuffer ſo great an ingratitude and vſurpation to paſſe vnpuniſhed. And although his army were far inferior to his, yet he ſhould know hee neither feared him nor the Baſſa, putting his chiefe confidence in the Almighties aſſiſtance, who had in many occaſions vſed them to abate the Turkes pride, which hee ſhould abhor if he were a true Chriſtian, rather than to join with them to ſatisfie his ambition. K

Prince Michna hauing ſent this letter to Skinder Baſſa Generall of the Turks army, he was ſo inſenced, as hee preſently commaunded his Lieutenant to purſue the Polonians with 12000 choice men, they being then at Cotnard betwixt Yas and Cochina. Prince Alexander beeing aduertiſed hereof, he ſuddenly cauſed his army to aduance towards the fort of Cochina. At the ſame time Prince Cherbannes Chancellour, who came with a hundred and fifty horſe vnto prince Alexander, to aduertiſe him that his maſter was comming to his aid with fiue or ſixe thouſand men, was purſued by the Turks neer vnto Yas, wheras he thought to haue found the ſaid prince; and of all his troupe only himſelf and one more eſcaped, ſo as the prince could haue no certain news of the ſaid Cherbanne. Prince Coresky, who had ſtaied with 2500 horſe not far from Cotnard, was alſo incountred with a great troup of Turks and Tartars, which he L could not wel diſcouer by reaſon of a little mountain that couered them. The prince ſeeing ſome of them appear, charged them; but finding that as he defeated one troup, a freſh ſucceeded in his place, he was forced to retire, with this aduantage, that he had ſlain almoſt 6000 of his enemies, hauing not loſt aboue 250 of his owne men. But the prince was wounded with two arrows, one in the thigh, and the other in the backe, which was a great diſaſter for himſelf and for the whole army. He which commanded this troup of Turkes being very much amaſed at this vnexpected incounter, hauing gathered his men together, and joined them to fifteen thouſand others whom the Baſſa had ſent, he being yet at Yas, he cauſed this army to approch within a quarter of a league of the Polonians; where hauing incouraged his men in what he could, he told them, That to ſhew his affection vnto the Sultans ſeruice in this occaſion, M he was reſolued to ſend a challenge to prince Coresky, whom hee confeſſed to be the moſt valiant man of all the Polonian army. So as he preſently diſpatched one of his Captaines to go vnto the prince, and to call him in the behalfe of his Generall. The Captaine comming to Alexanders camp, demanded to ſpeak with prince Coresky; who being brought vnto him, de-Prince Coresky challenged by the Turks Generall.

A liuered the charge he had from the Generall. The prince, although he were neither able to ſtand, nor to ſit on horſebacke, by reaſon of his wounds, yet would needs haue accepted this challenge, if prince Alexander and the chiefe noblemen of the army had not coniured him to excuſe himſelfe by reaſon of his indiſpoſition, letting him know, that the euent of ſuch a combat did not only import him, but all thoſe of his party, who had their chief hope in him. Whereunto the princeſſes added their inſtant intreaties, and among others his deare Spouſe, who was much afflicted for his wounds. The Lord Tiſchenich a braue and valiant Gentleman being then preſent, earneſtly intreated prince Alexander to giue him leaue to accept of the challenge for prince Coresky his couſin: the which being eaſily granted, he ſent a Gentleman with the ſaid Turk, to know if the General would yeeld thereunto. Which he did willingly, B not being ignorant of the qualitie and valour of the ſaid Tiſchenich. It was agreed, That the combat ſhould be betwixt both armies, lying in an open field, within a quarter of a league of one another, with promiſe that neither party ſhould be aſſiſted.

These two braue warriors hauing taken leaue of their friends, came to the place appointed in view of both armies. The Turks General being about fifty paces from his army, cauſed water to be brought, with which he waſhed his mouth, eies, noſe, ears, and priuy parts, beleeuing (according to his Law) that this waſhing would ſerue as a purifying: then turning toward the Eaſt he made his prayer, after which he went to horſeback, being richly armed and furniſhed, and then marched ſoftly toward his aduerſarie, who attended him well mounted and armed, and ſo began the combat; their chief arms being bows and arrows, which they ſpent without C hurting one another; til at laſt Tiſchenich hauing a petronel, ſhot the Turke thorow the body and ouerthrew him, who ſtriuing to riſe again, Tiſchenich paſſed ouer him with his horſe, and wounded him in his right arm, and at the next blow ſlew him: after which he cut off his head and caried it to prince Alexander.

The Polonians were very ioyfull of the happy ſucceſſe of this famous combat; and the Turks being much amaſed, aduertiſed the Baſſa and Michna, That they ſhould bring the reſt of the army and their cannon, if they would be reuenged of the Polonians. In the mean time the traitor Bicho, who had abandoned prince Alexander, with a troup of two thouſand Tartarians and Moldauians found means to get before the Polonian army, and to cut off the way betwixt Cotnarde and the town of Bothocan ſix leagues off. The Valachians and Tranſylva-D nians led by the General of Michna's army inueſted them vpon the right hand, and the body of the Turks army followed behind: ſo as there remained nothing but vpon the left hand a wood of timber trees, which might fauor their retreit.

Skinder Baſſa hearing the ſucceſſe of the combat, commanded his army to aduance preſently with ſixteen canons. The Princes ſeeing themſelues inuironed by ſo many enemies, they reſolued to fortifie themſelues with their carts and carriages, and to defend themſelues. But what could fiue or ſix thouſand men preuail againſt two or three and twenty thouſand; for ſo many were thought to be in the Turks army. True it is, they expected daily prince Chorkasne & the lord Boſſi, who were within two dais iourny, and brought with them ten or 12000 men. This made the Baſſa and Michna to aduance, to force the Polonians to yeeld or to fight. Com-E ming neer vnto their camp, and ſeeing themſelues inueſted on all ſides but toward the wood, they approched their cannon, which had been able to haue ſpoyled their Campe, but that it was not their deſigne; for they only deſired to take the princes and princeſſes priſoners, with the chiefe Noblemen and Captaines of the Army. Whereupon they ſent to ſummon the Polonian ſouldiers to deliuer into their hands the ſaid princes and Lords, promiſing that the reſt of the Army ſhould depart with bag and baggage. Whereunto they would not yeeld, but made an anſwer with one conſent, That they would rather die than commit ſuch baſeneſſe and treacherie. This being reported to the Baſſa and prince Michna, they commaunded that ſome of their canon ſhould be charged with ſmall bullets, and diſcharged through the Polonian army, wherby a great number were ſlaine and wounded. The princes who had but ſome F ſmal pieces, made certain vollies, but to ſmall purpoſe: neither had they any more bullets left, and little pouder, for that by il chance part had bin burnt ſome few daies before: ſo that all things ſeemed to foretell their ruine at hand. The Lord Tiſchenich hauing diligently obſerued, that remaining in that incloſure he could not eſcape death, or at leaſt captiuity, reſolued with 300 horſe, the moſt valiant amongſt the Polonians, to force thorow three or four ſquadrons which were ſet in gard by the wood ſide, to the end none might eſcape, that place beeing moſt ſuſpected by the Turks. The which they executed with ſuch fury, as they ouerthrew all they incountred; ſhewing that it is a very dangerous thing to make head againſt thoſe who are reduced to that extremitie as they muſt either vanquiſh or die. Prince Coresky would not haue failed to haue made the like retreit, and to haue carried prince Alexander with him, but he could not ſit on horſeback by reaſon of his wounds: and beſides, he had rather haue died, than to leaue his wife in that extremitie. His laſt refuge was to diſguiſe himſelf as well as he could, giuing it out that he was eſcaped with Tiſchevich, that ſo he might paſſe for a common ſoldier if the priſoners were put to ranſom. In like maner the Princeſſes diſguiſed themſelues for the like intent.

The Turks cannon hauing ouerthrown many of their cariages, which ſerued as a Rampier, two ſquadrons, one of Tartars, another of Turks, preſented themſelues at one inſtant, in two ſeueral places to force the Polonian camp; who ſeeing no means to make reſiſtance and to repel their enemies, laid down their arms, and yeelded. Wherat their enemies were exceeding glad, deſiring nothing more than to take theſe noble princes priſoners, and to diſpoſe of the reſt at their pleaſure. The Turks and Tartars hauing entred their camp, making ſpoil of all, and ſeiſing vpon what they could lay hands on, beginning to ſhare their priſoners, the princes lexander and Bougdan, with their mother, were deliuered vnto Skinder Baſſa, who led them to Conſtantinople, wheras ſoon after their arriual they forſook their God, denied their faith, and became renegado's, for fear of perpetual impriſonment wherewith they were threatened. For which infidelitie Bougdan was preſently puniſhed, for hauing cauſed himſelf to be circumciſed according to the Law of Mahomet, he died, and the Princeſſe his mother was confined to the old Seraglio. As for prince Coreskie, in this generall ruin of a Chriſtian army (being forced to yeeld and ſubmit it ſelfe to the Turks tyrannie) he had ſo diſguiſed himſelfe, that hee paſt for a time vnknown, and was led to Yas among the common ſoldiers; where he was afterwards diſcouered by a ſoldier of his own party, who obtained his libertie by this baſe trecherie. The Turkiſh Captaine who had gotten the Prince, hearing of his qualitie by the aforeſaid Villein, he led him vnto Skinder Baſſa the Generall, who recompenced him well, and made both him and the ſouldier that diſcouered him, to take ſolemne oathes not to impart it to any man; for he had an intent to draw ſome great ranſom from this prince, and to reſtore him to his former libertie, knowing wel, that if he caried him to Conſtantinople the grand Seignior would confine him into his priſons, by which means he ſhould make no vſe nor benefit by his taking. But it happed, that another Perfidious of the Polonian army aduertiſed Michna of Coreskies captiuitie, and in whoſe hands he was; who was ſo jealous, as he croſt and ouerthrew the good deſigne of Skinden Baſſa, telling him plainly in the preſence of many, That hee knew for certain prince Coresky was among his ſlaues, and that he ſhould beware he did not eſcape, for that the grand Seignior would call him to account. The General anſwered, That he would be glad if it were ſo, but he had not yet any notice of him, thanking Michna for his good aduice. But fearing that if he did what he intended, ſuffering prince Coresky to eſcape for a ranſom, the Sultan comming to the knowledge therof would be much inſenced, and puniſh him with diſgrace or death, the next day he told prince Michna plainely, that the aduice that hee had giuen him was true, and that Coresky had bin found diſguiſed among his other priſoners, whom he would preſent vnto his maſter, with the princes Alexander and Bougdan; as he did, of whoſe deliuerie you ſhall heare hereafter. The yong princeſſe wife to Coresky, hauing diſguiſed her ſelfe and diſ-figured her face with her nailes and other helpes, fel into the hands of a Tartarian captain, with many others, who caried her into Tartarie, wheras ſhe was inhumanly intreated.

The Princes taken priſoners.

In the Mediterranian ſea Coſmo great Duke of Tuſcanie continued his enterpriſes this yeare againſt the Turks: his gallies part from Ligorne and runne into the Leuant, in queſt of ſome occaſions to anoy theſe infidels. They drew neere vnto Cerigo, in old time Cythera, the twenty fift of April, where meeting with certaine Chriſtian ſhips, ſome Venetians aduertiſed them, That in the Iſland of Chio the Turkes had prepared two gallies to paſſe into Barbarie. Inghirami Admiral to the great Duke reſolued to ſet vpon them: beeing on the way,

A he turned with his fleet where they were to paſſe, and being couered by the night, hee caſt anchor vnder caſtle Roux. But as he attended a fair occaſion, the Moone ſhining diſcouered him vnto the Turks; and the gards hauing aduertiſed the Turkes Gallies, they preſently began to flie, the one rowing amaine towards land, and the other continuing her courſe at ſea with all ſpeed. Inghirami with his Admirall gally got before that which was going to land, inueſted it (being followed by the gally called S. Stephen) and three houres within night grapled with it, and labored to enter it: but the Turks (who were all good ſouldiers) defended it valiantly, ſo as they were aboue an hour faſtned together, hewing one another furiouſly: yea the Turks entring Inghirami his gally, fought valiantly vpon the hatches, but in the end the Florentines had the victorie, and took this gally, yet with much loſſe of Chriſtian bloud. It was the Patron gally of that famous pyrat Amurath Raiſe, which was commanded by the ſon of Mammi a B Portugall, called Muſtapha Celebi, who was taken aliue, but ſore wounded. The other Galley which was fled to ſea, and was the Captaine galley of the ſaid Amurath Raiſe, commanded by the Bey of Mitylene, nephew and ſon in law to the ſaid pirat, called Amurath, who had married his daughter, being his mothers ſon, was inueſted by the gallies of S. Mary Magdalen, and the Patron S. Coſmo. This combat was no leſſe furious than the other, the Turkes making a wonderful defence: but in the end, the bloud on either ſide being abundantly ſpilt, the Florentines had the victorie. Amurath Bey of Mitylene was ſlain, and Muſtapha, whom theſe Turkiſh gallies carried to Algier in Barbary. They were of twenty fiue bankes a piece, carrying lanthorns, and furniſhed with all things neceſſary, manned with 420 Ianizaries, all men of a-C ction, and practiſed in piracies with that pirat Amurath Rais. In this prize the Florentines took 240 Turks, and freed 430 Chriſtians: among the artillery of theſe gallies they recouered a cannon and two ſacres of the gally of S. Iohn, and a ſail belonging to the great dukes captain gally, which the pirat Amurath Rais had formerly ſpoiled. Theſe Turkiſh gallies were loden with great ſtore of rich commodities, the which were valued at 200000 crownes. But this conqueſt was got with the loſſe of much bloud; for of the Florentines two hundred twenty three men were wounded, and 35 ſlain in thoſe two combats: which made the Admiral Inghirami to reſt ſatisfied in this voyage with the taking of two gallies, after which hee returned to Ligorn.

Turkiſh gallies taken by the Florentines.

We haue formerly made mention in the Ieſuits buſineſſe, being preſented at Conſtantino-D ple, of the Emperors Embaſſadors entry into that city: and this was the effect of his Embaſſage. The peace concluded at Situa Torok, Anno 1606, betwixt the Emperour and the Sultan, was ſomewhat altred by the diuers interpretations and explications which they made of the articles therin contained; but this year 1616, in the month of March, the Embaſſadors of both their Imperial Maieſties aſſembled at Vienna: namely the Cardinall Forgatſie Archbiſhop of Strigonium and Chancellor to the Emperor, Cardinal Kleſſel Biſhop of Vienna, the Baron of Rainek, Count Adolph Althem, the Earle of Solmes, the Earle of Thoron, and Paull Apponi Nagi, for the Emperor: Hali Baſſa of Buda, Achmat Tybaia, and Gaſper Gratſiani for the Turk. Where they concluded theſe following articles, to take away all pretext of controuerſie, in the explication of thoſe which were agreed vpon at Situa Torok. But it was after that E Embaſſadors had been ſent on either ſide, as well to Conſtantinople as to Prague, with royall and rich preſents.

Articles extracted out of the Letters Patents of Achmat Emperor of the Turks.

1 Foraſmuch as many things haue hapned on either ſide, contrary to the peace concluded at Situa Torok, it hath bin neceſſary to confirm it anew, and to reduce it into the right courſe. Wherfore this holy peace made and concluded at Situa Torok ſhall be obſerued for twenty yeares compleat, to begin at F the date of theſe preſents. Giuen in the month of Chomazilabil, in the year of the Prophet 1024.

2 That the Peace hertofore concluded at Situa Torok ſhall remain firm in all the articles, according to the treaty which the Emperor Rodulphus did ſend vnto vs, ſigned with his hand, and ſealed with his ſeal; the which we haue receiued willingly, and the ſame treaty we alſo ſent back confirmed to the Emperor of the Romans; the which he receiued in like maner. And this treaty which was ſent vnto vs, bare date the G ninth of December, in the year 1606, of Ieſus of reuerend and happy memory: and that which wee ſent vnto the Emperor of Romans, wherwith he was ſatisfied, was dated in the year of the Prophet 1021.

3 Since the time that Agria, Caniſe, Alba-Regalis, Peſth, Buda, Solnoc, Hatwan, and other places haue bin taken, that the villages which were of their appurtenances ſhall hereafter remain annexed vnto them. But thoſe villages which ſince the peace of Situa Torok, haue bin hindred from paying of their tribute on either ſide, or haue bin held by force, contrary to the treaty of peace, that thoſe villages ſhall bee viewed by Commiſſaries appointed by vs and the Emperor of the Romans, and preſently ſhall bee ſet at libertie, and reſtored to their Lords and right owners. As for the villages which pay tribute to either part, thoſe which are ſcituat vpon the frontiers of the Emperour of the Romanes, toward Novigrade and other places, ſhall be viewed by Commiſſaries therunto deputed, who ſhall take a regiſter, to the end thoſe villages may not be moleſted by their neighbors. H In like manner the Commiſſarie ſhall make a regiſter of the villages that pay to both ſides, lying neer the towns of the Emperor of Romans, of Strigonium, and other places; to the end they may take notice what villages are bound to the one or to the other party, that hereafter there might grow no controuerſie. And for that which concerned the 158 villages about Strigonium, for the which there was ſome controuerſie; the 60 lying neereſt vnto the ſaid towne ſhall be adiudged as it hath bin agreed, and the Commiſſaries of either ſide ſhall take order for it. The foreſaid villages lying neer to Strigonium, and all other of the realm of Hungary, which ſhall be adiudged to the one or other party ſhall not in any ſort be diſquieted, more than of antient cuſtome, and there ſhall nothing bee exacted from them more than the tribute.

The Iudges of villages ſhall pay vnto the Lords the tributes according to the antient cuſtome; If the I Iudges do not bring the tribute, the Baſſa or Beg of the place ſhall ſummon the Inhabitants thrice, to the end their Iudges may come and pay their tribute: and if they do it not after theſe ſummonings, hee ſhall write vnto the next Gouernor for the Roman Empire, that the Iudges of the villages may be ſent to him with the tribute. And finally, if after all theſe formalities it be not payed, the Baſſa or Beg may vſe force to fetch in theſe Inhabitants and make them ſlaues. The which ſhall be obſerued thorowout all the villages which owe vs tribute in the realm of Hungary; yet nothing ſhall bee exacted or demaunded of them, more than they haue been accuſtomed to pay in antient times. The Commiſſaries deputed, ſhall view and ſet down by a ioynt conſent, the limits and bounds of the lands and signiories which are held by either part in the vpper or lower Hungary, and in the realms of Croatia and Sclavonia.

4 They that ſhall break the peace of either part, if they canot be conuicted and puniſhed inſtantly, we K haue decreed, That there ſhall be order taken on either ſide, and iuſtice ſhall be don within three moneths. All priſoners of war, and others that haue bin taken ſince the peace of Torok, ſhall be ſet at liberty without ranſome.

5 Achmet Tahaia hath preſented vnto vs a Roll of places built and fortified ſince the peace, for the retreat of ſoldiers. Wherupon we haue ordained, That information ſhall be taken of all fortifications made on either ſide ſince the peace of Situa Torok; and if it be found that any fortification hath bin made contrary to the peace, it ſhall be viſited within three moneths, by the captains on both ſides, or by a Nobleman of either party, and the fortifications which ſhall be found to haue bin thus made contrary vnto the peace, ſhall be demoliſhed.

6 And for that ſome wicked and malicious ſpirits haue attempted many things vniuſtly, to infringe L this holy peace and good amity, we haue ordained, That if herafter any perſon on either ſide ſhall attempt or practiſe any thing that is wicked and lewd, contrary to the peace and mutuall correſpondencie, wee will aduertiſe the Emperor of Romans therof: and in like maner the Roman Emperour, King of Hungary and Bohemia, ſhall write vnto vs to our Court, and no credit ſhall be giuen to the reports of ſuch perſons.

7 The Prieſts, religious men, and Ieſuits, among the people of holy Ieſus, which follow the Popes Religion, may build Temples in our Realms, there to ſay diuine ſeruice after their manner, and read the Goſpell. We will yeeld them all fauor, and will not ſuffer any one to diſturb them contrary to law and equitie.

8 It ſhall be lawfull for the inhabitants born in the realm of Hungary of either part, to re-edifie the villages ruined and laid waſt; and after they are inhabited, they ſhall pay tribute to the one and the other, if they be ſuch villages as haue bin accuſtomed to pay to both. M

9 Merchants ſhall haue free leaue to traffique, paſſing from our port into thoſe Countries; and the tranſport of merchandiſe ſhall be free to ſuch as ſhall take letters from the Gouernours of the frontiers, or from the Receiuers of the thirties; the which they ſhall repreſent in paſſing; and the Lord of the place, or

A the Receiuer ſhall atteſt the ſaid letters by his manual ſigne or ſeale; for the which they ſhall take nothing of the Merchant. If he be to paſſe by any dangerous place, they ſhall giue him a ſufficient conuoy to conduct him in ſafety; and after that the Merchant hath payd of either ſide the thirtieth, which is the full due, no man ſhall moleſt him, nor hinder him to go where he pleaſeth.

10 The Merchants which would paſſe from the realms and ſigniories of the Emperour of the Romans and the houſe of Auſtria, into our kingdom, with merchandiſe or mony, ſhal come vnder the enſigne of the Emperor of Romans, and ſhall haue his letters patents to vs, without the which they ſhall not be ſuffered to paſſe. And if they enter without enſigne or patents, the Agents and Conſuls of the Roman Emperour may ſeiſe vpon their veſſels, merchandiſe, and mony, and ſhall giue aduice thereof vnto their Emperor. Wherfore all the Merchants of the Emperors countries, of the houſe of Auſtria, and of the King of B Spain, both as well thoſe of the Low-countries, as his other realmes, may come with all aſſurance into our realms, with their ſhips, mony, and merchandiſe, paying three in the hundred. And as for the Agents and Conſuls of the Roman Empire, they ſhall pay vnto them two Aſpers for the hundred: and in doing ſo, the ſaid Agents and Conſuls for the Roman Emperor ſhall haue a care of the merchants affairs. If any merchant ſhall chance to die, the Emperors Agent and Conſul ſhall cauſe his goods to be ſealed vp, and ſhall take them into his poſſeſſion, to which our Treaſurer ſhall haue no colour of pretenſion. And when as the merchants haue payd the cuſtom of three for the hundred in one place, they ſhall not be bound to pay in another for the ſame merchandiſe. If the Merchants haue any controuerſies amongſt themſelues or with others, the Cadi or Iudge of the place may take knowledge of the cauſe, if it exceed not the value of 4000 Aſpers, but it ſhall be iudged by the Cadi of our Port.

C 11. As long as this holy peace ſhall continue, the Poſts which ſhal be ſent with letters from the Baſſa's, Begs, Lords, and Agents, or by the Viſiers on our behalfe to the Emperor of the Romanes, and reſpectiuely from him to our Court, ſhall be honorably entertained by our officers: and if the way bee dangerous, they ſhall giue them aſſiſtance to conduct them into a place of ſafety with their letters. And if the agent which is with vs deſire to write any particular letter vnto the Emperor, and not ſend an expreſſe meſſenger, that this letter ſhall be caried by the poſt, and deliuered ſafely where it is directed. That the meſſengers of the Baſſa's and Begs ſhall go no more into the villages, but the Iudges ſhall bring the tribute and deliuer it where they ought.

An Accord for the execution of the Articles touching the villages in controuerſie, and the raſing of fortifications.

D To conclude all differences touching the diuiſion of Villages, and demolition of fortifications made in preiudice of the peace of Situa Torok; we the Commiſſaries deputed had agreed vpon the time of four moneths. But for that all controuerſies cannot be decided within that time, by a common conſent we haue concluded the time of twelue moneths, for the expedition of all that ſhall remaine vndecided; all things remaining in the ſame eſtate during the time. For the ending of theſe affairs on the behalf of the Maieſty of the Roman Emperor, ſhall be ſent the noble Lord Adolph of Althem Earle of the ſacred empire, with others according to his Maieſties good pleaſure. And on the behalfe of the Othoman Emperor hath been named the noble Lord Ali Viſier Baſſa.

E For the greater aſſurance of theſe things, we the ſaid Commiſſioners haue cauſed ſix copies of this treaty to be diſpatched in the Italian, Hungarian, and Turkiſh tongues. And we the director or Preſident of the priuy Councell to his Imperiall Maieſty, and Cardinall, with other Counſellours of his priuy Councell, and Commiſſioners, hauing full power and authoritie, haue confirmed theſe preſents vnder our hands and the ſeals of our arms.

As alſo we Ali Baſſa of Buda, Viſier to the moſt powerfull Sultan Achmat, Tyhaia Mutafaraga, and Gaſper Gratiani, Embaſſadors for the Turkiſh Emperor with the Imperial Maieſty of the Roman Emperor, hauing full power and authoritie to conclude this treaty, haue ſigned it with our hands, and ſealed it with our ordinary ſeals: wherof there were three copies deliuered to either party. Given at Vienna the firſt of March, 1616.

F This new declaration of the Othoman Emperor, vpon the firſt Articles concluded at Situa Torok, ſhewes plainly how much the Turks are of late daies refined from their antient barbariſme and rudeneſſe, hauing made themſelues capable of great affairs. And theſe frequent meetings betwixt the Emperor of the Romanes and the Sultan, by their Embaſſadours, as an G holy watering of the Oliue tree of peace, ſeemes to make it ſo flouriſhing, as the ſweet ſauour may pierce farther, and make vs hope that God wil make vſe of this peaceful vnion, to prepare vnto himſelfe ſome means for a new harueſt, or a healthful conquering of ſoules, wandring amidſt the falſhoods of the Alchoran.

Prince Coresky his wife caried into Tartary.

Alexandrina wife to prince Coresky, hauing bin taken at that vnfortunate ouerthrow of the Polonian Princes in Moldauia, by Skinder Baſſa and prince Michna; ſhe was carried away (as you haue formerly heard) by a Tartar captaine, and led captiue vnknowne to Bialigrot, where ſhe receiued many indignities being with childe; yea during the time of her lying in, beeing fiue or ſix months after her taking. All which time ſhe bethought her ſelfe of a means to haſten her own deliuery, and withall to free a Polonian ſoldier called Iaques, who had bore arms H vnder prince Coresky. This man although he knew the Princeſſe well, and might by her diſcouerie haue purchaſed his own libertie, yet he would not do it: wherfore the Princeſſe hauing tried his fidelitie, taught him a meanes how to work his owne libertie, and hers in the end, by his care and diligence. The Tartar one day being abſent, Alexandrina took occaſion to talke with this Iaques; telling him, That hauing found him faithfull vnto her, ſhe would direct him a courſe wherby hee might redeeme himſelfe out of captiuitie, ſo as he would principally obſerue what ſhe did preſcribe. Iaques hauing promiſed to execute whatſoeuer this lady ſhould enjoin him, though it were to the haſarding of his life; ſhe then ſaid vnto him, You know the Tartarian whoſe captiues we are hath an elder brother a very rich man, who of late is become blind and deaf, by reaſon of a great catarrhe and defluxion which is fallen down into his eyes I and ears, wherwith his brother ſeems to be much afflicted. I haue a jewel which my Lord and husband gaue me when we were made ſure; the which I haue kept carefully, hiding it ſometimes in my hair, ſomtimes in my old tatterd rags which I haue worn ſince my captiuity: the which I haue much eſteemed, for that my deare ſpouſe aſſured me, that the ſtone which was ſet in this jewel had many and ſingular vertues, and amongſt others, that it would reſtore the ſight which was loſt by defluxion, and cure deafnes, ſo as it were not natural or too inueterate. I am reſolued to take out the ſtone and deliuer it to thee: after which thou maiſt ſound the Tartarian, whether he wil ſet thee at libertie if thou cureſt his brother; making him ſweare ſolemnly not to retain the ſtone, but to ſuffer thee to carry it away, to the end thou mayſt reſtore it vnto me without his knowledge. Hauing reſolued vpon this plot, the lady ſaid vnto K him, You muſt alſo demand of the ſick man an horſe and ſome mony, with paſports to go into your country, to the end thou mayſt go ſpeedily to my deare husband, whereſoeuer thou ſhalt hear of him, and deliuer him my letters and bring mee an anſwer if it be poſſible. Iaques hauing ſworn to perform whatſoeuer the lady commanded him, beeing at libertie, the princeſſe deliuered him the ſtone, he ſwearing to reſtore it vnto her again ſo ſoone as hee had done his cure, if it were not taken from him by violence.

The Polonian attended with impatiencie, vntil that the Tartarian did talk vnto him of his brothers infirmitie: who finding him one day much afflicted, took occaſion to tel him, that he knew a certain means how to cure his brother without any pain, or taking any thing inwardly. I beleeue nothing (replied the Tartar) for all the phyſitians in the country canot do it: but if L he could effect his ſaying, he promiſed to ſet him at liberty without ranſom, and to giue him wherwithall to conduct him into his country. It is the recompence (ſaid the priſoner) that I meant to demand, and that you ſwear vnto me by your great God, not to faile of your promiſe when I haue performed mine, and not to detain, nor ſuffer any one to take from me the thing I ſhall vſe in the cure. The Tartarian hauing ſolemnly ſworne, and laid his right hand vpon his heart, the Polonian took a time to make preparation for his cure. The Tartarian although he diſtruſted his new phyſitian, yet he acquainted his brother with the project; who beeing deſirous to recouer his ſences, intreated his brother not to neglect the offer, promiſing to ſaue him harmleſſe, both in reſpect of the ranſom which he expected from the Polonian, and the mony he ſhould giue him. The day appointed being come, the Tartarian preſt his priſoner to M perform his promiſe. To whom the diſeaſed man alſo promiſed an horſe, with 50 chequines to return into his Countrey, taking the ſame oath which his brother formerly had done. All things being now readie, hee applied his phyſicall ſtone, binding it faſt vnto one of his eyes

A for the ſpace of ſeuen houres, after which being taken away he ſaw clearly, and in like manner he recouered his other eie, and afterward his hearing by the like application. Whereat the Tartars much rejoiced, giuing vnto the Polonian what they had promiſed, and procuring him paſportes from the Gouernor, without which he could hardly get out of the country.

Iaques ſeeketh out Coresky.

The Polonian before his departure told the Tartarian captain that he had a ſute vnto him, which was, That the Polonian woman which was alſo his priſoner was his neer kinſwoman, intreating him, that in reſpect of his good office he had don vnto his brother, he would vſe her and her little infant better, & that as ſoon as he were returned into his country, he would take a courſe for her ranſome, and perhaps would bring it himſelf. The Polonian hauing acquainted the Lady with what had paſt, and deliuered her jewell faithfully vnto her, hauing receiued B her letters to prince Coresky, and vowed to find him out, he took his leaue. This Polonian trauelling toward his country met with one of the ſame nation, who hauing bin taken priſoner with prince Alexander, made an eſcape. Theſe two diſcourſing freely of their aduentures, Iaques inquired carefully what was become of the princes who had bin caried priſoners to Conſtantinople by Skinder Baſſa, and eſpecially of Coresky; and hearing that he was in the priſons of the Black ſea, he inquired by what means he might ſpeake with this prince, or at leaſt how he might conuey ſome letters vnto him. To whom he anſwered, that it was very difficult, for that he was ſtreitly garded: but he vnderſtood that the French Embaſſadour had ſometimes leaue to ſend to viſit him, whereof he might inform himſelf more particularly. After this, Iaques entreated his countryman to deliuer certain letters which the princeſſe had written vnto C her kinsfolks, the which he promiſed to perform faithfully, and ſo they parted. Iaques comming to Conſtantinople, grew acquainted with one of the French Embaſſadours men, who was ſomtimes imploied to viſit the Prince, & cary him mony & other neceſſaries; by whoſe means he had acceſſe to the Prince, and deliuered his letters, the which he receiued very ioyfully, hearing of his wiues health. Eight daies after, the Polonian comming to viſit the prince he receiued from him an anſwer to his wife, & ſo took his leaue: who after many troubleſome incounters returned to Bialigrot; where finding the lady all alone (the Tartarian and his ſeruants being gon a hunting) he gaue an account her of his negotiation, and deliuered his letters, wherat ſhe much rejoiced, hearing that he was aliue; though infinitly grieued at his captiuitie, vnderſtanding that the grand Seignior had refuſed to put him to ranſom. After their D diſcourſe, the Princeſſe aduertiſed her faithfull Agent, That ſince his departure the Tartar grew jealous of her qualitie, and had inquired of her what her husband, her kinsfolk, and their eſtates were. To whom ſhe had anſwered, That her husband was a Captain who had been taken priſoner with prince Alexander, and carried with him into Turky; and as for her other kinsfolks they were all ſoldiers, who had bin ruined during the wars of Moldauia. Deſiring the Polonian to remember it well, leſt they ſhould be found to differ when they ſhould come to treat of her ranſom. The Tartarian returning ſoone after to his houſe, he found Iaques the Polonian there, whom he entertained very kindly, both in regard of the good offices hee had done for his brother, and for the hope he had of his priſoners ranſome, remembring that Iaques had told him that ſhe was his kinſwoman, and that it might be he would bring it. After ſome E little diſcourſe, Iaques asked him what ranſom he would require for his Polonian priſoner. To whom the Tartarian anſwered, That he would haue 6000 chequines for her and her ſonne, vnleſſe he would giue him the ſtone with the which he had cured his brother. To whom the Polonian replied, That as for the ſtone, it was not in his power, hauing reſtored it to a Nobleman whom he had followed when he was taken priſoner. And as for the ranſom which he demaunded for his priſoner and her child, it was more than ſhe and all her kindred were worth, ſhee being wife to a captain who had bin taken priſoner at the defeat of Alexander, and for want of means was ſtil detained. The Tartarian interrupted him, ſaying, That he vnderſtood ſhee was of noble extraction, and that ſhe had rich kinsfolks, who would not ſuffer her to ſpend her life in captiuitie. I confeſſe, ſaid the Polonian, that ſhe is iſſued from noble parents, but they are F ruined during the troubles of Moldauia; adding withall, that he would not haue returned, if he had thought he would haue demanded aboue 1000 Chequines, the which he offered him, intreating him to accept it, in regard ſhe was his kinſwoman, and for the good office hee had don for his brother. You haue bin ſatisfied, replied the Tartarian, and haue no cauſe to complaine.

Prince Coreſky his wife redeemed from the Tartars.

plain. Notwithſtanding after ſome conteſting, by the mediation of the Captaines brother who had bin ſo wel cured, the ladies ranſome was ſet at three thouſand chequines, wherof her G faithfull agent gaue preſent intelligence to prince Charles brother to prince Coreſky, who ſent this ſum with all poſſible ſpeed: and ſo the princeſſe and her little infant were redeemed from captiuity, and conducted into Polonia by her faithful ſolicitor. From whence ſhe aduertiſed the prince by letters, of her deliuery. This relation was written by a Frenchman, who by his report was preſent in all the troubles of Moldauia. But as touching her deliuery by meanes of the cure, I canot warrant it, but leaue it to the cenſure of phyſitians and Naturaliſts, who can beſt iudge of the vertues of ſtones, herbs, and plants; but it is certain that ſhe was impriſoned and ranſomed as an vnknown perſon.

In the year 1617 there came to Paris a Chiaus a Spaniſh Renegado, called Solyman, ſent H from Conſtantinople with letters from Sultan Achmat to the King, for the deliuery of twentie eight ſlaues, who had redeemed their liberty for mony in diuers ports of Italy, and in their return to Conſtantinople had bin taken by the ſhips of Marſeilles. The King cauſed them to be ſet at liberty. But the Chiaus had charge alſo to intreat his Maieſty to cauſe juſtice to be done vpon the Moores Granadines, expelled out of Spain, and wronged in their goods & perſons vpon their paſſage into France: wherin he had what contentment he could expect of juſtice.
Notwithſtanding he did witneſſe openly his amaſement at their long delaies, in the diſpatch of ſuits; ſaying plainly, That France which had the reputation thorowout the world, to maintaine euery mans right inuiolably, did no juſtice but after long and tedious purſuits; and that the execution of decrees was many times longer than the ſuit it ſelfe. Whereas the I Turks juſtice (ſaid he) was ſpeedily adminiſtred to euery man, & within eight daies they ſaw an end of the greateſt and moſt important ſuits. This Chiaus was fauorably entertained, and defraied with his train for the ſpace of ſix or ſeuen moneths at the Kings charge.

As the Turks eſtate hath not growne great but by combuſtions, ſo it is ordinarily full of troubles; wherby it ſeems the preſeruation thereof depends in making war vpon others, or to ſupport it, when as neighbour princes ſeeke to recouer that which they had vniuſtly wreſted from them by the Othoman force. So this great Eſtate entertained this yeare foure great Armies, two at land, the one againſt the Perſian his antient enemy; the other (conſiſting in a maner all of Tartarians) againſt the king of Poland, as ſupporting the part of the Vayuod of Moldauia againſt the Turke, who had ſetled another in that prouince. And two nauall Ar- K mies, the one in the Black ſea againſt the Coſſacks and Raſſians, who made daily incurſions into the Othomans country; men wholly giuen to arms, who go to ſea in ſmall boats, able to carry but fiue or ſix men, made of the bodies of hollow trees; but they are in a maner inuincible with theſe kind of boats: for when as the diſaduantages of a combat forces them to ſound a retreit, they retyre neer vnto the land, and in ſuch places where the Turkiſh gallies canot approch, and ſo they eaſily preuent a totall ouerthrow. Finally, in caſe of neceſſitie they carry their veſſels with them: for in the end of the laſt yeare, finding the paſſage of the blacke ſea ſtopped at the mouth of the riuer of Danow, by the Turkiſh gallies, they put their boats into carts, and taking the way by the mountains brought them eaſily into the ſea. Their fourth army was in the white ſea, as they call it, imploied either to conduct the Carauan which brings L the tribute from Egypt to Conſtantinople, or in ſearch of the gallies of Malta and Florence, which ſcour thoſe ſeas continually to anoy the Turk. The army againſt the Perſian was led by Haly Baſſa ſucceſſor to Mehemet Baſſa, he who fled into Perſia after hee had loſt ſixty thouſand men in a ſet battel; after which being ſent for to come to Conſtantinople, fearing that the Sultan would take reuenge of ſo great a loſſe vpon his life, hee retyred to the Sophy and there remained.

The Turkes being much annoyed both at ſea and land by the Vſcoques, made great complaint to the States of Venice, with whom they were in league, being greatly grieued at their thefts, and complaining much, that they could not paſſe by ſea without danger of ſeruitude or death: adding withall, That theſe pirats hauing gotten a way into Turky by the Venetian M territories, they were by them made ſlaues and ſlain in their own countries; and although they went not from their houſes, nor vndertook any voyages, yet they were ſtil in alarm and ſubiect vnto ruin. That the ſmall reſiſtance which was made gaue great cauſe of jealouſie that there was

A was ſome ſecret intelligence betwixt the ſubiects of the Seigniory of Venice, and the Vſcoques, and that they diuided the ſpoyle betwixt them. Finally, that in what ſort ſoeuer the matter paſt, they held them inſupportable to al men, but eſpecially to themſelues. The Turks threatned to take their iuſt reuenge, the which being impoſſible to effect in the countrey of the Vſcoques (for that by the letters of the commonwealth of Venice their paſſage was ſtopped) they reſolued to be reuenged vpon their ſubiects, and recouer a part of their goods which they had loſt. Finally, they prepared to come into the gulph of Venice with a mighty army, the which without doubt had brought that State into great extremities, and been very prejudiciall to many Prouinces of Chriſtendome. But for that the inſolencies and thefts of the Vſcoques had like to haue ingaged the Venetians in a dangerous war againſt the Turke with B whom they were in league, it ſhall neither be vnpleaſant nor vnprofitable to make a little digreſſion, and ſhew what theſe Vſcoques were. About the yeare 1550, there aſſembled together in certaine plains neere the ſea belonging to the Princes of the houſe of Auſtria, people (who were cruell, violent, and infamous) from diuers parts of the countrey of Chimera, Dalmatia, and the other confines of Hungarie, and ſuch as had been baniſhed from the State of Venice; whoſe delight was onely to liue vpon ſpoyle and bloud. All theſe theeues being thus gathered together (whom they called by a generall name Vſcoques) as enemies to all art and induſtry to liue honeſtly by their labours, retyred themſelues into a deſart country, receiuing no pay from the Princes of Auſtria who commands there. Being thus by their naturall inclination giuen to ſpoyle, adding thereunto the ſpurre of pouerty, nothing mooued them to C ſtay in thoſe places, but all libertie was left them to rob and ſpoyle: whereupon they applied all their minds and forces; ſo as hauing made certaine light foiſts, they began to make courſes at ſea, with the moſt barbarous and impious crueltie that euer was practiſed amongſt the Scythians, Tartarians, or any other inhumane Nation whatſoeuer. And for that it is an ordinarie courſe for any one that will commit a great villanie, to ſeeke out ſome goodly pretext to couer it: ſo they concluded among themſelues, to ſhadow their inſolencies and thefts with a colour to goe againſt the Infidels. Wherefore in the beginning, there were no Merchants, were they Turks, Iewes, or ſubiects to the Turke, although they were Chriſtians, but if they entred into the gulf either to traffique or to furniſh Venice with prouiſion and merchandiſe, they were taken by them, their goods diuided amongſt them, and they forced to pay a great D ranſome, or to die miſerably. All the ports of the State of Venice, both of Iſtria, Dalmatia, and the Iſlands from whence they receiued their victuals and prouiſion, were ſoon after ſhut vp by theſe pyrats, who not content to ſpoyle the Turks (which trafficked no more by reaſon of their great dangers and loſſe) allured by the rich ſpoyles which they tooke, and the deſire they had to encounter them, they began to ſet vpon the Venetian ſhips, forcing the merchants whom they tooke to confeſſe by torments, that the goods belonged to Turks, although in effect their chiefe booty came from Chriſtians. Hauing drawne many vnto them of their owne humors, and thinking their ſpoyles at ſea not ſufficient to ſatisfie their couetous deſires, nor the Preſents which they were to giue to others, to be fauoured and ſupported in the Courts of Princes, they ſtaid not long before they entred with all violence into the Turks countrey, E through the Venetian territorie, to whom they were as hurtfull as to the Turks; from whence they carried away rich ſpoiles and many priſoners. There was nothing that was precious, rich, or good, but was ſubiect to the inſatiable greedineſſe of thoſe pitileſſe theeues and pyrats, if paſſing by ſea they came neer vnto the maritine coaſts. Whereupon grew the great complaint you haue heard made by the Turks, threatning to be reuenged vpon the Eſtate of Venice for the inſolencie of the Vſcoques, which afterward bred a cruell war, betwixt that State and the Archduke Ferdinand of Grets, now Emperor, who ſeemed to ſupport them, thereby to ingage the State in a war with the Turke. But for that the ſucceſſe thereof doth not belong to our Hiſtory, we will leaue it to them that haue written it at large.

The beginning of the Vſcoques.

The death of Achmat.

On the fifteenth of Nouember this yeare, Sultan Achmat Chan hauing liued thirty yeares, F and gouerned that great Empire of Turky fifteene, died. When hee came to the Empire, he was but fifteene yeares old; he was of a good conſtitution, well complexioned, and ſomewhat enclined to be fat, ſtrong and actiue, which appeared by his exerciſe in caſting of a horſmans mace of nine or ten pounds weight, wherein hee exceeded any one of his Court; in memorie whereof there are two pillars ſet vp in one of the courts of the ſeraglio at Conſtantinople,with G an inſcription,as marks of his dexteritie. He was by nature ambitious and proud,which ſome hold qualities befitting his great eſtate : he was not ſo cruel as many of his predeceſſors, but was much giuen to ſenſualitie and pleaſure,for which he entertained three thouſand Concubins and virgins in a Seraglio ; being the faireſt daughters of the Chriſtians. His mother was a Chriſtian of Boſna or of Cyprus,and therfore it was thought he was ſomwhat fauorable to Chriſtians. He was much delighted in hawking and hunting ; and namely for hawking hee kept in Grecia and Natolia forty thouſand falconers,who attended his comming in their ſeueral places of charge,and had good yearly penſions. Neither were his huntſmen much fewer in number,or of leſſe charge. As the Turkiſh Emperors are bound by the law of their religion once euery day to practiſe ſome manual trade,ſo Mahomet his father gaue himſelf to the making H of arrows,and Achmat to the faſhioning of horn rings ſuch as the Turks wear when they draw their bowes. This they do in the morning after they are ready and haue ſaid their prayers, then they call for their exerciſe ; but it is onely for faſhion-ſake : for they ſcarce make an arrow or a ring in a whole year.

MUSTAPHA BROTHER TO ACHMAT AND SONNE TO MAHOMET THE THIRD, THE NINTH EMPEROVR OF THE TURKES

Nought but affliction thundring out of heauen, makes men on earth to any goodneſſe giuen.
Nor longer than ſhe thunders, any fear that any heav'n holds any Thunderer.
So Muſtapha, while Heaven reſtrain'd his ſtate, and held him fetter'd in his brothers hate, To vertuous actions did his ſtudies driue, was curteous, pious, and contemplatiue.
But when his brother could no longer liue, and Libertie did to him Power giue; Then Pride and Tyrannie his horſes were,
And driue him alwaies paſt Heavens loue or fear, Greatneſſe, on Goodneſſe loues to ſlide, not ſtand, and leaues for Fortunes ice, Vertues firm land.
Honor had rather be with danger driuen, than ſtay with Vertue on the hand of Heauen.

MVSTAPHA THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, NINTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKS.

Muſtapha obtains the Empire, but is ſoon after depoſed.

Oſman the eldeſt ſon of Achmat beeing not aboue twelue years old, Muſtapha the brother of Achmat being 25, was drawn out of a Cell where he then liued as it were religiouſly and in contemplation, and proclaimed Sultan Muſtapha Chan. They write of him, That he grew cruell, cauſing yong Oſman to be kept vnder ſure gards, putting his brethren to death. Hee alſo did many indignities to the Chriſtian Embaſſadours. And to confirme him in his Throne, hee gaue great ſums of money to the Ianizaries and Spahi; and ſent a meſſenger to Vienna to the Emperor, to aſſure him that hee would maintain inviolably whatſoeuer had bin concluded betwixt him and his deceaſed brother Achmat. But growing odious by reaſon of his tyrannie, the grand Viſier came out of Perſia with an Army and depoſed him, forcing him to return to his cel, ſetting prince Oſman at liberty, & ſeating him in the Imperial throne. But for that it may ſeem ſtrange, that Muſtapha ſhould be preſerued aliue during the reign of his brother Achmat (contrary to the cuſtom of the Othoman Emperors, who do vſually kill all their brethren at their firſt comming to the crown, thinking thereby the better to aſſure their eſtates) it ſhall be fit to make mention therof. Mahomet the third of that name, dying in the year 1602, and leauing Achmat and Muſtapha his ſonnes by the Sultana Flatra a Lady of Cyprus, ſome ſay of Boſna, Achmat the eldeſt was ſent for ſpeedily out of Magneſia, by the Baſſa's, to take poſſeſſion of his fathers crown, being the firſt Emperour of that name. And for that the cuſtom of the Turkiſh Emperors was (as wee haue ſaid) to haue neither brother nor nephew aliue, vnleſſe they could ſaue themſelues by flight; yet the Viſier Baſſa's and other officers of the court concluded in Councel, That it was not fit that Muſtapha brother to Achmat ſhould die: grounding their opinion vpon a good reaſon of ſtate, For that their Emperor being but fifteen years old, they feared, that dying in his nonage without children able to gouern, the Empire might fall into combuſtion, and ruine it ſelfe by reaſon of ciuil wars: whereupon they decreed, That Muſtapha's life ſhould be preſerued, but with that caution and reſtriction, that he ſhould remain ſtill a priſoner in ſome chambers of the Emperours Seraglio at Conſtantinople.

During Achmats minoritie, and before hee had children, there was no cruel decree made againſt Muſtapha; but he onely continued in his contemplation without any liberty. But when as the Emperor ſaw himſelfe fortified with iſſue, and remembring the cruel cuſtome of his predeceſſors, he many times propounded the putting of his brother to death to his counſell. The which may ſeem very ſtrange it took not effect, hauing beene often concluded. Among others it is written, that his death was concluded one euening, and that it ſhould haue beene put in execution the next day. But Achmat was ſo frighted in the night with apparitions and fearefull dreames, that morning being come he ſaid, ſeeing the onely reſolution of putting his brother to death had ſo terrified him, hee did beleeue that his torments would much encreaſe if he ſhould put it in execution. And therefore he commanded, that his brother ſhould liue, more in regard of the terror of his mind, than for any brotherly affection. Another time Sultan Achmat being in one of the windowes of the Seraglio, beheld his brother Muſtapha, who by his permiſſion was walking in the gardens with his gard. Some one of the Baſſaes or other officers that were neere vnto him, and willing to flatter his humor, told him, That it was a matter of great conſequence to ſuffer him to haue ſo great libertie. Achmat (mooued with jealouſie and diſtruſt) grew into a rage at his words, and thereupon tooke his bow and arrow (being a very expert Archer, as all the Turkiſh Nation generally are) and aimed at his brother to kill him: but at that very inſtant he felt ſo great a paine in his arme and ſhoulder, as not able to let looſe his arrow, nor to perform what he had intended, hee ſaid with a loud voice, That Mahomet would not haue Muſtapha to die. This prince had three chambers in the Seraglio, where he remained a priſoner fifteen years, and ſpent his time in a contemplatiue kinde of life, after the manner of the Muſſulmans: his whole delight was to reade the Arabian bookes of their doctors in diuers ſciences. The grand Seignior gaue him leaue ſometimes to take the aire of his gardens with his Gard, and admitted him of his counſell in diuers affaires of ſtate; taking his aduice many times, for that he knew him to haue a ſound judgement.

After a long impriſonment, and a daily apprehenſion of death, the Emperour Achmat falling grieuouſly ſick in Nouember, as is before ſaid; the great Baſſa's of the Court and other Counſellors about him, ſeeing the great danger he was in, perſuaded him to take ſome good courſe for the ſucceſſion of his Empire. He had children by the Sultana, but they were all ſo young, that they were not capable to gouerne the Empire. Moreouer, this Sultana was dead, and the children left friendleſſe, hauing none to ſpeake for them. But on the other ſide, the Sultana Flatra mother to the Emperour Muſtapha was yet liuing, who thought that if the Baſſa's ſhould vndertake to gouern the State during the minoritie of the Emperors children, her honour would be much eclipſed: wherfore ſhe fauoured Muſtapha, and perſuaded the dying Emperour to make him his ſucceſſor. On the fifteenth day of Nouember, Achmat ſeeing his end draw neer, called for his brother and told him, that ſeeing death approch, he deſired to prouide for the preſeruation of the Empire, and therefore had made choice of him to ſucceed him; intreating him to take the gouernment vpon him preſently after his death. Muſtapha was much amaſed at his ſpeech, and anſwered him with words full of feare and humility, That he might not accept of the honour which he did him, ſeeing that the Empire did rightly belong vnto his eldeſt ſon. Achmat diſabled his ſon for ſo great a gouernment, both for his age and capacitie, being neceſſarie for the maintenance of ſo great a monarchie; and ſaid that he for his ripe yeares and deep iudgement, ſhould take vpon him the managing thereof: recommending the children he had by the Sultana, vnto him, intreating him to vſe them in the ſame manner that he had vſed him; leauing the other children which hee had by concubines being his ſlaues, to his diſcretion. Soon after theſe words Achmat died, and Muſtapha was generally acknowledged for ſucceſſor to the Turkiſh Empire. Who at the firſt was ſo amaſed, as he had thought he had bin in a dream, to ſee himſelfe aduanced to ſo great a power and ſoueraigntie, from a ſtreit priſon and a daily apprehenſion of death. At his firſt comming to the empire he cauſed the Perſian Embaſſador to be ſet at libertie, whom his brother Achmat had cauſed to be reſtrained, contrary to the publique faith, for that newes came to the Court, of ſome combuſtions raiſed by the Perſia. After which, he ſent ſpeedily to the Baſſa of Buda, commaunding him to entertaine the treaty of peace made by his predeceſſor with the Emperour inuiolably. Yet notwithſtanding, he carried himſelfe during the ſmall time of his reigne,

A reign inſolently and cruelly; for violating the Laws of Nations, he had il intreated the Baron of Mole or Sancie Embaſſador to the moſt Chriſtian King, ſetting gards vpon him as a priſoner, hauing cauſed his people to be put in priſon, and tortured after their maner. The reaſon of this indignitie which Muſtapha did vnto the French Embaſſadour and to his people, grew vpon an occaſion which will require an ample diſcourſe, for the better vnderſtanding of that which hath gon before. After the ouerthrow and taking of the princes of Moldavia, Prince Concsky, as you haue heard, was brought by Skinder Baſſa to Conſtantinople, wherat the grand Seignior was wonderfully wel pleaſed, for that he was held, euen by his enemies, for one of the moſt valiant and redoubted princes of Chriſtendom. Wherfore he was ſent away priſoner, and confined to the towers of the black ſea, which are diſtant fiue miles from Conſtantinople; B a place appointed for the gard of priſoners of great qualitie and importance, ſuch as he was. He was ſhut vp with a French captain called Rigaut, in a little chamber which was on the top of one of thoſe towers; in which Chamber there was a window capable for a man to paſſe thorow, and yet it had no bars, for that the height of the place freed it from al ſuſpition.
This Prince was much ſolicited by the Turk to become a Renegado, as the princes Alexander and Bougdan his brothers in law had don: but hee reſiſted it with a generous reſolution, reſoluing rather to die in that tedious captiuitie, than commit ſo baſe an act againſt God and his conſcience. The which being made known vnto the King of Polonia, it mooued him to compaſſion, and cauſed him to write to the French Embaſſador, and to intreat him to be a means that this Prince might be put to ranſom, and freed from captiuitie, at what price ſoeuer. The C which the Embaſſador durſt not vndertake (although he deſired it much) for that hee had no charge from the King his maſter. The Emperours Embaſſadour did what poſſibly he could, knowing how much the liberty of this prince might auail Chriſtendom. For which conſiderations the Turk would not yeeld in any ſort to ſuffer him to be releaſed; ſo as the friends of this captiue prince were out of hope euer to ſee him at liberty. But moſt commonly in ſuch extremities the Almighty works by the ſecret inſtruments of his diuine prouidence, & giues aſſiſtance vnto them that feare him, when as all humane helpe and hope faileth; as you may vnderſtand in the ſequell of this hiſtory, whence grew the Embaſſadours affront which hee receiued.

About the ſame time there had bin a Lady taken out of Podolia, with a fair yong daughter D of hers, and a maid ſeruant, by the Tartarians, who ſould them vnto a Turke, and he brought them vnto Conſtantinople to make his profit. This Lady who was a Chriſtian, hearing nothing from her husband for the ſpace of nine moneths, went accompanied with her daughter to the French Embaſſadors houſe which was at Pera, to craue his aid and aſſiſtance. Where his Secretary (who was called Martin) mooued with compaſſion and loue, promiſed vnto them all ſeruice; and afterwards aſſured the mother, That if ſhee would promiſe hee ſhould marry her daughter, he would indeauor to redeem them from captiuitie. Wherto the Ladies yeelded, and paſſed their promiſe in writing vnto the Secretary. Whereupon he payd two thouſand and fiue hundred Crownes for their ranſome, and ſent them home into their owne Countrey. Being returned, the Lady made her husband and the reſt of her friends acquainted, E how they had been freed from captiuitie, and of the contract of mariage which was paſt between her daughter and the French Embaſſadors Secretarie. But the father did altogether diſlike of this mariage, for that Martin, as he ſaid, was no gentleman, and had not an eſtate to entertaine his daughter according to her qualitie. The mother aduertiſed Martin ſoon after of the fathers refuſall; proteſting vnto him, that he alone was the hinderance. And as for the mony which he had disburſed for their ranſome, they would ſend it vnto him if he pleaſed to Conſtantinople with intereſt. Martin was much diſcontented, and diuers letters and expoſtulations paſſed betweene them, but hee could not obtaine the execution of his deſire, and their promiſe: whereupon he grew full of griefe and melancholy, and thereupon went to viſit Prince Coreskie, who was in the blacke tower, to make his complaint vnto him, and to take his F aduice, what courſe he were beſt to follow. Hee made his excuſe, That hee was ſent by his maſter to carry the Prince ſome mony, as he had don at other times. Who making the prince acquainted with his diſcontent, (for that he knew theſe Podolians, and had formerly allowed of the ſuit which he had made to this virgin) he comforted him, ſaying, That if hee might

by any means get out of priſon, he would willingly ſupply the defects which they obiected againſt him, and would maintaine him againſt all that ſhould oppoſe themſelues againſt the accompliſhment of his deſires. This made Martin ſtudy by what meanes hee might free the Prince, to the end he might bind him to ſuccor him when he was at liberty; and Loue, which is many times the author of many goodly inuentions, ſuggeſted one vnto him which was very ſubtil, and difficult to execute: which was, to ſend vnto Prince Coresky a bottom of packthred in a little pie; which hee ſent him with other meat, aduertiſing him by a letter, That vpon a certain night concluded betwixt them, he ſhould put downe the packethred at his Chamber window, wherunto a ladder of cords ſhould be tied, by the which hee might deſcend from the tower. The which was afterwards punctually effected, not by Martin himſelf, but by a Greek Prieſt who liued in Conſtantinople, to whom hee had imparted his enterpriſe, and had inganged him vpon hope of great reward from the Prince. In the mean time Martin, doubting that he ſhould be ſuſpected to practiſe this eſcape, reſolued to be gon, and took leaue of the Embaſſador, whom hee gaue to vnderſtand, That hee had ſome preſent vrgent affaires which did preſſe his ſpeedy returne into France: and therfore he left the execution of his deſigne to the Greek prieſt, who failed not at the time appointed to do as the Secretary had directed him. The Prince hauing drawn vp this ladder of ropes with the help of his packethread, and beeing come to the foot of the tower with his chamber fellow, he found the Greek prieſt attending for them; who told him that he had charge from Martin, to conduct them to a certain Caue which was is a great rock a league from thence, where they muſt remain all that day; and that in the euening he would not fail to come vnto them, and bring them habits like vnto his own; that being ſo diſguiſed, he might conduct them to his lodging in Conſtantinople, and there conceal them ſo long as they ſhould think fit. This deuice pleaſed them wel, and ſo they went all three vnto the ſaid caue, wheras the two camrado's hid themſelues, and the prieſt returned to his houſe.

Prince Coresky eſcapes out of priſon.

At the break of day, it being the 23 of Nouember 1617, ſome of the gards entring the priſoners chamber, ſaw that they were eſcaped, and found the ladder of ropes which they had vſed, tied to the window; wherat they were much amaſed, knowing wel that they ſhould ſmart for it. Notwithſtanding he who had the charge of the priſons, ſent ſpeedily to Conſtantinople, to giue notice of their eſcapes. So ſoon as this was known, they ſent poſts ſpeedily to all parts, to make inquiry for theſe fugitiues, eſpecially at the ports and paſſages, giuing them ſpecial charge to obſerue all men that paſſed, if there were not one of them who had the little finger of his right hand ſhrunk vp, as Prince Coresky had by a wound which hee had receiued. Within few daies after, the Turk ſeiſed vpon the ſeruants of the Baron of Sancy or Mole, Embaſſador for the French, torturing two of them after their manner; which is to lay the party vpon a table on his belly, and to giue him three or four hundred blowes with a ſtaffe vpon the ſoles of his feet, the calues of his legs, and his buttocks: yet could they not make them ſay any thing that might charge their maſter, as theſe Turkiſh tormentors did hope. Not contented herewith, they did as much to a poor Turk, who was a weauer by trade, and dwelt neer vnto the Embaſſador; thinking to force him by this cruel torture to depoſe falſly, that he had ſeen the Secretary Martin going and comming to his maſters lodging vntill the time of the priſoners eſcape: but God would not ſuffer the weauer to depoſe any thing but the truth, notwithſtanding all the miſerable and cruel torments which hee had ſuffered. The which is worthy the obſeruation, for that the Turks do generally hate the Chriſtians mortally, and do greatly rejoice at their diſaſters. As for the gards of the towers, ſome of them were impaled, and ſome were pouned or beaten to pieces in great iron mortars, wherin they vſually poun their rice to reduce it into meal.

Three daies after, the Chiaus Baſſa had charge to ſeiſe vpon the perſon of the French Embaſſadour; the which he performed very ſeuerely and vnciuilly, without any reſpect vnto his qualitie. Hauing taken him, the ſaid Chiaus led him vnto the Viſier Baſſa's houſe; where hauing beene examined vpon many circumſtances touching the eſcape of the prince Coresky, they left him as a priſoner in the hands of the ſaid Chiaus, where hee continued for the ſpace of three daies. During the which time, the ſaid Embaſſador deſiring to write to ſome of his friends, and alſo to ſpeak with the Muſti, which is the Turks high prieſt, to acquaint him with his

The French embaſſadour impriſoned by the Turks.

A his iuſt grieuances, he could obtain leaue, but by giuing two thouſand crownes vnto his Iaylor. True it is, that this preſent made the Chiaus tel the Embaſſador, That if he would obtain any fauor from the Mufti, he muſt procure it with mony. According to which aduice he gaue three or four thouſand crowns; wherupon the Mufti became tractable, acquainting the grand Seignior Muſtapha with the Embaſſadors iuſt complaints, and of what importance his detention was, ſeeing there was nothing found to charge him, that he had fauored the eſcape of the Prince Coresky, as it was ſuſpected; and that his Secretary who had practiſed it for his owne priuat profit, had left his maſter aboue ten or twelue daies before the ſaid eſcape, with an intent, as he ſaid, to return into France. Finally, That all the world would taxe him to violate the law of Nations: and that no Chriſtian prince nor other would herafter put any confidence in him; and it was to be feared, that they would all ioine together, and make war againſt him. B And in truth the Embaſſadours, both the King of Englands and the Low-Countries, were much diſcontented at this vnworthy vſage of the French; proteſting openly, That if he were not ſpeedily ſet at liberty, they would retyre themſelues into their countries. All which conſiderations repreſented by the Mufti, mooued the grand Seignior to command, that the ſayd Baron of Mole or Sancy ſhould be ſent back vnto his houſe without any further diſpleaſure. But all this could not free his houſhold ſeruants from their impriſonment, but he was forced to pay two or three and twenty thouſand crowns for their redemption; elſe had they beene ſo tormented, as that their liues had been in danger: for ſo they were threatned. Soone after, the grand Viſier hearing of the tyrannous gouernment Of Sultan Muſtapha, returned from Perſia C with his whole army toward Conſtantinople, where he forced him to leaue the Empire, and to retyre into his Cel, hauing reigned but two moneths and ſome odde daies.

But to returne to prince Coresky, whom wee left with Captaine Rigaut in the lodging of the Greeke prieſt at Conſtantinople, wheras they lay hidden for the ſpace of two moneths, vntil that their good hoſt got leaue from the Patriark of Alexandria, as well for himſelfe as for two others (who he ſaid were of his ſocietie) to goe and confine themſelues in the deſarts of the Archipelagus, with many hermits who liued there after the maner of the antient Anchorits. Hauing gotten this leaue and paſport, they imbarqued, being diſguiſed like prieſts, and arriued at Etchut, where they found an Engliſh ſhip ready to ſet ſail for Meſſina in Sicily: from whence he went by land to Naples, where he made himſelfe known to the King of Poland his D Embaſſador, who was wonderfull glad of his liberty, leading him to the duke of Oſſuna, then Viceroy of Naples, who furniſhed him with all things neceſſarie, and a good conuoy to go to Rome; where the Pope receiued ſingular content to ſee him, and to hear of his ſtrange aduentures. From thence he paſt to Vienna, where the Emperor entertained him according to his merits. After which he retyred to his own houſe, full of honor, gotten by his valour and conſtancie in his afflictions. Some ſay he eſcaped by the black ſea, and ſo into Polonia.

Prince Coresky eſcapes from Conſtantinople.

Ætatis ſuæ xvi Anno Domini 1621

Oſman, thy gentle nature far declin'd from Turkiſh tyrannie and pride of mind; Which made heauen raiſe thee, and extirpat them, the proud Vſurpers of thy Diadem.
O! would all Princes, when their States are bleſt with Power and Empire, think their intereſt In thoſe their bleſſings, held but by the grace Of Gratitude and Goodneſſe; and no place Is held without them long: they ſoone would trie, that Truth preuailes paſt all their Policie.

OSMAN THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, TENTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKS.

1618.

The French king ſends to Conſtantinople.

PRince Oſman beeing ſet at liberty by the Grand Viſier, hee cauſed him to be proclaimed Sultan, and ſeated in the Imperiall throne of the Othomans, with the generall applauſe of all the Baſſaes and army. The French Em- C baſſadour beeing by the ſame meanes freed from this guard, aduertiſed the King his Maſter, how barbarouſly he had beene entreated by Muſtapha, entreating his Majeſty to reuoke him from that charge. Whereupon the King ſent two Gentlemen to Conſtantinople to the new Emperour Oſman, to demand reparation of the indignity done to his Embaſſadour and Secretary; and to let him vnderſtand, that hee could not ſend any other Embaſſadour to his Court to condole the death of Sultan Achmat his father, nor congratulate his comming to the Eaſt, vntill that he had receiued ſatiſ- D faction from him befitting his dignity, and the wrongs he had receiued in his Embaſſador. The Grand Viſier and the Muphti hearing this Embaſſie, and conſidering of the actions which had paſſed, aduiſed the Emperour Oſman to ſend an Embaſſador to the moſt Chriſtian King to confirme the league, and to teſtifie both by words and letters how much he was diſpleaſed for his diſcontent.

The Grand Seignior by the aduice of the Viſier and others, ſent Vri Chiaus into France, to confirme the articles of peace betwixt the French and the Turks. At his firſt audience he preſented a Letter vnto his Majeſty with this ſuperſcription.

To the moſt glorious and puiſſant Prince of the Beleefe of Ieſus, arbitrator of all the E differences which happen among the Chriſtian Nations, and of all the moſt noble, and the moſt antient, the Emperour of France, to whom we wiſh the end of his daies to be happy, and his deſire accompliſhed.

Oſmans letter to the French King.

KNow, that I ſend vnto you the capitulations and treaties of peace which are betwixt our majeſties: giuing you to vnderſtand, that there is not any thing firme or ſtable in this world, neither King nor beggar, although they liue long: that which pleaſeth God cannot faile. If all mens deſires ſhould ſucceed, without doubt all men would goe to heauen. Man whatſoeuer he doeth, or in what dignity ſoeuer hee be, ſhall not remaine in this fraile life, wiſe men know it, and it is apparent to the learned. By that which F we haue ſaid, we deſire to let you know, that he who was in health, hath encountred death, and is gone to a goodlier place, to Paradiſe, my father Sultan Achmat Chan; the God which hath no reſemblance haue mercy on him. No man ſhall remaine in this lying World: And in Paradiſe are the approches to God, where there is no death. Finally he is gone.

Since the beginning of the Othomans vntill this preſent, the empire of my fathers and their countries from from father and ſonne, from hand to hand, and from father to ſonne, the inheritance comming ſo vnto vs; our Vncle Sultan Muſtapha Chan, for that he was elder than our ſelfe, was preferred before vs to the throne of the Ottomans, and was ſome daies in peaceable poſſeſſion of the Empire, yeelding juſtice equally to all men both great and ſmall. But as he was ſhut vp many yeares in ſecret places, praying vnto God continually; ſo of himſelfe he hath relinquiſhed the dignity of the Emperour, and contemned it. The Empire then belonged to thoſe of our high linage, and for that by right it ſhould come vnto me, the Almighty God by his infinite bounty and mercy hath reſtored it into my hands, my Viſiers, Baſſaes, Lieutenants, the Mufti, and other great perſonages, and they that are in any reſpect with me: and finally, all my ſubjects and vaſſals, by a generall conſent haue acknowledged me for Emperor, in the happy yeare 1027. About the firſt day of the Moone of Ianuary, in a good houre. Wherefore I am ſeated in the great throne of the Othomans, like vnto that of Solomon, a powerfull and able Emperor: And in all our countries and cities, all the Muſulmans being aſſembled together in their churches to preach, the greatneſſe of my name hath beene proclaimed, and through all the mints of mine Empire they haue grauen it in their ſtamps, to coyne pieces of gold and ſiluer. Finally, whereoſoeuer there are any Muſulmans, and in what places there are men, my name ſhines like gold. Hereafter injuſtice nor impiety ſhall haue no place, but juſtice ſhall be done equally. Now we are in joy, and for that our naturall diſpoſition is good, and the antient friendſhip betwixt vs is perfect, I therefore thought good to aduertiſe you of all that hath paſſed here, and to ſend you our Letters of Imperiall alliance by Vreiu Chiaus who is my antient ſeruant, hauing had the managing of my treaſure, whereof he hath giuen me good account, being arriued at your Court, carrying my ſaid Letter, he deſerues to be receiued with honour: ſwearing and proteſting againe vnto you, to obſerue in all points the full capitulation made betwixt my predeceſſors, and your great grandfathers, and for our part, you may be aſſured, that the faith promiſed ſhall be maintained as it hath beene heretofore by our predeceſſors. And from the day I entred into my throne, I haue made my will knowne to all the Viceroyes, and other officers which do my juſtice, and generally to all thoſe of my obedience; entreating you to giue the like commandement to your Gouernours of Prouinces, and other officers of Iuſtice, as in like manner to all your ſubjects. And as your grandfathers haue taken the faith of our high family, ſo it may pleaſe you to continue with me, and we deſire on both ſides it may be good and firme. Know then that for my part it ſhall be obſerued, ſo as of your ſide there be nothing done contrary to the promiſed faith. And if before we came vnto the Imperiall throne, your Embaſſadour which did your affaires hath receiued any diſtaſte, and hath not receiued the honor and friendſhip accuſtomed, in my time he ſhall be the more honoured and reſpected as the chiefeſt Embaſſadors haue beene: I haue commanded that he ſhall be greatly fauoured, and our reſpect ſhall be vnto him as Quineo, that is to ſay, Gold, and doubt nothing of it: for I do certifie you.

The French King hauing receiued by this action a full ſatisfaction for the indignity done vnto his Embaſſador: ſoon after he called the Baron of Mole or Sancie home into France, ſending the Earle of Sezi to ſucceed him as Embaſſador at Conſtantinople..

A battell betwixt the Turks and the Perſians.

The war continuing ſtill betwixt the Turks and the Perſians, the grand Viſier was ſent to inuade Perſia with a great army, where after many exploits of war, newes came to Conſtantinople, that the Viſier had gotten a great aduantage vpon the Sophy of Perſia in a battel which had beene fought, wherein there had been 100000 men ſlaine. And although the Turks loſt the greateſt number, yet they remained maſters of the field, and ſpoiled the Perſian campe, who was retired or fled. For that the manner of the Sophy is to fight with the Turks in retiring or giuing way a little; and with this manner of fighting they haue alwaies made head againſt the Turks. After this ouerthrow the Viſier aduanced with his army, and entred far into Perſia, which made many doubt that his returne would proue difficult: yet ſoone after there came letters to Conſtantinople, importing that the Turks being in Perſia in great diſtreſſe for victuals, the Sophy had ſent an Embaſſador to the Viſier to demand peace, promiſing hereafter to ſatisfie the tributes of ſilkes which he ought yearely vnto the Turke; and that the Viſier (in regard of the neceſſity of his army) had accepted his offer, and granted him peace, the which Sultan Oſman did afterwards ratifie. After the concluſion whereof, the Sophy ſent many Cammels loaden with victuals vnto the Turks army, which was in great diſtreſſe and want.

A peace concluded betwixt them.

A comet ſeene ouer Conſtantinople.

During the Turks war in Perſia, vpon the anniuerſary day of Sultan Achmat, there appeared in the night a Comet ouer the city of Conſtantinople; in forme like a crooked ſword, or

A or Turks ſcimiter: and it was ſo great as it extended from the meridian neer vnto our zenith, vnto the horiſon: the point began to ſhew it ſelfe an houre after midnight, and then it appeared little and ſomewhat whitiſh, and gaue but a glimpſe, after an houre it was more apparant and of a deeper colour, and the more it did riſe, the redder it was, and like vnto bloud; but at the breake of day it vaniſhed by little and little in the light: And it was ſo big when the point approched neere vnto the zenith, as the hilt was hidden vnder the horiſon; the Mathematicians did obſerue, that it followed the motions of the heauens; it did alwaies riſe in one place, and the bending of the ſaid ſword was towards Crates, more Southerly than it. It did appeare directly in the Eaſt a quarter towards the South, the point comming directly towards Conſtantinople, and the blade extending it ſelfe to the ſaid Eaſt a quarter to the South, B which is juſtly the part where Perſia is ſcituated. The edge looked directly towards Conſtantinople, the which made men diſcourſe diuerſly, and many were amazed, fearing that it did ſignifie the loſſe and defeat of their army in Perſia, whoſe returne they feared much.

Vri or Huſſeine Chiaus hauing finiſhed his Embaſſie in France, came into England with the like charge, and had audience from his Majeſty at White Hall, Sir Thomas Glouer being Interpreter, from whom I receiued a true diſcourſe of his whole ſpeech, as followeth.

The Turkiſh Embaſſadors ſpeech to his Majeſty.

The interpretation hereof is this.

That moſt true, incomprehenſible, and moſt high God, encreaſe and multiply your Majeſties yeares in E all happineſſe and felicity, Amen oh thou Lord of the World.

The moſt inuincible, moſt mighty, and moſt happy Sultan Oſman Chan, of the Othoman Empire Monarch, ſendeth vnto your excellent Majeſty a hundred thouſand ſalutations and greetings, euermore praying the moſt high God for your Majeſties happineſſe, ſendeth vnto your Highneſſe with all poſsible honour and renowne, this his Imperiall and moſt noble Letter; and withall hopeth, that the ſacred bond of peace, which hath beene hitherto inuiolably on your Majeſties parts kept and obſerued; your Majeſty will be well pleaſed ſtill on your part, with dayly encreaſe more and more of friendſhip, earneſtly to continue therein. And his Imperiall Majeſty on his behalfe is alſo reſolued in the like manner euermore punctually to keepe and obſerue the ſame.

Alſo the moſt mighty Emperour his Tutor, and his chiefe Viſier Baſſa, hath addreſſed to the duſt of your noble feet, this his moſt honorable Letter, with a thouſand commendations, praying euerlaſtingly

The Interpretation Verbatim is this. H

Moſt happy Emperor, as I haue with mine owne hands, bowing my ſelfe to the duſt of your Princely feet, appreſented vnto your excellent Majeſty the moſt mighty and high Sultan Othoman my Lord and Maſter his Imperiall Letter, ſo likewiſe I moſt humbly beſeech your Majeſty, that you will be pleaſed in conformity thereof, to vouchſafe your Princely anſwer by your noble Letter, and to deliuer the ſame into the hands of me your ſlaue : and be euer partaker of all bleſſedneſſe and happineſſe.

A Copy of the Letter of Sultan Oſman the preſent Othoman Emperour, written to the Kings Majeſty, and preſented by Huſſeine Chiaus. I

ALthough in this tranſitory World, if the King or the begger ſhould enjoy the longeſt terme of life that might be, and obtaine all that his heart could wiſh, yet it is moſt certaine, that in the end hee muſt depart and be tranſported to the Word eternall; and it is well knowne vnto the wiſe, that it is impoſſible for man to abide for euer in this World. The occaſion if this prologue is, that the immortall, omnipotent, and only God hath by his Diuine will and pleaſure called vnto himſelfe our father of bleſſed memory Sultan Achmat Chan, who in life was happy, and in death laudable; and departing out of this momentary World to be neerer the mercifull Creator, being changed into perfect glory, and eternall bliſſe, K hath his habitation on high, and his reſt in Paradiſe. This paternall Empire and Monarchicall kingdome hath almoſt vntill this preſent bleſſed time, beene alwaies hereditary, from grandfather to father, from father to ſon, and ſo curſiuely on that manner; but hauing regard vnto the age and yeares of our great and noble Vncle Sultan Muſtapha, he was preferred and honoured to ſit on the Othoman Throne, and being ſettled for ſome time, tooke care for the affaires of the Empire, and for all that might concerne the people both in generall and particular. But hauing beene many yeares retired in ſolitarineſſe, and giuen to deuotion and Diuine obedience, being alſo as it were wearied with the cares of the Empire, of his owne accord withdrew himſelfe from the Gouernment; for that the Diademe and Scepter of the Empire of the ſeuen Climats, was the true right and inheritance of our moſt excellent Majeſty, of the which with the meeting and conſent of all the Viſiers, and other Deputies of State, of the Primat of the Muſſulman L Law, and of the other honourable Doctors, of the ſouldiers, and of all the ſubjects both publike and priuat, the Almighty God hath made an high Preſent and worthy gift vnto vs. And in the happy day in the beginning of the Moone Rebea-il euel of this preſent yeare 1027, in an expected time, and in an acceptable houre, was our bleſſed and happy ſitting eſtabliſhed vpon the moſt fortunate Othoman Throne, the ſeat and wiſedome of Solomon. *In the pulpets of all the Moſques the congregations of the faithfull, and deuotion of the Muſſulmen, throughout all our dominions is read to our Imperiall name the * Hutbeh. And in the mints (where innumerable ſummes of mony are coyned, as well vpon the ſiluer as the gold) our happy name and ſtampe is ſigned. And our moſt powerfull commandements are obeyed in all the parts and dominions of the World. And the brightneſſe of the light of the Sun of Iuſtice and equity, hath cauſed the darkeneſſe of injuries and moleſtations to vaniſh away.* M

Now ſeeing it hath beene an antient cuſtome of our famous Predeceſſors to giue notice of the ſame vnto ſuch Princes as are in ſincere friendſhip, and do continue it with the Houſe of great Majeſty and our Imperiall Court : We alſo haue written theſe our princely Letters, and appointed for their Bearer the choice among his equals Huſſeine Chiaus (whoſe power is great) one of the honoured and reſpected ſeruants

A ſeruants of our magnificent Port, the refuge of the World, to the end that ſuch newes might cauſe great joy of our moſt honourable aſſumption. And we doe hope that when they ſhall come to your hands (in conformity of the well grounded friendſhip vpon the ſure league, articles, and writings which hath been eſtabliſhed of old with our moſt royall Race, and permanent Empire) you will manifeſt infinite joy and gladneſſe, and certifie as much to the Rulers and Gouernours of the Dominions and Countries vnder you, that they may know the articles of the peace and league, and the points of the oath which are firme and to be deſired on both parts, from the time of our grandfather and predeceſſour of royall ſtocke now in paradiſe (whoſe ſoule God enlighten) vndoubtedly during the time of our reigne ſhall be obſebued with all re-ſpect. And let there not be the leaſt imagination of any want of due obſeruance of the ſignes of friendſhip on our part, or by any manner of meanes on your part, for the violating the foundation of the peace B and league.

The Copy of a Letter written by Hallil Baſſa, chieſe Viſier, and Generall in the expedition againſt the Perſian, at his returne from the wars, to the City of Senit in Aprill 1618, vnto Sir Paul Pinder Knight, then Embaſſador for the Kings Majeſty at Conſtantinople.

The humble Viſier Halil Baſſa.

T*O the courteous Lord of the Nation of the* Meſſiah, both great and honourable among the people of C Ieſus, and the true determiner of the Chriſtian affaires; our good friend Paul Pinder, the Eng- liſh Embaſſador, whoſe later daies be with all felicity. To whoſe noble preſence (after our many kind ſalutations tending to all good affection and manifeſtation of joy, worthy and beſeeming our friendſhip) our louing aduice is this, That if you deſire to heare of our eſtate and being, you ſhall vnderſtand, that after we departed from the happy port with the army, for the wars of Aſia, we arriued and wintered in Meſo-potamia, and remouing thence in the Spring with all the Muſſulman hoſte (alwaies victorious) we went to Van, from which place vntill we came to Tauris, the Muſſulman army went on alwaies ſacking and de-ſtroying all thoſe places and townes of the Perſians which we met withall by the way in thoſe parts, where were burnt, pillaged, and ruined, ſome thouſands of villages, and tormenting all thoſe people that came to hand. And when we were come neere to Tauris, the Generall of the Perſian forces (of peruerſe religion) D called Carelgai Han (the accurſed) retired himſelfe into the ſaid Tauris, where beating vp his drums in euery quarter, he made a ſhew that he had a will to fight: ſo we ſent a little before vs ſome Tartars and others of our army to hearken out and take notice of the enemy; who meeting with ſeuen or eight hundred Perſians of note, put them to the ſword, very few eſcaping, and that with very great difficulty and hazard. By which the ſaid Generall finding himſelfe vnable to reſiſt the power and fury of the Muſſulman hoſt, or to ſtay any longer in the ſaid place, the very ſame day that we arriued there, the ſaid Generall hauing ſpoiled all the city, fled away; ſo we tooke the place, ranſacked it, and burned all the buildings, towers, gardens, and whatſoeuer elſe we found within it: And thus the great city Tauris by Diuine fauour and grace became ours. Then forthwith we ſent after the enemy, the Tartar with ſome Beglerbegs, who ouer-taking them gaue them battell; and albeit ſome of ours did fall, yet they which fell on the enemies ſide E were innumerable. And ſo going forwards towards Erdeuil (their obſcure reſidence) about ten days journy in the country, we went burning and ſpoyling it, and killing all the Perſians that we met; that indeed there was ſo much glory and honour won, as that all the antient men of the country do affirme, there was neuer ſeene the like; inſomuch, that from the confines vnto Erdeuill, twenty daies journey of the country was on that manner by vs deſtroied. Thus afterward the King cauſed to empty the ſaid place of Erdeuill, and fled into a place called Hulchal, and cauſed his army to go to the top of a high mountaine, from whence hauing ſent three or foure times men of quality vnto vs, ſeeking and entreating for peace, with promiſe to giue yearely vnto our Emperor a hundred Somes of ſilke, and all ſuch places as are vpon the confines gotten in the time of Sultan Solyman, except Der Ne and Der Tink; wherewith we weare contented with the peace, and his Embaſſador is vpon the way comming toward vs. And ſo we returning the ſame F way againe (alwaies ſpoiling) we came to Erzirum. And thus our preſent Letter is written vnto you for the reſpect and preſeruation of our friendſhip: and euen as our amity hath euer beene hitherto ſincere and firme, ſo likewiſe by the Grace of God at our arriuall in the happy Port, it ſhall be in like manner maintained and continued, that more cannot poſſible be. And ſo God keepe you in health.

1619. The wars growing hot in Bohemia againſt the Proteſtants,and the Emperour raiſing what G forces he could to ſuppreſſe them,the directors or Gouernors of the country wrote their letters to Bethlem Gabor prince of Tranſyluania,to acquaint him with the eſtate of their affaires. To whom he made anſwer, That his country ſtanding euen in the very jawes of the Turks, whoſe councels were neuer quiet,but euer working like to the waues of the vaſt ocean,and alwaies watchfull to embrace all occaſions vpon any diſcord of the Chriſtians, eſpecially now when they had pacified all quarrels with the Perſian,and had no rebels in Aſia, againſt whom they might employ their forces; he had propounded to himſelf to attend the conſent and fauor of the Othoman Emperour, whereby he might take from him all occaſion to make any irruption into the neighbour countries,and haue the better means to imploy his beſt means to reconcile the diſcords among the Chriſtians; wherefore hauing ſent to Conſtantinople to H acquaint the Grand Seignior with his intent,and to craue his fauour,he receiued letters from thence the 17 of Auguſt,whereby he was aſſured of the Grand Segniors conſent and fauour. Wherupon he reſolued (notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the houſe of Auſtria,the Pope of Rome,and others of that faction)to take arms in defence of the Bohemians; promiſing to be in September following vpon the confines of Morauia vnleſſe he found ſome ſtay in Hungary.Being aduertiſed of the ſtate of Bohemia and Morauia, he leuied an army at Clauſenburg, and entered into the vpper Hungary,whereas moſt of the Barons ſubmitted themſelues vnto him; only Humanoie a great man in that country oppoſed himſelfe; but not able to make his party good,he fled into Polonia. After which he ſent his army(being 18000 ſtrong)and took Filek,Ternan,Vacci,Nouigrade,and others; after which he ſeiſed vpon Neuheuſall,the Go- I uernour being deliuered bound vnto him. The Palatine of Hungary wrote letter to Redei Generall of the Prince of Tranſyluania's army, wiſhing him to conſider what the forces of the Kings of Spaine and France were,with the houſe of Auſtria and their allies,and that the Electors of the Empire(ſome excepted)would ſend aid vnto the Emperor. Who anſwered,that he doubted not of the power of thoſe Kings, and that the Electors would ſend ſupplies vnto the Emperour; yet hoped that before they came, all ſhould be ended, and their dinners ſhould be prouided.

Bethlem Gabor taketh many townes in Hungary.

Soone after, the Prince of Tranſyluania came to Presburg with his vrmy, a towne of note in Hungary, whereas their Kings are vſually crowned. The newes thereof comming to Vienna,they ſent 3000 ſouldiers with three pieces of ordnance downe the riuer of Danow, who K entred the ſuburbs on the 13 of October, the night was very ſtormy and rainy, and the Tranſyluanians taking this opportunity charged them,and ſlew the greateſt part, their Commander flying away with ſome few. The ſuburbs being taken, Bethlem Gabor ſent to the Palatine, to know whether he would yeeld the town and caſtle without force,giuing him ſome time to reſolue;who after conſultation with ſome noblemen,they reſolued to yeeld, and ſo the towne was deliuered into his hands. After which he ſent part of his army vnder good Commanders into Auſtria,to the gates of Vienna,where they committed great ſpoile, the particular relation whereof I leaue to the Hiſtory of the Emperours liues,to which it doth properly belong.

In Nouember Bethlem Gabor Prince of Tranſyluania,and the Eſtates of Hungary,ſent Embaſſadors to Prague, where they propounded diuers articles vnto the Counſell, and amongſt L others,That they ſhould joyntly ſend Embaſſadors to the Grand Seignior, & that the prince of Tranſyluania ſhould negotiate the buſineſſe. And for that the kingdome of Hungary was much exhauſted, whatſoeuer ſhould be taken in Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola, ſhould be vnited vnto it, to the end it might be the better able to reſiſt the Turke: all which tended to the prejudice and ruine of the houſe of Auſtria. The Prince of Tranſyluania hauing taken diuers townes in Hungary,belonging to the Emperor as King of Hungary, and entred Auſtria in hoſtile manner in fauor of the Bohemians; knowing that hee had thereby much inſenced the Emperor,and the whole houſe of Auſtria,and that if he ſhould preuaile ouer the Bohemians, the whole burthen of the war would lie vpon him, he therefore in the end of this yeare ſent an Embaſſador with preſents to Conſtantinople,to craue aſſurance of the Grand Seigni- M ors aid and ſupport(vpon whoſe fauour he had alwaies depended) in caſe the Emperor ſhould inuade Tranſyluania: where being countenanced by many of the chiefe Baſſaes, he had aſſurance of Sultan Oſmans ſupport and protection, the which he confirmed by a ſolemne oath vnder his hand, as followeth.

The Great Turks oath to Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Tranſyluania.

Sultan Oſman,

By the grace of God vnconquerable Turkiſh Emperour, ſweares by the Higheſt, Almightieſt, and Almighty Gods Holineſſe, by his Kingdome, by the ſubſtance of the Heauens, the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, by the earth, and by all vnder the earth, by the braines and all the hairy ſcalpe of my mother, by my head, and all the ſtrength of my ſoule and body, by the holy Great Mahomet, and by my Circumciſion, That I thee my brother and ſon Bethlem Gabor, ſucceeding King of Hungary, in no manner B of way, in thy great and weighty affaires will leaue, though it be to the ouerthrow of my Kingdome, to be brought to nothing, vntill there ſhall be no more left but my ſelfe, or foure or fiue Turks at the moſt, yet will I be ſtill obliged to defend thee, and all thoſe that do any waies appertaine vnto thee. And if thou ſhalt haue need of me, I will be alwaies ready to goe with thee. And in caſe this my promiſe ſhall in any wiſe be fruſtrated, then let Gods juſtice fall vpon my head and deſtroy me and my poſterity, and wipe away whatſoeuer belongeth vnto me, and gather it together into a rocke of ſtone, or ſubſtance of earth, and that the earth may cleaue aſunder and ſwallow me vp body and ſoule.

Dated at Conſtantinople the fifth of Ianuary, 1619.

Bethlem Gabor being aſſured by this oath, of protection made by the Grand Seigniour, in the beginning of the yeare 1620, he called an aſſembly of the Eſtates of Hungary at Preſburg, whither Embaſſadours were ſent from the King of Bohemia, and the States of that countrey, with the incorporate Prouinces, where a perpetuall league was concluded betwixt them, and afterwards concluded at Prague; where among other articles, it was concluded, that foraſmuch as neceſſity did chiefely require, that a peace ſhould be concluded and inuiolably kept with the Turke, therefore a new Embaſſie ſhould be ſent to the Grand Seigniour from all the confederate Kingdomes and Prouinces; and that Bethlem Gabor ſhould take D vpon him the chiefe care of that buſineſſe; but yet in ſuch ſort, as the Bohemians and incorporated Prouinces ſhould ſend their Embaſſadours with the Hungarians, and beare their ſhares of all that ſhould be disburſed, as well for the Preſents, as for the Embaſſadours charges.

1620.

A League betweene the Bohemians, Tranſilvanians and Hungarians.

In Iune following, Bethlem Gabor went to an aſſembly of the Eſtates of Hungary at Neuheuſall, where he propounded diuers heads vnto the States: That he deſired nothing more than to reſtore the Kingdome of Hungary, ſo miſerably afflicted, to liberty; and that they might enjoy their religion and priuiledges: That hee had ſpared no coſt for the lawfull defence of the country; and for a teſtimony that he deſired peace, he had refuſed the Crowne which the Eſtates offered him at Presburg: that the ground of peace was to maintaine the E league which they had begun with the Bohemians: that hee had alwaies deſired peace with the helpe of other Princes, ſo as it were ſincere and without fraud or deceit, for the obtaining whereof hee had aſſiſted his confederats miſerably afflicted: That he knew for certaine the Emperour deſired not peace but war, hauing ſuffered the Coſſackes to enter into Hungary, and to ſpoyle many places with fire and ſword, and denied paſſage for the Embaſſadours of Bohemia and Auſtria; for this cauſe they were not now to treat of peace but of warre, and to conſult how it might be begun and maintained: for the leuying of money which is the ſinewes of war: for the furniſhing of their forts vpon the frontiers, and for the ſpeedy ſending of Embaſſadors to the Turkiſh Emperor, leſt being ingaged in an inteſtine war, there might be ſome attempts made vpon theſe bordering forts. Hauing deliuered his minde vnto the F Eſtates, there came diuers Embaſſadours thither from Bohemia, Auſtria, Sileſia, and Luſatia, Venice, Poland, and Turky: The Venetian Embaſſadour was content their Commonwealth ſhould enter into the league, and the Turke made offer to conclude a perpetuall league with them.

On

Bethlem Gabor proclaimed K. of Hungary.

On the fiue and twentieth day of Auguſt Bethlem Gabor Prince of Tranſyluania was proclaimed King of Hungary by the Palatine, at the inſtance of the Turkiſh Embaſſadour, and G with the conſent and applauſe of moſt part of the Eſtates of the country: after which he leuied a great army of thirty (ſome ſay fifty) thouſand horſe and foot, and made many Enſignes with diuers Emblemes and deuices; which being knowne, the Proteſtants of Vienna, with the conſent of the Emperour, wrote vnto him, humbly entreating him to ſpare the city and country, for their innocent wiues and childrens ſake: but in the meane time all the citiſens were commanded to make prouiſion of victuals for ſix moneths.

A viſion ſeene at Medina Talnabi.

There came newes to Conſtantinople of a ſtrange apparition or viſion, which was ſeene at Medina Talnabi in Arabia, whereas Mahomet their great Prophet was buried: to viſit whoſe tombe the Turks vſe to goe in pilgrimage, but they muſt firſt goe to Mecha, which is ſome few daies iourney off, and there they take a ticket from the Grand Seigniours Beglerbeg, H elſe they are not allowed to goe to Medina. This viſion continued three weekes together, which terrified the whole country, for that no man could diſcouer the truth thereof.
About the twentieth of September, there fell ſo great a tempeſt, and ſo fearefull a thunder about midnight, as the heauens were darkened, and thoſe that were awake, almoſt diſtracted; but the vapours being diſperſed, and the element cleare, the people might reade in Arabian Characters theſe words in the firmament, O why will yee beleeue in lies! Between two and three in the morning, there was ſeene a woman in white compaſſed about with the Sunne, hauing a cheerefull countenance, and holding in her hand a Booke: comming from the Northweſt, oppoſite againſt her were armies of Turkes, Perſians, Arabians, and other Mahometans, I ranged in order of battell, and ready to charge her; but ſhe kept her ſtanding, and only opened the Booke, at the ſight whereof theſe armies fled: and preſently all the lamps about Mahomets tombe went out; for as ſoone as euer the viſion vaniſhed (which was commonly an houre before ſunne riſing) a murmuring winde was heard, whereunto they imputed the extinguiſhing of the lampes. The antient pilgrims of Mah[illegible]ets race, who after they haue viſited this place neuer vſe to cut their haire, were much amaſed, for that they could not conceiue the meaning of this viſion: onely one of the Deruices (which is a ſtrict religious order amongſt the Turks, like vnto the Capuchins amongſt the Papiſts, and liue in contemplation) ſtepped vp very boldly, and made a ſpeech vnto the company, which inſenced them much againſt him, ſo as this poore prieſt for his plaine dealing loſt his life, as you ſhall K heare.

A Deruice ſpeech vnto the Turkes.

„ The ſumme of his ſpeech was this: That the World had neuer but three true Religions, „ euery one of which had a Prophet; firſt God choſe the Iewes, and did wonders for them in „ Ægypt, and brought them forth by their Prophet Moſes, who preſcribed them a Law, wherein „ he would haue maintained them, if they had not beene obſtinate and rebellious, and fallen „ to Idolatry: whereupon hee gaue them ouer, and ſcattered them vpon the face of the „ earth. Then preſently after hee raiſed a new Prophet, who taught the Chriſtian Religion.
„ This good man the Iewes condemned and crucified for a ſeducer of the people, not moued „ with the piety of his life, his great miracles, nor his doctrine. Yet after his death, the preaching „ of a few fiſhermen did ſo moue the hearts of men, as the greateſt Monarchs of the world L „ bowed to his very title, and yeelded to the command of his Miniſters. But it ſeemes they „ grew as corrupt as the Iewes, their Church being diſmembred with the diſtinction of the Eaſt „ and Weſt, committing Idolatry againe by ſetting vp of Images, with many other idle ceremonies, „ beſides the corruption of their liues, ſo as God was weary of them too, and not onely „ ſent diuiſions among them, but forſooke them, diſpoſſeſſing them of their chiefeſt Cities Ieruſalem „ and Conſtantinople: yet God is ſtill the Gouernor of the World, and prouides himſelfe „ of another Prophet and people, raiſing our Great Mahomet, and giuing why to our nation, „ ſo as no doubt we ſhall be happy for euer, if we can ſerue this God aright, and take example „ by the fall of others. But ahlas! I tremble to ſpeake it, we haue erred in euery point, „ and wilfully broken our firſt inſtitutions, ſo as God hath manifeſted his wrath by euident M „ ſignes and tokens, keeping our Prophet from vs, who prefixed a time to returne with all „ happineſſe to his people, ſo as there are now forty yeares paſt by our account: Wherefore „ this ſtrange and fearefull viſion is a prediction of ſome great troubles and alterations.

A For either the opening of this booke in the womans hand, doth foretell our falling away from the firſt intent of our law, whereat theſe armed men departed as confounded with the guilt of their owne conſciences; or elſe it ſignifies ſome other booke wherein we haue not yet read, and againſt which no power ſhall preuaile: ſo as I feare our religion will be proued corrupt, and our Prophet an Impoſter, and then this Chriſt whom they talke of ſhall ſhine like the ſun, and ſet vp his name euerlaſtingly. Hitherto the company were ſilent; but hearing him ſpeak ſo boldly, they charged him with blaſphemy; and knowing their law, which makes all blaſphemy capitall, they preſently condemned him, and hauing the Beglerbegs conſent and warrant, they put him to death.

As their rage againſt him was violent, ſo their execution was extraordinary, for they nei- B ther cut off his head nor ſtrangled him, as they vſually doe to malefactors, but they tortured him by degrees: for ſtripping him firſt naked, they gaue him a hundred blowes on the ſoles of his feet with a flat cudgell, vntill the bloud iſſued forth, the poore prieſt crying continually on the woman that opened the booke. After which they tooke a bulls pizzle, and beat all his body vntil the ſinues crackt, and in the end they laid him vpon a wheele, and with an Indian ſword made of ſinews, they brake his bones to pieces, the poor man crying to the laſt gaſpe, O thou woman with the booke, ſaue me, and ſo he died: At which time there was a fearefull tempeſt. The Beglerbeg ſent certain Spahies to the port of Sidon to imbarke for Conſtantinople, to the end they might aduertiſe the Emperor of theſe tidings.

The Deruiſe put to death for his ſpeech.

Sultan Oſman from the firſt enterance into his reigne was freed from all cares of forraine C war, or inteſtine combuſtions; for hee had that happineſſe (being himſelfe young, and not able to gouerne ſo potent an eſtate) as by the counſell and aſſiſtance of Halil Baſſa his grand Viſier, he had forced the King of Perſia to demand a peace, and to pay the tribute which had been formerly promiſed. His rebels in Aſia were all pacified, and the truce with the Emperour (which had been ſomewhat interrupted by miſinterpretation, or the practiſe of bad miniſters) was newly confirmed a little before his comming to the crowne, onely Moldauia had beene the theatre of war for ſome yeares, where his father had exerciſed his armes, and imployed his forces, to aduance whom he pleaſed to be Vayuod of that countrey, againſt another party that was ſupported by the Polonians, as you haue formerly heard. Michna Prince of Valachia, being made Vayuod of Moldauia by Achmat, and the Polonian party wholly D ouerthrowne in the yeare 1616, hee enjoyed it not long: but whether hee died of a naturall death, or fell into diſgrace with the Grand Seignior, I do not reade: yet I finde that after him there was another Vayuod or Prince of Moldauia, who is yet liuing, but in diſgrace with the Sultan, his name is Gaſparo Gratſiani: and to the end you may vnderſtand, that the Turks neuer reſpect the birth and quality of any man in their aduancements, I will relate what this man was, from the mouth of him that knew him very well.

This Gaſparo was borne at Gretz (a towne of great ſtrength belonging vnto the Archdukes of Auſtria, by the which a branch of that houſe is diſtinguiſhed from the reſt, and whereof the Emperour now reigning is the head) but being a man of ſmall fortune, and little expectance in his owne country, he went to Conſtantinople, and put himſelfe in ſeruice with Sir E Thomas Glouer, before that he was Embaſſadour for his Majeſty to the Grand Seignior, vnder whom he learned both to write and reade the Turkiſh tongue. After which he came with him into England, and there by his recommendation was employed to Conſtantinople for the redeeming of young Sir Thomas Sherley, who was then a priſoner among the Turks. Hauing performed his charge orderly, and being come to Venice with the young Knight, hearing that Sir Thomas Glouer was ſent Embaſſadour to the Grand Seignior, he left Sir Thomas Sherley, and went to Conſtantinople to his old maſter, where he was emploied yearely to buy or exchange Chriſtians for Turks, carrying the Chriſtians into Italy, and ſo returning Turks for them. About the end of Achmats reigne arriuing at Conſtantinople with a ſhip full of Turks, which he had exchanged, he acquainted the Viſier Baſſa with the good ſeruice he had F done vnto the Grand Seigniour; who demanding of what countrey hee was, and his breeding, asked him if he would vndertake a ſeruice which ſhould be for his aduancement, which was to go vnto the Emperour to reconcile all difficulties concerning the peace, wherein he carried himſelfe ſo diſcreetly, as Commiſſioners were appointed, who concluded all difficulties, as you haue heard. But before his returne home, the Grand Seigniour was dead; yet he preſſed the Baſſa for the performance of his promiſe, deſiring him, that he might be made Vayuod of Moldauia, which the Baſſa effected: but the preſents he gaue aduanced him more than his merits. Since hee grew into ſome diſgrace; ſo as the Grand Seigniour making choice of another Vayuod, gaue charge to certaine Capigies, to go into Moldauia to ſtrangle Gaſparo, and that they ſhould take foure hundred Turks vpon the frontiers to aſſiſt them. But Gaſparo hauing good ſpies at Conſtantinople, who aduertiſed him of their deſigne, reſolued to preuent them; wherefore taking ſome troups with him, he met them vpon the way, and cut them all in pieces; then returning to Yas, hee ſlew a thouſand Turks. After which he fled into Poland with two thouſand horſe; from whence they write that he hath made diuers incurſions into Moldauia, and committed great ſpoiles vpon the Turks, being aſſiſted by the Coſſackes, and keepes poſſeſſion of the country, although there be another Vayuod made by the Turke.

Gaſparo made Vayuod of Moldauia.

The Turks preparation to armes.

Sultan Oſman ſeemes to be much inſenced againſt the Polonians, as well for this ſupport, as for former quarrels, making it his colour for the leuying of the greateſt army that hath beene ſeene ſince that Solyman went vnto the ſiege of Agria, conſiſting, as it is ſaid, of three hundred thouſand men, hauing drawne downe all his forces out of Aſia. God knowes where he will imploy it, but it is much to be feared that he will make vſe of this diuiſion betwixt Chriſtian Princes, who ſhould vnite their wills and forces, to oppoſe them againſt the common enemy of Chriſtendome, who watcheth only to get an aduantage, little regarding his word and promiſe.

The Turke hauing no imployment for his forces by land, ſent threeſcore gallies by Sea, to make ſome enterpriſe vpon the Chriſtians. They came into the Mediterranean Sea, and hauing coaſted the Iſland of Sicilie, they ſent twenty gallies to land in the Kingdome of Naples, where they ſurpriſed the Towne of Manfredonia, and ſpoiled it, carrying away fourteene or fifteene hundred captiues, and ſo retyred againe to Sea. The reſt of their fleet lay about Vellona in the gulfe, which made the Spaniards jealous that the Venetian had beene acquainted with this enterpriſe. And ſince there is newes, that the Gallions and Galliots of Algiers, haue taken Iuiſa, a ſmall Iſland of foure miles compaſſe, neere vnto Majorca: It is a place of great importance, for that it hath a hauen able to containe much ſhipping; for the guard whereof the King of Spaine entertaines a great garriſon, and it did much annoy them of Algiers. They tooke the towne; but it is not yet certaine whether they haue taken the caſtle.

The greatneſſe of the Turks Empire.

This is all I could learne of the Turks affaires ſince the yeare 1609 vntill this preſent. The Reader may obſerue, that ſince the reigne of Ottoman their firſt Emperor, this great Empire of the Turks is proudly built vpon the foure Monarchies of the World; that is to ſay, of the Aſſirian, Perſian, Greeke, and Romane. For they enjoy Babylon, and all Chaldæa, with the country of the Medes: We haue ſeene them in Tauris the capitall city of Perſia, Greece is ſubject to the yoke of their command; Conſtantinople, ſometimes called New Rome, by the tranſport of the Imperial ſeat, is now made their Throne, and ſo many prouinces and realmes which in former times depended vpon the Romane Empire, do now acknowledge their power: they are Maſters of the Realmes of Ægypt and Cyprus; the Iſlands of Rhodes, Mitylene, Negrepont, Chio, and many others acknowledge them, the Empire of Trebiſond is theirs; the Realme of Colchos, now called Mingrelia, payes them tribute: they of Tunes and Algiers in Affrica obey them; Dalmatia, the Illyrians, Triballiens, the countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia do them homage, and we ſee them command euen in the chiefe townes of the Realmes of Hungary: But all this power of the Ottomans had neuer bene ſo great nor ſo fearefull, but by the diſcord, diuiſion, and bad intelligence betwixt Chriſtian Princes, as you may reade in the courſe of this Hiſtory, as well in Greece, at Conſtantinople as in other parts of Europe, whereas theſe Princes contending one with another, haue furniſhed matter and meanes to the Turke to diſpoſſeſſe them of the chiefe peeces of their Monarchies. They meaſure the continuance of their Empire by the diſcord

A diſcord betwixt the Princes of the beleefe of the name of Ieſus,and they confeſſe truely, that this diuiſion is the onely cauſe of their greatneſſe, the which hath made them beleeue, that among Chriſtians there was a bad Angell enemy to peace, which they call, The ſtrong or pow-erfull Spirit, which kindling the fire of reuenge and ambition in the hearts of great men, drawes from their affections the good of their beleefe, to entertaine them in perpetuall diſ-cord; during the which, they promiſe vnto themſelues a firme and an aſſured reigne. So the Mufti,and the Taliſmans praying on Friday in their Moſques, demand of their Prophet the circumſtance of this bad intelligence betwixt Chriſtian Princes, to the end they may enjoy the Empire which they haue vnjuſtly vſurped. Yet their prophecies doe not promiſe them a perpetuall poſſeſſion; behold one in their owne tongue, which hath alwaies made them feare B the vnion of Chriſtians:

A Turkiſh Propheſie.

Patiſſahomomos ghelur, caiſerun menleker alur kenzul almai alur kapze iler ie di yla-degh Giaur Keleci cſikmaſſe on ikigladegh on laron Begbhgheder. Enſi japar, baghi diker bathe ſai baglar, ogli keſi olar; onichi ylddenſora Hriſtianon-keleci cſcchar, al Turkei ghereſſine Tuſchure.

That is to ſay;

C Our Emperour ſhall come, he ſhall poſſeſſe the Realme of an Infidell Prince, he ſhall take the red apple, and make it ſubject to his power: if at the ſeuenth yeare of his command the Chriſtians ſword doth not aduance, he ſhall rule vnto the twelfth yeare, he ſhall build houſes, plant vines, compaſſe in gardens with hedges, and beget children: but after the twelfth yeare that he hath held the red apple, the Chriſtians ſword ſhall appeare and put the Turks to flight.

The expoſition of their Propheſie.

By the Infidell Prince they vnderſtand a Chriſtian Prince(for ſo they call them)and by the Red Apple an Imperiall towne ſtrong and important; in the which, and elſewhere the Turks ſhall build houſes: that is to ſay,conuert holy temples to the vſe of the Mahometan impiety: D for by this word to build, they that haue commented vpon this propheſie, vnderſtand vſurpa-tion of the houſes of God: Plant vines, by theſe words they ſignifie the extent of the Turkiſh Empire,and the ſetling of their colonies, as we ſee in Hungary and Tranſyluania: Compaſsing in Gardens, that is to ſay, they ſhall fortifie the townes which they haue taken from their enemies: Beget Children, extend the Mahometan religion far in the Chriſtians countries. But after the twelfth yeare, &c. within a certaine time beſt knowne to God, his diuine Majeſty, opening the eies of his clemency vpon the Chriſtians,will vnite the wills of their Princes, kindle their affections with a holy zeale, and bleſſing their armes, will make them victorious ouer the Turke,whom he will baniſh out of the Eaſt, and chaſe into Scythia, from whence they came to be a ſcourge vnto Chriſtendome. Theſe are my wiſhes, wherein I hope all good E Chriſtians do concurre.

The beginning of the Turkiſh Empire.

Hauing runne ouer the occurrents which haue happened in the Turks eſtate for the ſpace of eleuen yeares, I muſt according to Maſter Knolles his method, conclude the worke with a deſcription of the Grand Seigniours Port or Court, of his Gouernment, Officers, Riches, Force, and Religion. The Turks (a people of Scythia) hauing like a violent deluge ouer-throwne a great part of the Eaſt,and taken diuers Prouinces, being expelled from Ieruſalem by Godfrey of Bouillon,and the Chriſtians, their remainder retired to Nicea where they liued without any head or ſoueraigne commander, vntill that Ottoman about the yeare of our Redeemer 1300, by practiſe made himſelfe ſole and abſolute Monarch. His ſonne conquering diuers Prouinces, remoued his Imperiall ſeat to Pruſia, now called Burſia, the chiefe F abode of the Kings of Bythinia. Amurath the firſt(being drawne in by the Emperour of Conſtantinople to ſuccour him,and allured with the wealth of Europe) turned his armes againſt him, taking diuers prouinces and townes from him, amongſt others Adrianopolis, which he made the ſeat and reſidence of the Turkiſh Emperours, in the yeare 1363. But Mahomet the ſecond hauing taken the city of Conſtantinople, and expelled the Emperour in the yeare 1453, he made it the royall ſeat of the Othomans, for which he had great reaſon, being one of the faireſt and ſweeteſt ſeats of the World.

Deſcription of Conſtantinople.

Conſtantinople hath in circuit by the opinion of ſome Writers fifteene or ſixteene miles, and is called by the Turks themſelues Stambull or Stambolda, the ſea beating vpon it vpon the North and South ſides: Towards the Eaſt it is diuided from Aſia by a large chanell, which runneth from the one ſea to the other, and is about ſeuen miles in length, The City is built vpon the declining of a hill, in which there are many rare ſingularities which I omit being deſcribed elſewhere. There are in this City ſeuen little hils, vpon the which are built ſeuen principall Moſques or Churches, by ſeuerall Emperours, where of the faireſt and moſt ſtately is that of Sultan Solyman. Vpon the North ſide of the City ſtandeth the Grand Seigniours Palace or Seraglio, commonly called by the name of the Port: The which hath on the one ſide thereof the Sea, and of the other ſide of it the hauen, the other two being towards the City, being about three miles in compaſſe, ſome write of foure. It is walled about, and within it are many gardens, orchards, medowes, and woods. Being entred into the firſt Port (which hath double gates of yron) into a large Court, on the left hand there ſtands a building like vnto a Turkiſh Moſque, which now the Grand Seigniour vſeth for a ſtore-houſe, wherein are great ſtore of armes which are for the defence of his Seraglio. And on the other ſide of this Court are ſeuerall gardens walled in, from which they paſſe to another Court with a gate like vnto the former, where are targuets and ſcimitars hanging, and many Porters attending, as at the former. After this, they paſſe into another large Court which is planted with Cypreſſe trees, and full of graſſe, where deere feed; but round about it is a cloiſter which is in length about ſix hundred and foureſcore foot, and aboue fiue hundred in bredth, paued with ſtone, and couered with lead, it being ſupported with one hundred and forty pillars of white and gray marble, ſtanding vpon baſſes of copper, with capitals of the ſame; vpon the North ſide whereof ſtands the Diuano, whereas the Viſier Baſſa and the other Baſſaes ſit in Councell, and heare cauſes of importance, whereof we will ſpeake hereafter. In this Seraglio the Grand Seigniour hath many chambers which are richly appointed, wherein hee remaines, and there he hath ſix young men which attend his perſon, and the ſeruice of his chamber, whereof two wait dayly, and at night they watch when hee ſleepes, the one of them at his head, and the other at his feet, with two torches burning in their hands. In the morning (as Sanzouino Writes) when the Grand Seigniour attires himſelfe, they put into one of his pockets a thouſand aſpers, and into the other pocket twenty duckats of gold, the which if he giue not away that day, is their fee at night, neither (as they ſay) doth hee euer put on the ſame cloathes: and whenſoeuer hee goes to hunting, or to any other exerciſe (beſides the money which hee hath with him) his Caſnadar Baſſa or chiefe Treaſurour ſtill followes him with great ſtore of money to giue away. The office of theſe ſix young men (who are changed as it pleaſeth the Grand Seigniour) is diſtinct, for the one carries his ſhooes, the ſecond his bow and arrowes, the third his veſt, the fourth a veſſell with water, the fifth carries a ſeat, and the ſixth called Oda Baſſa is head of the chamber.

Attendants vpon the Grand Seigniour.

The chiefe officers of his houſe

He hath dayly a great number of perſons reſident in his palace, imployed in their ſeuerall charges, ſome in one place, ſome in another, vnder their ſeuerall commanders. But among all the great men in the Court theſe are of chiefeſt eminency and note.

Firſt the Capi Aga, that is to ſay, the mouth of the Grand Seigniour, by whom the Sultan ſpeaketh to ſuch as haue any great ſuit vnto him: for no Embaſſadour is admitted vnto him, but at his firſt arriuall when he deliuers his letters of credit and his preſents, and when he hath any buſineſſe to treat of, he repaires to the Viſier Baſſa or his Aga.

The ſecond is Caſnadar Baſſa, the chiefe Treaſurour of the houſhold, or ſuperintendent of the Treaſuror.

The third Chilergi Baſſa, chiefe cupbearer.

The fourth is Seraglio Agaſi, ſteward or maſter of the houſhold.

The fifth is Chiller Agaſi, or Saraidar Baſſa, Ouerſeer of his Seraglio of concubines, who is alwaies an Eunuch as the reſt be.

A The ſixth and laſt is Boſtangi Baſſa, chiefe Gardener, and ouerſeer of all his gardens, Captaine of his Iamoglans, and ſteerer of his Barge whenſoeuer he goeth by water. He hath a Protogero or Lieutenant, and many gardeners vnder him, which are called Boſtangi, who when they come out of the Seraglio, become Ianizaries, Solacci, or Capigi, according to their qualities.

Theſe ſix Officers of the Sultans houſe aboue mentioned haue no authority out of his palace, yet the greateſt Baſſaes ſtand in awe of them, and feare them, for that they haue free acceſſe vnto the Sultan, and haue dayly opportunity to inſence him againſt them: for by their ſecret ſuggeſtions and falſe informations, many of the greateſt Baſſaes are many times ſuddenly and vndeſeruedly cut off in the height of all their pompe and glory.

The Sultans dumbe men.

B Hee hath many mutes or dumbe men attending about him, whereof eight be his dayly companions and play-fellowes in the Seraglio, in whoſe company hee takes great delight: beſides many others to the number of forty, which attend vpon him as pages. They are all borne deafe and dumbe, yet by long practiſe they grow ſo perfect, as they will vnderſtand any thing that ſhall be acted vnto them by ſignes and geſtures; and will themſelues by the geſture of their eyes, bodies, hands, and feet, deliuer matters of great difficulty, to the great admiration of ſtrangers.

A Seraglio of young men.

The Grand Seigniour hath within his palace a Seraglio of young men to the number of fiue hundred, from eight yeares of age to twenty: theſe are the well-fauouredſt and beſt proportioned of all the tribute children which hee draweth from Græcia and Natolia, and they C are choſen out of his Seraglio's at Pera, Adrianopolis, and other places, and brought to this to be bred vp, where they are inſtructed in diuers Arts, according to their diſpoſition, but eſpecially to reade and write, and in the doctrine of their Law, and to ride, there being a great number of horſes kept within this Seraglio for their exerciſes, and for the Eunuches. They neuer goe out of the Seraglio till the Sultan thinkes them to be of fit age to vndergoe ſome charge, and then he makes them Spacoglani, or Silichtary, and to ſome he giues greater places, according to their valour, or the fauour they haue gotten with him.

They that carry his Launce.

He hath in like manner about fourescore Mutaferache, that is to ſay, Launce-bearers to the Grand Seigniour: which carry his Lance whenſoeuer he goeth to field, and acknowledge no other commander, and in time by his fauour or their merits, are made Captaines.

The Sultans Eunuches.

D He hath alwaies aboue one thouſand Eunuches entertained in ſeuerall places, whereof ſome of them are in very great credit with him, and can preuaile much: they are called Hudurni, many of them are employed to attend his Concubines and Virgines in his Seraglio. They are not only depriued of their genitors, but in their youth they haue their whole priuities ſmoothed off by their bellies, and in their turbants they beare ſhort quils of ſiluer, thorow which they make water. This inhumane cuſtome wes firſt inuented by Sultan Solyman, who ſeeing a Gelding make offer to couer a mare, grew ſuſpitious that they were able to do ſome ſmall thing, notwithſtanding the loſſe of their genitors.

The Sultans Seraglio of women.

The Grand Seignior hath a Seraglio for his women without his palace, in the which there are alwaies foure or fiue hundred young Virgines, the faireſt of the Chriſtians children, which E be gathered vp out of Græcia for tribute. The Sultan repaires ſometime thither to make choice of ſuch as he ſhall like beſt for his pleaſure, wherof they are aduertiſed the day before by the Eunuches, that they may prepare themſelues in their beſt habits to giue him content.
Being all in a roome, and ſtanding vpon either ſide, the Sultan enters, attended by an Eunuch or two, and viewes them; to her that hee likes, he caſts a handkercher, (whereof he hath many hanging at his girdle) and in this maner it may be he makes choice of halfe a dozen, the which his Eunuches obſeruing, they put them preſently into a Coach, and are carried into another little Seraglio within his palace. In this Seraglio they haue good entertainement, and are apparelled in ſilke twice a yeare, and are taught to make diuers works by antient matrons, and attended on by the younger ſort. They haue many Eunuches with their Aga or Cap-F taine, and they haue one hundred Capigi's and Ianizaries, which keepe their gates. When as the number of theſe Virgine ſlaues decreaſeth, and they haue not wherewithall to ſupply them with their tributary children, they ſend to the market in Conſtantinople, where they ſay there are dayly ten thouſand ſlaues of all ages and ſexes to be ſold: and there they buy the faireſt faireſt they can get, but they will not haue them aboue eight yeares old, leſt they ſhould be corrupted before they come into the Turks Seraglio. G

The eſtate of his concubines.

As for the other Seraglio within the Sultans palace, there remaines the Sultanaes with their children, and ſuch other Concubines as he hath made choice of for his delight. He neuer marries, but when any one is brought vnto him, he giues her an attire for her head of gold, and ten thouſand aſpers, cauſing her to liue in a chamber apart, encreaſing her dayly maintenance. The firſt that beares him a childe, is called Sultana, and is miſtreſſe of all the reſt, and moſt fauoured by him, as the chiefeſt of all his women, the reſt as they are fauoured by the Prince, are brought vnto him to haue his pleaſure, and then returned backe againe: if they chance to be with childe, they are put into the number of the Sultanaes, and are much reſpected by him. Such as the Prince hath had the vſe of, but no children by them, are giuen in marriage to his ſlaues, H who are aduanced to dignities, and made Gouernors of countries.

His guard, footmen, & porters.

He hath three hundred Sollacchi, which march continually about his perſon, and make as it were his guard, being vnder the command of the Aga of Ianizaries; they are richly attired, hauing lawne garments hanging downe beneath their knees, and ouer it a quilted waſtcoat with halfe ſleeues of taffata, damaske, or ſatten, and on their heads, caps and feathers like vnto the Captaine of the Ianizaries, and they attend on him with bowes and arrowes. He hath alſo ſtill about him when he rides abroad forty Peichi, that is to ſay, footmen or poſtes which runne wonderfull ſwiftly, and are ſtill at hand to attend his commandements, where hee ſhall pleaſe to employ them they weare long coats of cloth of gold, with a broad girdle of the ſame, and caps like vnto womens thimbles, with a horne of ſiluer and gilt ſtanding vp before. I There are about foure thouſand Capigi's or Porters which continually attend his palace and Seraglioes, they are attired like vnto the Ianizaries, and haue ouer them three Capigi Baſſaes. Theſe men are many times employed to execute the Grand Seigniors commandements, when he will haue any great mans head, or his throat cut, as we haue ſeene of late yeares in Gambolat Baſſa, and in Naſſuf Baſſa, who was Grand Viſier to Achmat.

The Turks gouernment.

The Grand Seigniors gouernment is ſo abſolute, as they all tearme themſelues his ſlaues, and no man how great ſoeuer can aſſure himſelfe of his eſtate, no not of his life, but by the Great Turks ſpeciall fauour. He commits the mannaging of his eſtate to ſuch as haue abjured the Chriſtian religion, and haue been brought by way of tything in their infancies from Greece and Natolia, and afterwards for their merits are aduanced to great dignities, as Baſ- K ſaes, Beglerbegs, and ſuch other. The Prince hath a court or Councell which they call Diuano, and this is held within the Seraglio foure daies in the weeke; that is to ſay, Saturday, Sunday, Munday, and Tueſday, where they treat of matters of State, and afterwards of the affaires of priuate men. To this councell are admitted the Grand Viſier, eight or nine Baſſaes who are called Viſiers, and are continually reſident at Conſtantinople, (for there are many more which are employed abroad in the conduct of armies or gouernment of Countries) the Beglerbegs and others. At the riſing of the court or councell, the Grand Viſier informes the Sultan of all the proceedings in particular; wherein he dares not diſſemble, for that the Prince hath a window joyning to the Diuano, where he may heare and ſee any thing and not be ſeene. L He ſeldome impugnes what they haue reſolued, vnleſſe it be to moderate ſome rigorous ſentence, or to giue anſwer to ſome Embaſſadour, and what he himſelfe concludes is irreuokeable.

The Turks Iuſtice.

Their ſuits are very ſhort, for they haue no aduocats to breed delaies, as they haue in Chriſtendome; yet commonly he that bribes moſt ſpeeds beſt; for the Turks are the moſt coueteous and corrupt Nation in the World, neither will they do any man a kindeneſſe without a fee; and yet they are not ſure to enjoy any thing they get no longer than it ſhall pleaſe the Prince. They puniſh crimes with great ſeuerity, and ſpeedily, the fact being prooued, which doth ſo terrifie them, as by the report of ſuch as haue conuerſed long there, you ſhall ſeldome ſee a murder or a theft committed by any Turke; and if any foule fact be committed, it is M moſt commonly done by the Græcians.

The Grand Viſier.

The chiefe of the Grand Seigniors Councell is the Grand Viſier, who weares the Princes ſignet, and is as it were the Lieutenant Generall of the whole Monarchy: he hath authority ouer the other Baſſaes, and they are bound to yeeld him an account of their imployments.

A He is ſtill about the Prince his perſon, and is not ſent abroad for any employment, vnleſſe it be for an important war, as they haue done of late yeares againſt the Perſian. When the Viſier is ſent abroad, he makes choice of one of the Baſſaes to be his Lieutenant and to execute his authority, and he is called Chimacham.

The Beglerbegs and Sanzackes.

Next vnto the Baſſa (which is as much to ſay as great Lord) follow the Beglerbegs, and haue their places in court next vnto them. They are men of great authority, and haue the command of great kingdomes and armies, vnder whoſe obedience are diuers Sanzacks which are ſent as Gouernors into Prouinces during the Princes pleaſure. Theſe are men of great experience, and haue command ouer the Spahi, and Timariots, the Turks chiefe forces on horſebacke, whom they call continually to exerciſe their armes. There is one Beglerbeg of Greece, B which hath all the countries in Europe in the Turks dominions vnder his charge, and this is the firſt of all the Beglerbegs, who hath vnder him aboue thirty Sanzackes. There are ſix other Beglerbegs in Aſia, whereof the firſt is he of Natolia or Aſia the leſſe. He hath the gouernment of Pontus, Bythinia, and other Kingdomes, and hath vnder him twelue Sanzackes.
The Beglerbeg of Caramania with ſeuen Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of Aladulcy, vnder whoſe command are ſeuen Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of Amazia and Toccato, hauing foure Sanzackes. There is alſo one in Meſopotamia, and vnder his command twelue Sanzackes or Gouernours of Prouinces. There is likewiſe a Beglerbeg of Damas, Suria, and Iudæa, who hath vnder him twelue Sanzackes. And there is one of Caire, who commands ouer ſixteene Sanzacks, his charge extends to the Arabians, but they are not ſo obedient as the Turks other C countries.

The great Turks forces.

As for the Turks forces, they conſiſt of horſemen, footmen, and fleets at Sea. His horſemen conſiſt of Spahi, Timari, Spachoglani, Silictari and Oloſagi, who haue aſſignations of lands for the entertainment of them and their horſes. For no man can enjoy any poſſeſſions, but he is enjoyned to entertaine a certaine number of ſouldiers proportionable to the reuenues of the land: ſo as the Gouernour or Baſſa is alwaies bound to haue this number ready to march when they are called. Of theſe Timariots they are able to raiſe about an hundred and fifty thouſand horſe alwaies ready at the firſt call, for the which the Prince disburſeth not a penny; for in regard of the land which is alotted them, they are bound to maintaine themſelues, their horſe and armes in the war. Whereſoeuer the Turke conquereth any country, he D diuides it among his ſoldiers; aſſigning 4000 aſpers yerely (which is little aboue ten pound ſterling) to euery one for himſelfe and his horſe, and ſo proportionably if he haue more land.
Theſe horſemen are much peſtered with armes when they go to war: for they haue a jacke, a ſpeare with a little white banner, a caliuer hanging vnder his left arme, a cimiter, a bow and arrowes at his girdle, and a battleaxe at his ſaddle bow. And of theſe kinde of horſemen they ſay there are 80000 in Greece, beſides an infinite number in his other countries. This Turkiſh Cauallery worke two great effects, for they ſerue as a ſupport to his eſtate, to ſuppreſſe all ſeditions, and they are ready to vndertake any enterpriſe. Beſides theſe, he entertaines many horſemen about his perſon, whereof ſome are Spahi, and theſe are Chriſtian ſlaues bred vp yong in the Princes Seraglio, who by their merits attaine to that degree, and afterwards to E greater dignities. They are alwaies attending about the Princes perſon whereſoeuer he goes, being commonly thirteene hundred.

The Timariots.

The Spahi.

The Caripices & Spacboglans

The Caripices are held for the flower of all his horſemen, being in number about eight hundred, who march ſtill about the Princes perſon during the wars. The Spachoglani which is as much to ſay as young men on horſebacke, are aboue three thouſand, who haue yerely penſions in mony, which they are bound to receiue yearely at Conſtantinople, or elſe they are held as dead men. In the wars they march on the right hand of the Grand Seigniour, and are knowne from the Spahies by the banners of their launces, which haue two points and of diuers colours, the others being painted and all white, but they are armed alike. They are men at armes of a good faſhion, and are commonly aduanced by the Sultan to higher places. They haue F a Captaine or Aga of great eſteeme, with a Lieutenant, and euery twenty haue a Boluch Baſſa.

The Salichtari.

The Salichtari are alſo horſemen, and lodge vpon the left hand of the Prince, being in number about three thouſand: Their breeding is like to the Spahi, and there is no difference bebetwixt

twixt them but in their march, the one hauing the right hand, and the other the left, which is the more honourable among the Turks.

The Oloſagi.

There is yet another ſort of horſemen, which they cal Oloſagi, being about 2000 in number, and they march on the right and left hand of the Prince. Theſe ſeuerall troupes are as it were a nurſery for all the chiefe officers of that Empire; out of which they doe commonly chuſe their great commanders. Beſides, they haue their mercenary ſoldiers called Alcanzijs, which come to ſerue the Turks from Tartaria, Valachia, and Moldauia.

The Ianizaries and their breeding.

As for his foot forces they conſiſt chiefely in Ianizaries, into which number they haue not vſed to enroll many of Aſia, whom they haue held faint hearted, but thoſe of Europe, who haue alwaies had the reputation to be valiant. Their manner to entertaine this diſcipline, is, to ſend euery three yeares into all the Prouinces of Europe, from whence they bring ten or twelue thouſand Chriſtian children as a tribute, making choice of ſuch as haue any ſhew of magnanimity, agility, or courage, which are parts fit for a ſouldier. Theſe children being brought to Conſtantinople and viſited, ſome of them are ſent into Natolia, Caramania, and other Prouinces, to dig and weed the ground, where they forget their parents, countrey, and faith, and learne the language and vices of them with whom they conuerſe, and ſo become Mahometans. They continue in thoſe places three or foure yeares, without any charge to the Prince, being entertained by them for whom they labour; after which time they are called home, and put into the Sultans Seraglio's at Pera, Adrianopolis, and other places. But they that haue the beſt faces and are moſt actiue, are reſerued for their Princes ſeruice.

The Aiamoglani

Theſe children being brought into the Princes Seraglio's, are of two ſorts; the one are called Aiamoglani, that is to ſay, ſimple Boy: they are inſtructed by ſeuere maſters in diuers manuall and painefull exerciſes, as ſhoomakers, gardeners, and ſuch like baſe trades. Their feeding and apparell is very meane; and for the moſt part they lie in great and ſpacious roomes, like vnto religious men, hauing a light continually burning, and guards about them. Theſe haue liberty to goe abroad, who after the age of twenty yeares are diſmiſſed; whereof ſome are ſent into the Sultans gardens, which are many and great; others are emploied as car men to carry wood, hay, water, and other prouiſion for the palace, and ſome are ſent to the kitchens and ſtables; yet when places fall they are preferred to be Ianizaries, and haue competent penſions to mainetaine them during their liues. The leaſt hath fiue aſpers a day, and none aboue eight, and the Spahies ten. They are attired in long blew gownes girt with a broad girdle, and on their heads they haue long yellow caps without brims, and ſharpe like vnto ſugarloues: and of theſe Aiamoglanes there are alwaies aboue twenty thouſand which ſerue to ſupply his armies.

The Ich Oglani

The other ſort of youths, which are bred vp in the Turks Seraglio's or nurſeries, are called Ich-Oglani, that is to ſay, chamber pages, being the choice of all the Chriſtians children for proportion and fauour, and theſe are better bred vp than the Aiamoglani, and come to better preferment, of whom we haue formerly made mention; for the meaneſt places theſe yong men attaine vnto at the firſt is to be Spahies, or to attend vpon the grand Seignior as his chamberlaines and pages. And many of them hauing extraordinary parts are ſuddenly aduanced to places of great dignity. Of theſe the Prince hath euer 5000, who vntill they come vnto the age of twenty yeares are neuer ſuffered to goe out of their Seraglio, nor to ſee any perſon but ſuch as inſtruct them and attend vpon them.

The Ianizaries.

The Ianizaries (who are the grand Seigniors chiefe ſtrength on foot) are raiſed out of Chriſtians children, bred vp in theſe nurſeries, as we haue ſaid, where they are taught to ſhoot with their bowes and arrowes, to vſe the harquebuſe, and all other weapons fit for ſeruice; and are at length enrolled among the Ianizaries, and are held the moſt valiant and reſolute ſouldiers among all the Turks. There are commonly reſident at Conſtantinople and thereabouts twenty foure thouſand of theſe Ianizaries when as the Grand Seigniour is there, (for in his whole eſtate he hath a far greater number) vnder their Aga or Captaine Generall, which is a place of great credit, but not like vnto any of their Baſſaes; the great Turke fearing to joyne power and authority together. Being once Ianizaries, they are either ſent to the wars, or put in garriſon, or elſe they remaine at the Sultans court (which they call port) where they haue certaine ſpacious places for their dwelling, like to religious houſes, where they liue vnder their commanders:

A commanders: and the younger ſerue the antient with great reſpect. All the Ianizaries of one ſquadron eat together at one table, and ſleep in certaine long halls, and if any one chance to be abſent all night, he ſhall (the next night) be beaten with a cudgell, which he takes ſo patiently as he kiſſeth his hand that hath thus corrected him. They are much reſpected and feared of all men, and are diuerſly imploied in the city; as to ſee the peace and good orders kept; to looke to the prices of things, to arreſt malefactors, and to guard the gates. If they buy any thing they will haue it at their owne rate; they cannot be judged but by their Aga or Captaine. There is ſeldome any one puniſhed with death by the courſe of juſtice, without danger of a mutiny; and therefore they execute them very ſecretly. They haue many meanes to get mony; for ſome attend vpon Embaſſadours and keep their houſes; others go with trauel- B lers, to guard them ſafely through the Turks eſtate. They haue a great power in their Princes election; ſo as to win their loues euery new Emperour at his firſt comming to the Crowne giues them a donatiue and encreaſeth their pay, preſuming vpon their valour and multitude. They many times commit ſtrange inſolencies vpon any diſcontents; as in firing of houſes, brauing the Baſſaes, and ſometimes bearding the Sultan himſelfe: as you may reade in this Hiſtory.

The chiefe ſtrength of the Turks forces conſiſt in the Ianizaries; and yet there are other ſorts of footmen, whereof ſome are called Acouizes, which is a forlorne hope, and receiue no pay, but march before the army, and haue leaue to ſpoile; ſo as they giue the fifth part of their booty to the Prince. There is another kinde called Azapi: theſe are ſouldiers of ſmall effect, C and ſerue rather with the pickaxe and ſpade than with the ſword: they are fitter to tire an enemy with their numbers, than to vanquiſh them with their valour; and they are accuſtomed to fill vp ditches with their dead bodies to make a paſſage for the Ianizaries to aſcend vnto a breach. The Grand Seignior hath euer ſix thouſand Gunners in pay whom they call Topegi. And for the guard of the pouder and ſhot when the army marcheth, there is alwaies 12000 men in pay, whom they call Iebegi.

Acouices.

Azapi.

Topegi and Iebegi.

The Grand Seignior hath alſo certaine officers attending on him to the number of 3000, whom they call Chiaus, which are as it were ſergeant at armes. Theſe are men well eſteemed, and are often employed in Embaſſies to forreine Princes: They alſo carry letters and commendations from the Prince or his chiefe Viſier, and they apprehend offenders. Theſe neuer D goe to the warre but when the Sultan is there in perſon. They are commanded by a Chiaus Baſſa, who is of ſo great credit with all men (as Sanzouino writes) that when he is ſent by the Grand Seigniour to any Baſſa, Sanzacke, or Cadi, with order to haue any mans head cut off, he is obeyed, although hee haue no warrant in writing, as if the Prince were there himſelfe, and commanded it.

The Chiaus.

Thus we haue ſet downe the Grand Seigniors forces at land, whoſe numbers are ſo great, as in ſhew they ſhould breed confuſion, and ruine themſelues; but they keepe very good order and diſcipline, ſo as in that point they yeeld not to any. They liue of a little bread baked in the aſhes, with rice, and the pouder of fleſh dried in the ſunne: They may not drinke wine, and there are no women ſeene in their armies: they obſerue a wonderfull ſilence, and all the ſoul- E diers are gouerned by the becke of the hand or any ſhew of the countenance. Quarrels and thefts are ſeuerely puniſhed. When they march they dare not enter into any corne fields nor vines. The valiant are aſſured of preferments, and cowards of puniſhment.

The Turks diſcipline in their armies.

Hauing ſpoken ſufficiently of their land forces, let vs ſee what ſtrength he hath at ſea: they haue great ſtore of foreſts for the building of ſhips; neither want they good ſhipwrites, for that couetouſneſſe hath drawne many Chriſtian carpenters into the grand Seigniors arſenal: And he hath great numbers of men trained vp in marine affaires, in regard of the gallies which he hath at Mitilene, Rhodes, Cyprus, and Alexandria, and for the retreat hee giues pyrats at Tunes, Bona, Bugia and Algiers, from whence he drawes commanders and his beſt mariners, as hath beene ſeene by experience in the enterpriſes of Malta, Guletta, and elſewhere.

F To maintaine theſe great forces, it is requiſite he ſhould haue the ſinews of war; yet his ordinary reuenues (conſidering the large dominions) are not ſo great, as in reaſon they ſhould be: for ſome are of opinion, that hee hath not aboue eight millions of gold for his ordinary reuenue; for which they giue diuers reaſons: firſt, that the Turks haue no care but of armes,

the which doe rather ruine than inrich a country : ſecondly, they conſume ſo many men in G their enterpriſes,as they ſcarce leaue ſufficient to manure their land,ſo as the ſubjects(deſpairing to enjoy their wealth and neceſſary commodities,which they might get by their labour and induſty) imploy not themſelues to worke nor trafficke, no more than neceſſity ſhall conſtraine them : for to what purpoſe is it, ſay they, to ſow that another man muſt reape ? or to reape that which another will conſume ? And for this reaſon you ſhall ſee in the Turks eſtate whole countries lie waſt, and many times great dearth, which growes by the want of men to manure their land ; for that the country men for the moſt part either die in the voyages which they make,or in carrying victuals and other neceſſary things for their armies ; for of 10000 which they draw from their houſes to row in their gallies, ſcarce the fourth part returnes to their houſes,by reaſon of the great toyles they endure. Another reaſon why the Sultans reuenues H be no greater, is, for that when he conquers any country, he aſſignes the lands to his Timarri, who are bound to maintaine ſo many men, and ſo many horſes, according to the proportion of land which he giues them,reſeruing no rent.

But although his ordinary reuenues be no greater than we haue ſpoken,yet he drawes great profit by his extraordinaries,eſpecially by confiſcations and preſents;for being all his ſlaues, no man enjoyeth any thing longer than it pleaſeth him : yea, the Baſſaes and greateſt officers of that crowne, which oppreſſe his ſubjects, and gather together ineſtimable wealth, in the end for the moſt part, it comes into the Turks Caſna or Treaſury. It is not ſtrange there to ſend for any ſubjects head, vpon any ſuggeſtion whatſoeuer, which no man dare contradict : after which execution,his ſlaues and goods are ſold in the market at Conſtantinople, and the I mony applied to the Princes coffers. His preſents alſo amount to great ſummes,for no Embaſſador may come before him without a preſent, neither may any man expect any office or dignity without mony : no gouernor being returned from his prouince,dares preſent himſelfe to the Sultan empty handed, neither are their preſents of ſmall price. The Sultans exchequer is gouerned by two Treaſurers called Deſtardari, who are more rightly gouernors of the reuenues,for that they keep an account of the Princes Caſna or Treaſure,the one hath charge of the reuenues which are raiſed in Natolia, and the other in Europe. Alſo they draw great profits from their tributary prouinces, eſpecially from Valachia, Moldauia, and Tranſyluania, where the Princes maintaine themſelues by preſents and gifts ; ſo as they change dayly, for that they that offer moſt are aduanced,wherby they are forced to ruine the country,to perſ- K forme what they haue promiſed.

The lawes whereby the Turks are gouerned.

The Mufti.

But hauing ſpoken of the Turks forces and reuenues,whereby they maintaine their armies to inuade their neighbours,we muſt now ſpeake ſomthing of their lawes wherby the ſubjects are gouerned,which are inſtitutions and anſwers of wiſe men, the which they hold as an interpretation of their Alcaron,which is the ground of their law. Theſe inſtitutions are conteined in twelue volumes,treating of all things belonging to ciuill conuerſation. Some prouinces of Turkie are gouerned by cuſtomes, and enjoy their priuiledges, and their wiſe Iudges ſupply many things which are not written. The Sultan makes choice of the wiſeſt and worthieſt perſon that can be found,of a ſincere life according to their law, & he is called Mufti,that is, Interpreter of their Alcaron ; he is (as it were) their high prieſt,attending only matters of re- L ligion and faith:he is head of the church among the Turks,and decideth all queſtions of their law. He is of ſuch eminency, as all the Baſſaes are ſubject to his direction : he abaſeth not himſelfe ſo much as to ſit in the Diuano, onely paſſeth through it when he is ſent for by the Sultan,who (ſo ſoone as he ſeeth him) riſeth from his ſeat as it were to honour him, and then they both ſit downe face to face,and ſo confer together.

The Cadileſquiri.

They make triall of the ſufficienteſt of their Iudges,before they chuſe any,for which there are two Cadileſquiri Taliſmani, that is, Doctors of the law, and Examiners at Conſtantinople, or whereſoeuer the Prince remaines ; Theſe examine the Iudges or Cadi's of diuers prouinces. The one hath his charge ouer Europe,and is called Cadileſquirie Romly,before whom (after good information of his life,and ſufficiencie) he ſweares that he will do juſtice to all men, M and yeeld an account of his charge when he ſhall be called. The othe Cadileſquirie is for Natolia : they are ſoueraigne judges in all cauſes,and as it were Patriarks. They are of great authority,and haue place in the Diuano with the Baſſaes to conſult of weighty matters.

There

The Mulli, Muderiſi, and Cadi.

A There is a third degree of their churchmen, belonging to their law, called Mulli, which are biſhops and chieſe gouernors vnder the Muſty; and their office is to place and diſplace churchmen at their diſcretion. Next are the Nuderiſi, who are ſuffragans to the Biſhops, and their charge is to ſee the Cadies doe their duties. Next come the Cadi's who are Iudges to puniſh offendors, of which there is one in euery city vnder the Seigniors command.

The Naipi.

Vnder theſe are another kind of yong Doctors of the law called Naipi, who are not ſo well read as to be abſolute Iudges, but yet ſupply their places in their abſence.

The Hogi, Calſi, and Soſti.

After theſe are the Hogi, who write their bookes, for that they allow no Printing: and inferior vnto them are the Calſi, who reade vnto them that write. And the yongeſt of all are called Soſti, who are yong ſtudents or nouices in their law.

B These are their ſeuerall degrees of lawyers or churchmen: for the Turks are gouerned by a kinde of Eccleſiaſticall law, according to their Alcaron. They haue colledges (called Medreſſæ) at Conſtantinople, and in other places, where they liue and ſtudy their law and diuinity, and ſo they aſcend by degrees to the higheſt dignity of their profeſſion.

The Turks religion.

As for their religion, it began in the time of the Emperour Heraclius, when as the Empire was much diſmembred by the hereſies of Arrius and Neſtorius. Mahomet borne in Arabia imbraced this opportunity, ſeeking to ouerthrow the Diuinity of Ieſus Chriſt, which was oppoſed by the Iewes and Arabians: he was aſſiſted by two hereticks, the one was Iohn a Neſtorian, and the other Sergius an Arrian. After which (being aſſiſted by many ſlaues, to whom he allowed all that was pleaſing to the ſence and fleſh, if they ſhould receiue this law) he obtained C many victories. By Mahomets law they make a diſtinction of cleane and vncleane meats to content the Iewes, and alſo it maintaines circumciſion, but not at the eight day of their birth, as the Iewes vſe it, but after the eight yeare, when the infant is able to make confeſſion of his faith, where lifting vp his finger he ſpeakes theſe words, which are grauen in their temples in the Arabian tongue: There is but one God whoſe Prophet Mahomet is, one God and equall Prophets.
The circumciſion being ended, they feaſt three daies together, and then they carry the circumciſed to a bath with great pompe; after which the gueſts conduct him to his houſe, and preſent him with gifts. The women are not circumciſed, but only ſpeake the words. If any Chriſtian abiure his faith and indure circumciſion (as they often doe by reaſon of their tributes and vexations) they are led through the towne with great honor and reioycing of the D people, who do alſo giue vnto them, and they pay no tributes. Mahomets law denies the Diuinity of Ieſus Chriſt, to pleaſe the Arrians who were then powerfull: It is full of fables to pleaſe Idolaters, and it giues liberty to the fleſh which is pleaſing to moſt men.

They confeſſe one God, and honor Ieſus Chriſt, not as the ſonne of God, but as a Prophet borne of the Virgin Mary. They neither honor nor allow images. Friday is their Sabbath, as Sunday is ours. They obſerue a Lent of thirty daies, which they call Ramadan; during which they eate nothing in the day time, but when night comes all meats are indifferent, but ſwines fleſh; yet they abſtaine from wine and women. They haue their Eaſter called Bayran, which continues three daies, in which they enjoy all pleaſures: but this feaſt is not alwaies prefixed, for that they account not the day according to the courſe of the Sun, but of the Moone; and E therefore they do carefully obſerue the new Moone and ſalute it.

They haue no bels in their Moſques, neither do they ſuffer the Chriſtians which liue there to haue any. They put off their ſhooes when they go into their Moſques, and take them again at their comming forth. Whereſoeuer they ſit in their churches or houſes, they haue tapeſtry couerlets or mats vnder them: they are not much giuen to contemplation or learning, yet the Turkiſh women being married and hauing iſſue, are carefull to breed vp their children, and to be inſtructed; for the which there are many ſchooles, where they reade their lawes, to the end they may ſerue in their Moſques, and be able to gouerne the common weale.

The Turks by Mahomets law haue leaue to marry as many wiues as they can maintaine; and a Turkiſh woman being once with childe, her husband neuer toucheth her vntill ſhe be F deliuered, but lies with his ſlaues out of the houſe where his wife remaines. They haue a certaine kind of marriage made at pleaſure, which they call Kebin, the which is many times praiſed by ſtrangers, who being out of their country contract with women, whom they are to enjoy during their pleaſure, and when they caſt them off, they giue them a certaine ſumme of mony, and keepe the children. The Cadi's or Iudges allow not this kinde of contract, eſpecially amongſt Chriſtians, vnleſſe it be with an oath of marriage. A Turke hauing had the G vſe of a Chriſtian woman, they are both condemned to die, vnleſſe ſhe will adjure her faith: the like is obſerued betwixt a Chriſtian and a Turkiſh woman, if they haue been found together. Diuorce is allowed among them in caſe of barrenneſſe and incontinency.

There are foure orders of religious men among the Turks which differ in their liuing, habit, and ceremonies. Theſe be the Terlaques, Deruis, Kalenders, and Huquiemales, and theſe laſt are very vicious, and wicked impoſters, deceiuing of the common people. The Deruis is a ſtrict order liuing in contemplation, much like vnto the Capuchins among the Romiſh Papiſts. The Turks forbeare to blaſpheme either God, Chriſt, or Mahomet, or any other Saint whatſoeuer, and they puniſh blaſphemy ſeuerely. They conuerſe with Chriſtians, and eat and H traffique with them freely; yea, ſomtimes they marry their daughters, and ſuffer them to liue after their owne religion. But they hate the Iewes, and deſpiſe them as the baſeſt people in the World. They haue an aſſured confidence, that he that ſhall duely obſerue the lawes of Mahomet, ſhall haue eternall life, and a Paradiſe full of delights: and contrariwiſe they that ſhall breake the lawes of their Alcaron are threatned with hell and eternall death; yet they haue an opinion that hee that beleeues in the Alcaron when hee dies, ſhall be vndoubtedly ſaued.

The diſpoſition of the Turks.

To conclude this relation with ſome few lines of their humors and diſpotions; they write of them, that they are groſſe witted, idle and vnfit for labour. They are exceeding couetous and corrupt, aboue all other Nations; for juſtice is ſold to him that offers moſt. They are I humble among themſelues, and obey their ſuperiours with great ſilence. They are proud and inſupportable to ſtrangers, thinking none fit to be compared with them. They are giuen to gluttony and drunkenneſſe, and will ſpend whole daies together in feaſting, and will drinke with exceſſe if it be in priuate, for that it is forbidden by their law. They are vain-glorious, proud and deceitfull, neuer keeping their words, but when it may be to their profit. They are much inclined to venery, and are for the moſt part all Sodomites. They are very ſuperſtitious, giuing credit to dreames and diuinations; and they hold that euery mans deſtiny is written in his forehead, which cannot be altered or auoided.

Thus I haue continued this Hiſtory for eleuen yeares, hauing informed my ſelfe out of the beſt authors and intelligencers I could fide that concerne this ſubject: I ſhould haue beene K glad that ſome which haue reſided at Conſtantinople moſt part of this time, would haue aſſiſted mee with their obſeruations, which ſhould haue beene for the generall good of our Nation; but I hope notwithſtanding the Reader ſhall finde contens and ſatisfaction.

A CONTINVATION OF THE TVRKISH HISTORY, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE YEARE OF OVR LORD 1620, VNTILL THE ENDING OF THE YEARE OF OVR LORD 1628.

COLLECTED OVT OF THE PAPERS and Diſpatches of S^r THOMAS ROWE, Knight, his Maieſties Embaſſador with the grand Signior during that time.

And ſince by Him re-viewed and corrected.

BEfore we come to ſpeak of the great preparations made by the grand Signior in the yeare 1621, 1620.
to inuade the kingdom of Poland; and thoſe by that king to reſiſt him: I hold it neceſſarie, briefly to ſet down the cauſes and reaſons of the inſuing war.

The Chrim Tartar, confining vpon the dukedome of Ruſſia and borders of Poland, had made many incurſions, E and did great ſpoile vpon the Coſſackes within that prouince of Ruſſia, and other parts belonging to the Kingdom of Poland, and carrying away the people of all ages and ſexes, made ſale of them within the Turkes empire.
Now Iean-beagh-Ghiray-Han Prince of the Tartars, being wholly dependant on the Ottoman Emperors, his Maieſty of Poland ſent many ſeuerall Embaſſadors to complain at that Port; That notwithſtanding the antient league betweene him and the Ottoman Family, the Tartars greatly ſpoiled his Countries, which was both vniuſt and againſt the treaties. Howſoeuer the complaints were many and great, yet the king of Polands miniſters found no redreſſe for thoſe their alledged F wrongs; but were anſwered, That the Tartars were abſolute lords ouer themſelues, and that they pretended to haue an annual tribute of 40000 Dollars from the king of Poland; which being denied them, they had reaſon ſo to do: and that the grand Seignior could only intreat, but not command them to ſurceaſe. The Tartars ſeeing the Polacke thus ſleighted at the Port, grew more inſolent and outragious: wherewith the Turkes were well content, for the great benefit they receiued by ſlaues which were continually brought to be ſould in their dominions, G finding for the moſt part that thoſe men had able bodies, and fit to be applied to the oare. It is true that the Chrim Tartars in antient time beeing ſo neere neighbours, were woont to receiue ſuch a Penſion from the Crowne of Poland, for the which they were obliged to ſerue in euery occaſion of Warre: but of later yeares that payment hath diſcontinued; becauſe they rather receiued hurt, than any aſſiſtance from that vagabond and predatory people.

When the Coſſacks ſaw that after ſo many complaints they could not liue at reſt, nor procure reſtitution of their wrongs, nor take their reuenge vpon the Tartars, being a flitting and fugitiue nation, who had no certain place of abode; they reſolued to fall into the dominions of the grand Signior, who ſeemed, if not to protect, yet to conniue at injuries they receiued H from theſe their neighbors. The Coſſacks then that inhabited vpon the banks of the riuer Boriſthenes (which emptieth it ſelfe into the blacke ſea) were coniectured to bee fitteſt for the execution of this reuenge: and therfore they prepared a number of wel armed Barques, & falling down the riuer, did very great dammage, by robbing, ſpoiling, and burning diuers townes and villages bordering vpon the black ſea.

This news being brought to Conſtantinople, the grand Signior took it in great ſcorne, that ſuch a baſe and rude people ſhould come and afront him ſo neer his doores. Therfore he cauſed ſome gallies to be armed forth with ſpeed to ſuppreſſe them: but his forces were foure or fiue times valiantly repulſed, and ſtil the Coſſack went ſafely home with his prey. Now the tide of affairs was turned, and this great Emperor who was formerly petitioned by the Polack, I is now become a ſuitor to him, & finds his Miniſters meaſured by the anſwer the grand Signior had giuen concerning the wrongs don by the Tartars: That though the Coſſacks adhere to the Crown of Poland, yet are they a free people of themſelues: but when the Tartar ſhall ceaſe from his hoſtilitie, it is like enough the Pole will intreat the Coſſacke to do the ſame; and that is all the authoritie he can exerciſe ouer them.

The grand Signiors preparation for warre with the King of Poland.

Affairs ſtanding thus, no accommodation for wrongs on either ſide could be made; and the grand Signior, although he was now but fifteen years of age, yet was hee ſtrong, vigorous, and of a high ſpirit, and more than deſirous of a war, but eſpecially with the King of Poland, from whom he looked for better ſatisfaction. This deſire was nouriſhed in him by the counſels of Ali Baſſa great Vizier; and notwithſtanding it was vtterly diſliked by al the reſt of the K Miniſters of ſtate, and officers of war in that Empire, a war was neuertheleſſe thereupon proclaimed throughout all the Turks Dominions; which did in generall diſpleaſe the common ſoldier alſo.

The grand Signior the foure and twentieth of Aprill commanded paiment to be made to all the Soldierie; and the day following cauſed all his tents and pauilions, with thoſe of his Viziers and other officers, to be ſolemnly pitched without the City, with all trades that were to attend his Royal camp. Who hauing now gathered of foot and horſe three hundred thouſand (though reported to be twice the number) ſet forward together with his court and train out of Conſtantinople the 29 of April, with three hundred field pieces, beſide a hundred cannon ſent vnto the frontiers by ſea; leauing Achmat Baſſa and the Boſtangi Baſſa gouernors of L the ciry til his return.

When he was arriued at the confines of Poland, he firſt attempted the fortreſſe of Chotyn in the prouince of Moldauia, lately giuen by Gaſparo Gratiani to the Polacks. The which being ſtrong of ſcituation, and well furniſhed for defence, the Turke finding it difficult to carry in few daies, left it beſieged; and paſſing the riuer of Boriſthene, found there the Chancellor of Poland intrencht vpon the borders, in a ſtrong place and of good aduantage, with forty thouſand Polacks and Coſſacks, and eight thouſand high Dutch, ſent by the Emperor in aid of the King of Poland. The Prince was incamped at Caminitza, and ſtrongly intrenched with ſixty thouſand ſouldiers; the King abiding in Cracovia, with the Nobilitie and his Court. The grand Signior facing the Trenches vpon Boriſthene, with the multitude of his M army incloſed them round, and ſhut vp all the paſſages; ſending preſently the prince of the Tartars, Iean-beagh-Ghiray-Han, with thirty thouſand light horſe to make incurſions within the heart of Poland: who did great ſpoile, and brought away captiues twenty fiue thouſand ſoules of all ſorts; which dammage did not ſo much proceed from the will of the Prince, as from

from a Captaine of his, a Nobleman of Tartarie called Kante-Emir-Emirze, in great fauor at that time with the Emperour: for it was thought that betweene the King of Poland, and the Prince of Tartarie, there was ſome ſecret intelligence by the vertue of money.

During the ſpace of foure and thirty dayes that the Grand Seignior held theſe Trenches beſieged, almoſt euery other day he gaue them terrible aſſaults, but was alway forced to retyre with loſſe. The Polacke in brauerie making ſome ſallies, were alſo glad to recouer their ſtrength; onely once they ſo farre aduanced in the euening with their ſhot vpon the quarter of the Ianizaries, that they made a great execution, and almoſt put the whole camp into diſorder; and as the Turks themſelues did confeſſe, if this ſally had been giuen in the night, it had hazarded the confuſion of the whole army: All which being ſeen by the Grand Signior, and little hope of aduancing further, for diuers reaſons he was inforced to treat a ceſſation of Armes with the Chancellor. The firſt was, That he had ſpent ſo much time without any aduantage, and the Winter approched, whereby his army ſuffered great extremities of cold and other miſeries, by reaſon of terrible raines which had carried away diuers tents, horſes, and other cattell, and ſome part of his cannons. Secondly, the prouiſion of ſodder was become ſo deare, that diuers forſooke their horſes for want of means to feed them: beſides the great mortalitie of men, of fluxes, Feuers, & colds, and the horſes of Aſia not vſed to ſuch a climat, that many men of quality that came out with ten & 12, were compelled to return on foot. Thirdly, the army either for wearineſſe, or for diſcontent receiued from the Emperour himſelfe, for his narrowneſſe and auarice ſhewed to the ſoldier, contrary to the glorious example of his anceſtors in like enterpriſes not only refuſed to fight, but were little leſſe than mutined. Fourthly, this attempt from the beginning proceeding meerely from the obſtinacie of the Grand Signior, contrary to the counſell of moſt of his Viſiers, who deſired generally a peace: at their ſolicitation and by the mediation of Radula Prince of Valachia, both parts were eaſily induced to treaty, and the Chancellor was drawn to ſend a Secretarie to the Grand Signior; where it was agreed, as followeth.

Firſt, That the Emperor ſhould raiſe his army, and retyre from the confines of Poland; and the Tartars as the occaſioners of this war ſhould ſend an Emirze to reſide as a pledge from enſuing incurſions. The Chancellor promiſing in the name of the King of Poland, to keep another in the court of the Prince of Tartarie, with condition to pay yearely as aforeſaid forty thouſand florins (an antient pretention of the Tartars) as a donatiue from the King of Poland; promiſing moreouer, for the better confirmation of the future peace, to maintain a Reſident in the Port of the Ottoman Court; and vpon the arriuall of euery ſuch Embaſſador, to ſend a Preſent conformable to the Ledgiers of other Chriſtian Princes. And as the Grand Signior was obliged for the Tartars that they ſhould forbeare all inuaſions vpon the Polacke; ſo the Polacks ſhould bind themſelues in behalfe of the Coſſacks, that they ſhould commit no roberies in the dominion of the Grand Signior. And further couenanting in the name of the Poliſh Merchants for the Priuiledge of free traffike, to make a Preſent of an hundred thouſand chequines in plate, ſables, and Bulgary hides; alway intended with this reſeruation, that this treaty ſhould not prejudice or bind, vntill the Grand Signior did ſend a Chiaus to the King of Poland with theſe ouertures, that he might haue time to aſſemble his Parliament, and there to reſolue to ſend an Embaſſador with ample authoritie to treat and conclude a finall peace in the Port. Whereupon the Grand Signior being ſatisfied with theſe conditions, did diſpatch preſently his Nuntio into Poland, and ſuddenly to the great content of all his army, he raiſed his camp, and returned to Adrianople.

The loſſe in the Turkiſh & Poliſh armie.

By relation of diuers preſent, in that war, it was reported, That there died in the Turkes camp, by the ſword, famin, ſickneſſe and cold, about eighty thouſand men, and aboue an hundred thouſand horſe; and the remaine at their returne, appearing ſo naked, ſickely, and poore, made euident demonſtration of the great loſſe and miſerie ſuſtained. The Polacks in their trenches loſt aboue twenty thouſand by the famine ſuffered in their beſieging: ſo that if the winter and other wants had not conſtrained the grand Signior to riſe with ſome pretence of honor, and that he had ſtaid a few daies longer, they had bin forced to render or periſh: which is euident, for that they were glad and prompt to accept of any agreement, although as yet there was nothing fully concluded.

The grand Signior being informed that the Emperour of Germany had ſent aid of eight thouſand Dutch to the King of Poland, and inraged that hee had ſo little aduanced in that attempt, pretending that the Emperour by giuing ſuccors had broken the peace; to vent his choler, contrary to the aduice of his Councell, preſently vpon his ariſing from the confines of Poland, in his camp proclaimed war againſt Germany for the next Spring; commanding vpon great penaltie, all his ſouldiers and ſlaues to be ready for that inuaſion. Which gaue great diſcontent to the army, inſomuch as they did almoſt publiquely profeſſe, that they neither could nor would follow him. And conformable to this his raſh reſolution, hee gaue order to Kante-Emir-Emirze, a Tartarian captain then Baſſa of Siliſtra, to winter with 20000 of his ſoldiers in the frontier. Preſently hereupon Caſar Gallo the Emperours Embaſſadour was ſtayed at Buda; the Grand Signior pretending, that hee had promiſed vpon his life, that the Emperor would giue no aid to the King of Poland. Not conſidering that he himſelf contrary to the peace, the ſummer before had ſurpriſed Vatz a town of Hungary, and had permitted many of his ſouldiers to follow the prince of Tranſylvania, as Voluntiers againſt the Emperor.

The King of Poland hearing of this reſolution againſt the Emperour, called the Chiaus ſent about the Treaty, before him, and told him, That if the grand Signior ſhould proceed to make war vpon the Emperour for his occaſion, that he could conclude no peace with him, being obliged to take part with the Emperor as his deare brother and Confederate. Which meſſage the Chiaus ſent to the grand Signior when hee was yet at Adrianople, where hee either purpoſed to Winter to affright the Emperour, or to quicken the Polacke to a concluſion of peace; cold in his ſudden pretence, by the perſuaſions of the Viſiers and Mufti hee changed his reſolution, and tooke his way to Conſtantinople, where hee arriued the laſt of December.

Now it being giuen out, That the Emir of Syria or Sidon was in rebellion, and that hee had poſſeſſed himſelf of the city and caſtle of Tripolie, the grand Signior pretended to go in perſon againſt him, and gaue out 60000 Checquines to prepare his carriages and pauilions; and tooke order to prouide his palace in Aleppo, determining to paſſe that way, to amuſe and raiſe ſuſpition in the Perſian: and likewiſe commanded the army of Aſia to be in readines by the end of the month of April; and gaue out commiſſion for victuals, munition, and other neceſſaries. The Mufti, Hoja, and other the Viſiers who knew not the miſtery, miſliking this counſel, with great inſtances and reaſons diſſuaded him, as being a courſe very dangerous to his eſtate. Firſt, that his Maieſty ſhould go in perſon, leauing all Greece deſolate, and commit the care and gouernment of his Imperial ſeat to a poor Chimacham or lieutenant, it not being probable, that the Emir of Sidon would ſtay to oppoſe himſelf againſt the force of his royal army, but rather make an eſcape, and retyre himſelf to ſome part of Chriſtendom: and that a Generall by land, and the Captain Baſſa Admirall of the ſea, with his fleet of Gallies, would ſuffice to puniſh and deſtroy him. Beſides, if his Maieſtie vndertooke the journey in perſon, it was neceſſary that all his ſoldiers ſhould attend him, which were a charge ſuperfluous and aboue the enterpriſe, and almoſt impoſſible for them, hauing bin ſo harraſſed and diſtreſſed in the late inuaſion of Poland; who did euen publiquely murmure that they would not go. For which reaſons the King ſeemed to change his reſolution, and was contented to make a General by land, with the army of Aſia: to which charge was named the Baſſa of Cairo. The next day after, the grand Signior comming to the Arſenal, he called the Viſier Baſſa, the Admiral, and the great Treaſurer before him; where it was concluded, to make ready at leaſt an hundred gallies: for the preparation wherof ſixty thouſand Checquines were then deliuered; the Viſier promiſing to furniſh the reſt of the whole charge with expedition, of his own purſe, and to take it vp vpon the Kings Aſſignations. Wherupon the grand Signior with great content did veſt them as a mark of fauor, and gaue preſent commiſſion to the Admiral to be ready and to depart by the midſt of Aprill following: and for his better ſtrength he gaue a command to ſend for aids to Tunes and Algier. Which was thought requiſite, becauſe it was reported that the prince Philibert of Savoy, then Viceroy of Sicilie, had in readineſſe ſixty Gallies and ſix Gallions at Meſſina; which force was doubted would be imploied to giue ſuccor to the Emir of Sidon, or to reuenge the attempt and late ſacke of Manfredonia. So that they were with all expedition rigging and preparing the Armado in the Arſenall: and for prouiſion and preuention of the worſt, there was ordained twelue ſmall Gallies and the ordinary fleet of frigots to keep the black ſea from the incurſion of the Coſſacks:and though it was giuen out that this army was only prepared againſt the Emir,yet many that vnderſtood the ſecrets of that empire,knowing it to be too great,did beleeue it ſhould bee ſent to preuent a generall reuolt,which was then murmured and ſuſpected in Aſia.

About this time,contrary to the counſel and wil of all his miniſters,the grand Signior maried the grand child of a Sultana wife to Pertau Baſſa,only for her beauty,without any pompe: which was ill interpreted in that court; his anceſtors of late yeares not vſually taking wiues, eſpecially of a Turkiſh race, in reſpect of kindred. This and other inconſtancies, with extream auarice, made him odious to the ſouldier; and his daily haunting the ſtreets on foot, ſomtimes diſguiſed with a page or two, prying into houſes and tauernes like a petty Officer, increaſed his contempt euen in the city.

The grand Signior maried.

Secret order was giuen about the ſame time to Diac. Mahomet Baſſa of Caniſia, and to Gelut. Emirze a Tartarian,to vnite themſelues with Bethlem Gabor againſt the Emperour of Germanie. But the Baſſa of Buda did aduertiſe the graund Signior, That Gabor had concluded peace with the Emperour; which news did greatly diſpleaſe him,beeing ardent in the deſire of war.

The peace between the grand Signior and the king of Poland was not yet fully concluded, but Embaſſadors weekly expected at the Port from Poland and other places, to haſten a full conſummation therof. Among which, Sr Thomas Rowe Knight, Embaſſador in ordinary from his Majeſty of great Brittain to the grand Signior,arriued there the firſt of Ianuary, and had his audience ſpeedily,when he made this ſpeech vnto him in Engliſh:

The King of great Britains Embaſſador arriueth at the Port.

Moſt high and mighty Emperor, his ſacred Maieſtie the King of great Brittaine, France, and Ireland, my moſt gratious Lord and Soueraign, according to the antient league of friendſhip and amitie, of long time begun and continued between the moſt noble Anceſtors of your Maieſties, and in his royall perſon confirmed by his ſundry Embaſſadors and Letters, both to your renowned father, and to your Imperiall Maieſty; being fully determined on his part, to maintain and inuiolably to hold a fair and good peace and correſpondencie with your Maieſty; hath commanded and ſent mee with his Letters of credence and friendly preſent, to reſide as his Embaſſador in your royall Court. Not doubting but your Imperiall Maieſty will accept them, and receiue me his vnworthy ſeruant with your wonted honor and fauour: and that you will giue credit vnto me in diuers matters of importance which hee hath commanded me to deliuer in his name; comprehended in fiue articles written in this Memoriall: And that you would be pleaſed to do therin according to the royall friendſhip of his Maieſty and your princely wiſedom and juſtice. The particulars wherof I deſire your Maieſty to reade and conſider at your eaſe and leiſure, and to affoord mee your royall anſwer; his Maieſty reſting aſſured he ſhall receiue content and ſatisfaction worthy his Royall friendſhip.

The Letter of Credence ſent by Sr Thomas Rowe.

IAmes by the grace of God, King of great Brittain, France, and Irelend, Defender of the Chriſtian Faith, againſt all thoſe that falſly profeſſe the name of Ieſus, &c. To the moſt high and mighty Prince Sultan Oſman Han, chiefe Lord and Commander of the Ottoman kingdom and Empire of the Eaſt, ſendeth health and greeting.

WE doubt not but you receiued our Letters ſent by our ſubiect Iohn Chapman; whereby we ſignified vnto you our royall pleaſure, to recall and diſcharge our Embaſſador Sir Iohn Ayre from his imployment and reſidence in your Court; whom wee deſired you in your princely fauor to diſmiſſe for our eſpeciall ſeruice, and to receiue the bearer of our ſaid Letters as Agent, to remaine in your protection, for the better ſupport and maintenance of our ſubiects which do trade and abide in your dominions, and for the aduancement and continuance of the mutuall commerce and friendſhip which hath bin a long time contracted between your predeceſſors and ours, vntill the arriuall of Sir Thomas Rowe, of whom as then we made choice to ſend vnto your Port as our Embaſſadour; as well to propound vnto you diuers things things neceſſary for the generall peace, as to reſide in your court for our particular ſeruice. Notwithſtanding G leſt the ſaid letters ſhould not come ſafely to your royall hands, wee haue thought fit again to make known our purpoſe of recalling our former Embaſſador Sir Iohn Ayre, and to deſire you to diſcharge and diſmiſſe him from your Port, and to receiue and admit in his roome our truſty and welbeloued Seruant Sir Thomas Rowe, one of the principall Gentlemen of our Court, and of our Priuy Chamber; whom wee haue expreſly ſent, and whom we authoriſe vnder our great Seal of England, as our Embaſſador to reſide at your Port, and to negotiate in our name, and in the behalfe of our ſubiects abiding within your Kingdomes. Of whoſe fidelitie and diſcretion as we are well aſſured ſo we doubt not but he will giue you good content in his demeanor and negotiation with you. Wee haue alſo thought fit to put you in minde of thoſe common Rouers vpon the ſeas, who are enemies to the Lawes of Nations, and ſpoilers of the quiet & peaceable Merchant, by whom amitie and friendſhip is maintained betweene Kings and Princes: That you H would pleaſe to exerciſe your great and mighty power to chaſtiſe and deſtroy them, as Traitors to your honour, and infringers of the ſacred and publique peace. In full aſſurance that you will extend the ſame good reſpect vnto vs, as your royall Anceſtours haue don vnto our moſt renowned predeceſſours, whereby that antient League and commerce may be inuiolably maintained between both our Kingdomes, which on our part we ſhall be very loth to infringe or diſſolue: We doe by theſe our Letters recommend vnto your princely fauour this our ſaid truſty ſeruant and Embaſſadour, to reſide and remaine in your Port, on our behalfe to treat with you in all affaires for the publique weale of our Dominions, and for the general peace of vs both, and our Allyes and friends, as alſo for the ſupport and aid of all our ſubiects which doe liue and trade within your Eſtates and Countries: To whoſe good diſcretion we commend their affaires, and by whoſe induſtry and mediation we conceiue our people may bee relieued in their iuſt and reaſonable demands, I to the perfect maintenance and aſſurance of that mutuall commerce which hath ſo long time beene continued betweene our royall progenitors. And as we haue great cauſe to profeſſe our grateful acknowledgement for many fauors which our former Embaſſadors and all other our ſubiects haue and doe receiue from your Royall hands, ſo in our princely loue we do intreat you to take knowledge of, and to commandredreſſe for diuers oppreſſions and wrongs done vnto ſome of our ſaid ſubiects perſons and goods that liue vnder the aſſurance of your friendſhip with vs; which we haue formerly ſignified to our Reſidents at your Port, but as we verely beleeue, they haue neuer come vnto your eares, which are open to the iuſt complaints of all ſtrangers: whereof we haue now giuen charge to our ſeruant and Embaſſadour to acquaint you with more at large. Vnto whom we deſire you to giue protection and credit in whatſoeuer he ſhall moue or propound, for the eſtabliſhing, confirmation, and inlargement in all occaſions, of thoſe liberties and priuiledges which our ſubiects haue antiently enioyed, by the benignitie of your ſelf and of your royall Anceſtors; K and in all other things and occaſions, wherin he hath or ſhall receiue our commands, as if our ſelf did communicate them with you, which wee doubt not ſhall redound vnto the great vtilitie and honor of both our Empires. And ſo we wiſh you health and true felicitie.

Articles propounded by the Embaſſador to the grand Signior.

F*Irſt, his ſacred Maieſtie of great Brittaine, according to the moſt noble and renowned League of Amitie betweene your Maieſties, and your Crownes and Dominions, hath commaunded mee to renew the antient Capitulations and Priuiledges granted by your Imperiall Maieſtie and your royall Anceſtours, and therein to mooue your Maieſtie, That you will be pleaſed to inlarge and extend your fauour vnto our Nation that liue vnder your protection, and to giue remedie to diuers iniuries done vnto them by the Cuſtomers of this royall Port, Aleppo, Smyrna, Scio, Patras, and other places, contrary to the iuſtice and honour of your Maieſtie: And to giue order for ſeuerall commaunds in theſe places, in all* M our iuſt occaſions; that both the fame of your iuſtice may bee renowned, and the friendſhip of your Maieſties confirmed, and the correſpondence and commerce betweene your Dominions eſtabliſhed and increaſed.

Secondly, His Maieſtie hath commaunded me to offer himſelfe as a Mediatour of peace, to accommodate

A commodate the late breach with the kingdom of Poland: the King of Poland hauing ſent his Embaſſador expreſſe into England to deſire his aid, he hath thought it more agreeable to his honor, and to the antient league of friendſhip, to vſe his credit with your Maieſtie, to procure the generall quiet and peace of the princes of Chriſtendom; deſiring your Maieſty to conſider his intereſt in the publique cauſe, and not to deſpiſe the forces of ſo many as may partake in the quarrell: which if your Maieſty ſhal hearken vnto the rather for his ſake, as your royall Anceſtor hath done in the like occaſion, his Maieſty will accept it as a reſpect of your loue, which will aſſure and increaſe the commerce and friendſhip of your Dominions; in which his Maieſtie hath giuen me more particular and full Inſtructions to treat and mediate in this buſineſſe.

III. Thirdly, his Maieſtie hath commanded me to moue your Imperiall Maieſty for the releaſe of diuers of B the Poliſh Nobilitie, now your captiues; and for one Scottiſh gentleman, a ſubiect of his Maieſty my royall Maſter.

IV. Fourthly, his Maieſtie deſires that you will take ſome order with the pyrats of Tunes and Algiers who ſhelter themſelues vnder your royall protection (to the great diſhonour of your Maieſtie) and doe many robberies vpon the ſubiects of Kings and princes in amitie and league with your Empire, and take euen the ſhips ſent vnto your royall Port. Admoniſhing your Maieſtie to conſider, that if they be ſuffered to continue, they will occaſion the diſſolution of all commerce and trade; being common enemies to all honeſt Merchants, by whom the friendſhip of theſe kingdoms are maintained and increaſed. And that if your Imperiall Maieſtie pleaſe not to exerciſe your Royall power and authoritie to bridle or deſtroy them; that then you will not take it in ill part, that his Maieſtie with other Princes his Allyes, ſhall make an army to C puniſh both him and all others that receiue and cheriſh them: which hath hitherto bin forborne onely in reſpect of your Maieſtie; and that the towns where they harbor themſelues are or ought to bee vnder your Imperiall command.

V. Fiftly, his Maieſtie hath commanded me to require iuſtice and reſtitution of a great ſum of money taken from Arthur Garaway, here impriſoned by force and iniurie in the time of Achmet Baſſa: wherof his Maieſties former Embaſſadors haue complained to Sultan Achmat your Maieſties renowned father, and to Mehemet Baſſa Vizier, to Huſſen Baſſa, to the Hoja of the King, and to the Mufti; wherin your Maieſties moſt noble father gaue commaund for our ſatisfaction. All the ſaid great Officers hauing heard the cauſe, vpon examination giuing their teſtimonies, of the great wrong don vnto him: Mehemet Baſſa alſo writing a letter, by the order of your Maieſties royall father, promiſing iuſtice and reſtitution: D which his Maieſtie doth yet expect, and again demand. And hauing ſo often written in this cauſe, his Maieſtie will not beleeue, but that in iuſtice and honor this royall court would do right; imputing the fault to his own Miniſters and Embaſſadors, that they neuer complained to your Imperiall Maieſty, according to his Highneſſe command. Alſo his Maieſtie hath commaunded mee to require and deſire your Maieſtie to giue me your Royall anſwer in all theſe particulars, by your letters in writing, as ſhall be fit for your own honor, and conformable to the antient league of amitie and friendſhip between your Royall Maieſties.

His Maieſties Embaſſador not many daies after ſent to the Vizier, who had promiſed him an anſwer vnto theſe articles: Who returned him this that followeth.

The grand Signiors anſwer.

E To the firſt he ſaid, That the Emperor his Maſter had giuen him order to renew the Capitulations, and to make any ſuch additions as ſhould be requiſit, agreeable to their law, & conformable to their antient league; and that therin the Embaſſador ſhould finde no difficultie: for they honored his Maieſtie, and were reſolued to giue him aſſurance of their will to maintain a true friendſhip; and therfore deſired the Embaſſador to draw and prepare the Capitulations, and ſend them to him and the Chancellor, who would conſider them, and being ſuch as were fit to be granted, he ſhould haue ſpeedy order.

To the ſecond the Vizier anſwered with great ſubtiley; Firſt, iuſtifying the occaſion of the war, and imputing the fault to the Coſſackes, maintained by the Pole to rob euen at the port of Conſtantinople: therfore that the Emperor could not in honor but chaſten and deſtroy F them, hauing firſt by meſſage demanded iuſtice againſt them; and now his Maſter beeing ingaged with great charge, and in his honor, he could make no peace with them who had beguiled him: pretending that they had no other intention but the war, becauſe hauing raiſed his Camp, and diſſolued his Army, the Polacks now ſcorned him, and kept no faith, neither ſending Embaſſadour nor meſſenger, no not any letter ſince their returne. That therefore they could

G could not hearken to any condition: and that his Maieſtie of great Brittain did not value the grand Signiors honor in this motion.

To the third he replied, That the motion for the priſoners was vnſeaſonable, becauſe in order it ſhould follow the general treaty and making peace; which if finiſhed, his Maieſtie of great Brittain ſhould finde, that for his ſake all thoſe mentioned in the Memorial ſhould be free, except only the prince Coresky, who had bin the cauſe of many troubles, and had made eſcape from priſon formerly.

To the fourth he made proteſtation in the grand Signiors name againſt the pirats, offring that his Maieſties Embaſſador ſhould haue what commands, what meſſage he would deſire, in company of any Engliſhman.

H To the fifth hee replied, That it was an old obſolete quarrell, and that the Embaſſador did him iniurie to preſſe him, when in the time of three former Viziers his predeceſſors could obtaine no reliefe. Therefore he would not looke backe vpon the actions of other men, nor rake among the bones of the dead; but he deſired the Embaſſador ſhould reſt ſatisfied, That while he had the honor to gouerne, there ſhould no wrong be done vnto the Engliſh Nation, and that he would heare all complaints, ſo as no man ſhould need to looke backe vpon his actions.

This perfunctory anſwer did not much ſatisfie his Maieſties Embaſſador, but that hee deſired ſome other of effect, being loth to accept of generalities; and therfore required a direct reply for his own diſcharge. Which was promiſed after much preſſing, by the Viſier who had firſt vndertaken the ſame. I 1622. The long ſtay of the Duke of Sbaraskie (choſen extraordinarie Embaſſadour by the King of Poland, to conſummate the peace between him and the grand Signior) did much trouble the Emperors court, and eſpecially the Viſier, who procured a ceſſation of arms, but that a letter was writ by the King of Poland, which did a little prolong their hopes. In the mean time the Emperor divulged a pretence to viſit Mecha, the tombe of Mahomet his great Prophet; contrary to the counſell and inſtance of all his Viſiers that knew not the ſecret, and euen to the haſard of a generall reuolt; for they were jealous, that vnder colour of that voyage he had ſome other deſigne; and it was feared, the duke would not proceed to follow him at random, nor treat with his Deputies left at the Port. For the Polacks ſeemed in performing and aſſuring the peace, a little too glorious of their good ſucceſſe; and the Nobilitie not ſo obedient to the King as that he could abſolutely command. K Which did both trouble their agents at the Port, and diſcontent the Turkes: ſo that a little motion of the Coſſackes or Tartars at that time (ſpoil being both their liuelyhoods) had kindled new fires, and had diſturbed or quite broken off the treaty.

In the mean ſpace the grand Signior writ his letter to his Maieſty of great Brittaine, in anſwer to his royal letter by his Embaſſador; wherin was contained a ſatisfactorie reply to all the particulars of thoſe fiue articles deliuered to him: & the grand Signior had ſuch demonſtration of great care to giue his Maieſty all content and ſatisfaction, that his letter was preſented to his Embaſſador with ceremonies of honor, requiring that it ſhould bee ſent by an expreſſe meſſenger, and gaue command for a ſafe conduct for that purpoſe. The true tranſlated copy wherof doth immediatly follow. L

Prince Oſman, euer victorious.

The grand Signiors letter to his Maieſty of great Brittain.

To the mightie Prince, renowned amongſt the Maieſties of the Princes of the Law of Ieſus; obeyed of the great Potentates followers of the Meſſia, the onely Director of the important affaires of the Nazaren people; Soueraigne of the limits of power and honour; Lord of aduancement and authoritie the moſt glorious Iames, King of great Brittain, France, and Ireland; to whoſe laſt dayes Wee wiſh all felicitie.

M

This our Imperiall arriuing you ſhall know, That your honourable and famous Embaſſadour Sir Thomas Rowe is with your Royall and acceptable Letter come vnto our happy Port, the refuge of the Princes and Commanders of the world. Wherof the ſincere contents and ſubſtance was, That our antient Capitulations ſhould be renewed, and diuers Articles therein reformed and explained, and ſome

A ſome other inſerted. And whereas certaine Cuſtomers and other officers of our Empire, haue often tranſgreſſed our Royall agreements, and done many violences and iniuries to the Merchants your ſubiects, that for the time to come they may be ſecured from all oppreſſion: and concerning the affaires of the Polacks, that the enmity and war lightly begun betweene vs and them, might be conuerted into peace and friendſhip; and that there ſhould be eſtabliſhed a ſincere league and amity, as in the time of our Anceſtors. And that diuers Noblemen of Poland, and one of your Maieſties Subiects now detained in our captiuity, ſhould be ſet at liberty. Complaining alſo againſt the Inhabitants of Tunes and Algier, That they who haue violated our Imperiall Capitulations, Amity, and League, ought to be duely puniſhed. And laſtly, That whereas one of your ſubiects named Arthur Garraway, from whom vpon a pretenſion there was a great fine taken, and other wrong done vnto his perſon, you deſire that his cauſe may be with iuſtice B reuewed: All which being made knowne vnto vs, with prudent and mature deliberation we haue both duely weighed and perfectly conceiued them. Wherefore by the fauour of the great and proſperous God we do promiſe, that in all theſe matters propounded, we will apply our Imperiall care and diligence: And we haue already giuen our high and expreſſe command, that our antient Capitulations ſhall be renewed and confirmed. And ſuch conditions as are correſpondent to the peace, amity, and league betweene vs, ſhall in due time be granted. And there ſhall be ſent with all expedition, our Royall Edicts to all our (a) Beglerbegs, (b) Beghs (c) Cadees Gouernors, Cuſtomers, Farmors, Superintendents, and Commiſſioners of our Reuenues, that from henceforth none of them ſhall giue any moleſtation to any of your Merchants or other Subiects. And inſomuch as our happy gates are euer open to any, who with ſincerity ſeeke our friendſhip, good will, and fauour; and the table of our liuely Graces is alwaies prepared for all men: C Therefore whenſoeuer on the behalfe of the Polacks, an Embaſſadour ſhall arriue at our high Court, and kiſſe the hemme of our veſture, and repent of their former errors, and preſent vnto vs a good friendſhip and ſincere league, and ſhall deſire our fauour and amity; by the mediation of your Reſident now in our Imperiall Port, all matters ſhall be pacified and ended, and with a pen we will blot out all former differences. And the peace being ſo eſtabliſhed your inſtances and deſires for them ſhall haue gratefull acceptance with vs, and we will giue fit order for the priſoners.

(a) Viceroys.
(b) Preſidents.
(c) Iudges.

To the Beglerbeghs of Tunes and Algiers, and to all other our ſlaues in thoſe parts, we will preſently ſend our expreſſe and high commands, and other orders, that they ſhal neuer hereafter traſgreſſe the tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations, nor commit any iniuſtice, nor do any violence to the Subiects of your Maieſty. And concerning the buſineſſe of the Merchant Arthur Garraway, wherein you haue informed vs, D that there hath beene taken from him by oppreſſion a great eſtate and faculty, in the time of our father Achmat Han of happy memory (the Vizier Achmat Baſſa being then Deputy here) vpon pretence that diuers Muſſulmens goods were found in his hands: which cauſe being now ouerpaſſed many yeares, you require a new hearing and inquiſition. By the grace of the great God it ſhall be reuiewed and examined with all Iuſtice: in the proceſſe and iſſue whereof you ſhall be aſſured to receiue a right and fit anſwer from your Embaſſador now remaining in our Court. And in our time we ſhall neuer permit, that any the leaſt iniury or iniuſtice ſhall be done to any. Giuing you aſſurance on our behalfe, that the foundation and nerues of peace, friendſhip and league betweene vs, are of vs ſtreightly preſerued, continued, and encreaſed: and your amity, correſpondency, and loue, is euer reſpected, eſteemed, and pretious with vs. Therefore in the meane time, while our capitulations are making perfect, and that the full concluſion may be certified vnto you; your Embaſſadour hauing ſolicited vs for an anſwer to the propoſitions made by E you; by an expreſſe Meſſenger, Robert Rowe, this our Imperiall letter is written and ſent vnto you. Which arriuing, we hope that as in times paſt, the antient, perfect, and acceptable courſe of friendſhip, amity, and league, adorned with aboundant ſincerity, reſplendant loue, and benigne correſpondency on your part, hath beene alway obſerued and maintained; ſo it is now alſo requiſite, that you preſerue the ſame affections, with all pure, firme, and conſtant good will, grace, and goodneſſe: or rather that you aduance and encreaſe therein, as we ſhall euer do by all ſincere waies of loyall friendſhip and holy peace, nouriſhing it with our perfect intention and affectionate diligence, neuer admitting any occaſion that may be thereunto preiudiciall.

F Giuen in our Imperiall City of Conſtantinople, the firſt day of the Moneth Gemaziel Achir (or Aprill) in the yeare of the departure of our Prophet Mahomet 1031; that is, Anno Chriſti Dei pari, 1622.

The Grand Signior diſcontented ſince his diſgrace in Poland, as ſoone as he became to G Conſtantinople, meditating reuenge vpon his ſouldiers, and finding that his pretence for Sidon did not reliſh, gaue out that he would paſſe into Aſia to viſit Mecha the tombe of his falſe Prophet; but hauing ſecret intelligence with Delauir Baſſa, he prepared a ſelect army of his followers to be ready in Aſia, to execute his ſecret deſigne.

The Grand Signior deſirous of peace with the Polacke.

To make this voyage the more ſecure in apparance, hee ſeemed content to accept of any treaty with the Polacks, euen to conditions both of diſaduantage and diſhonour, for his eſtates in Hungary, he re-inforced the frontiers with diuers troups; and though he were much troubled at the league betweene the Emperour of Germany and Bethlem Gabor, yet he diſſembled it ſo, as that he would not diſpleaſe the Tranſyluanian, but rather offered new ſuccours, and forbearance of his tribute. From the incurſions of the Coſſackes he hoped to aſſure H himſelfe by the treaty of the Poles; and in occaſion of breach, he had the Tartars ready to requite them; and for more ſecurity, he added to the number of his gallies appointed to keepe the Blacke Sea. The common people and Viſiers of the Port which loued reſt, and knew not the deſigne, were much troubled and diſcontent at this journy; and made many remonſtances to him of the inconuenience and danger, to leaue the ſeat of his Empire to the truſt of a Deputy, in a time when Bethlem Gabor was newly reconciled to the Germane Emperour, and therefore not to be truſted; and the Polackes ſcarcely reconciled to him, and therefore to be miſtruſted. Diuers other reaſons were made to him, many petitions deliuered from the Church-men, Lawyers, and from all Eſtates. But melancholy reuenge had wholly poſſeſſed him, ſo that by no meanes he could be perſuaded to deſiſt. The ſouldierie paſſed I ſo far as to threaten publiquely, and to proteſt they would not follow, but rather ſet vp another King in his abſence, that ſhould ſtay among them. In concluſion, carried by his owne fate to deſtruction, hauing firſt commanded away his Armado to the Leuant, and thereby diſpoſed many of his ſouldiers, vpon Wedneſday the ſeuenth of May, he began to paſſe ouer his tents and Pauilions to Aſia ſide, with great quantities of treaſure. The Ianizaries and Spahies, who had alſo ſecret intelligence vpon the King; his owne words and actions betraying ſome further project than a Pilgrimage (for he made preparations to carry away all his jewels and treaſure euen defacing his palace, and taking from Churches, and his Ward-robes whatſoeuer could be conuerted to Bullion) ſuddenly met at the Hippodrome in the city, vpon a word giuen; and from thence ranne to the Seraglio in tumult, but without armes, and K there according to their barbarous mutinies, cryed out for their King (hauing firſt taken order to ſtop the paſſage of any thing vpon the water.) Who appearing to them, asked, What this inſolency meant, and what they pretended? They then, by the mouth of a multitude (for they had no head but that of the monſter) demanded firſt, That he ſhould not proceed in his purpoſe to go to Mecha, nor into Aſia; but that he would abide in the city. Secondly, they required to haue deliuered to their fury, the great Viſier Delauir Baſſa, the Hoja or Confeſſor of the King, the Caſlariaga, Gouernour of the women, the Deſtardar or Treaſurer, the Cadeleſchar or chiefe Iuſtice, and ſome others, as enemies to the State, and conſenting to this voyage, which they pretended would be the ruine of the Empire. The firſt, after a little diſpute, the King granted vnto them, promiſing to giue ouer his journey; but they not content, L exacted it in writing. To the ſecond he replied, That it was diſhonour to him to haue his ſeruants torne from him without order of Iuſtice: but perſuaded them to haue patience, to ſtay vntill Saturday, the next Diuan or publique Councell, where they ſhould appeare, and if they were found culpable, they ſhould receiue puniſhment; not meaning to performe any of this, but to get time and allay their preſent fury. Theſe fellowes not content with this moderate anſwer, vndertooke to know that theſe officers were guilty, and therefore that they needed no other witneſſe, tryall, nor judge, but themſelues; and with extreame clamor called to haue them rendered. But the King refuſing to giue them any other ſatisfaction, and they vnprepared for force, returned into the city, which now was all in feare, euery houſe and ſhop ſhut vp, expecting a generall ſacke. But they followed the way of their owne hatred, and firſt M went into the houſe of the Hoja, which they brake and pillaged: But not finding him, they proceeded to the great Viſiers, who made ſome defence, and they (being vnarmed) beat them off; and ſo they ſeparated, being now euening, but yet kept a guard in ſome parts of the town.

That night the King made an attempt to ſend ouer to Aſia ſide, but was preuented; and to fortifie

A fortifie and defend the Seraglio,which was ſtrongly walled about,and had alway in it of houſhold ſeruants about three thouſand : but it ſeemed no man would arme in his cauſe : for the next morning the Mutiniers aſſembled againe,and taking their arms, went firſt to the Muſti, or Arch-prieſt among them, and inforced him and diuers others to accompany them to the Court, where they anew demanded thoſe officers, but with more inſtance and fury. In the meane time the Hoja, Cadaleſchar,and Teſterdar fled,and were not in long time diſcouered. The Viſier retired to the King, and perſuaded him earneſtly to go ouer in perſon in his owne boats (which from his garden he might eaſily doe) to Aſia, and there to take horſe, and hee would ſecure him from all perill; but the King would not moue, bidding him ſtay,confident and aſſured that he would puniſh theſe Rebels.

The Ianizaries mutiny againſt the Grand Signior.

B The wiſe old man ſeeing this conſtancy or obſtinacy, deſired leaue to ſhift for himſelfe, which he tooke or obtained, and ſo got away to the hermitage of a Saint renowmed amongſt them; who (like himſelfe) betraied him,yet did him the fauour as not to deliuer him to the multitude,but perſuaded and carried him backe to the Kings houſe. At this time it was diſputed in the Seraglio about the deliuery of thoſe officers;the Emperour refuſing,the Rebels clamouring and threatening;inſomuch as he began to feare they would breake in,and in their rage do worſe than was yet pretended. Whereupon (whether by the Kings order, or by his owne conſent,willing to be the peace offering)the braue Viſier went out to them, and with a good aſſuredneſſe demanded what they ſought of him,and wherein he had offended. At firſt they were amaſed; but one inſolent villaine breaking the generall modeſty, they anſwered C him with their ſwords,and ſuddenly cut him in peeces.

The great Viſier ſlaine by the Ianizaries.

The Emperour ſeeing their fury ſo outragious,had now more cauſe to doubt, and retired himſelfe, then too late, when he had loſt his faithfull Counſellor; and would haue fled into Aſia, but could not, yet he conueyed himſelfe into a priuate place prepared by his Boſtangi Baſſa, or chiefe Gardener. The Rebels continued without in their madneſſe, asking for the King,and for more ſacrifices. But the ſeruants proteſting they knew not where he was, they ſaid they muſt haue a King, and if he would not appeare, they would make another : and hauing a while attended,they reſolued to enter the Palace(but firſt tooke a generall oath not to ſacke the Imperiall Throne,which they called their Houſe and their Honour) and there ſeeking for the King,not able to finde him,they extorted by confeſſion the Caſſariaga, and ſlew D him; and then they demanded for Muſtapha,vncle to Oſman, by him formerly depoſed, a man eſteemed rather holy(that is,franticke) than wiſe,and indeed fitter for a Cell than a Scepter. The King the firſt day of this tumult had put Muſtapha into a vault with two Negro women, without bread or drinke;in which eſtate theſe new electors found him,almoſt naked,and halfe pined. At firſt ſight he thought they had beene the meſſengers of death: but that feare paſſed ouer,and his firſt requeſt was a cup of water. Whom they tooke vp,and inſtantly proclaimed him their Emperour; which he was loth to accept, in a manner aſhamed to be raiſed to that dignity. How vnſtable are the eſtates of the greateſt Princes! for he that was but euen now in the jawes of death, naked, ſtarued, and dying for thirſt, is become a great Monarch, may drinke gold,or the bloud of innocents.

The Ianizaries demand Muſtapha.

E The ſouldiers as yet not knowing what was become of Oſman,and loth to truſt Muſtapha in the palace, carried him in triumph to the old Seraglio, and there left him; departing to the ſacke of the Viſiers houſe, and ſo in the euening to their Rendeuous, where they kept both good guard and good order in the city, from fires and other inſolencies. Sultan Oſman amaſed with theſe newes, ſo ſoone as they had left the court, came out, and called to councell in the night Huzein Baſſa late Viſier in the Poliſh war,and the Aga of the Ianizaries,both faithfull to him, and demanded their aduice: firſt hauing ſent to the old Seraglio, to practiſe the women there to ſtrangle Muſtapha; but ſome of them taking his part, a new vprore began in the houſe between that Sex; and the ſoldiers that kept watch hearing the noiſe,entred in and reſcued him, & from thence remoued him to the chambers of the Ianizaries,where they garded him for that night in an ill lodging. F All this while,Oſman conſults what courſe to take. Theſe two his friends,and ſome others,tell him that the caſe was deſperat, and could not be cured but by a deſperat remedy: and therefore they agreed, that the Aga ſhould go and perſuade with the Muſti; and that the King in the morning ſhould ſuddenly preſent himſelfe to the ſoldiers at their owne dore, and make experience what his preſence, his ſubmiſſion, and his beneuolence promiſed, could worke, to moue them to loyalty or compaſſion. Which counſell early in the morning they put in practiſe. The King accompanied with the Mufti (who neuer conſented to his depoſing, though he fauoured the ſouldiers againſt the Viſier) with Huzein Baſſa, and about twelue horſmen, went directly to the Ianizaries Colledge, where Muſtapha was kept, and there in teares made them an oration; offering great recompence, repenting of his errour, and finally inuoked them by the merits of his father and all his Anceſtors, to haue ſome pity vpon their true Maſter. The multitude (tam prona in miſericordiam quam immodica ſæuitia fuerat; ſometime as prone to pitty as they were before to hatred) now knew not what to do; a ſilent murmure ran among them, and they were halfe conuerted: but the Aga of the Ianizaries thinking to merit of the King, and beginning to plead vnſeaſonably for him, with ſome harſh words of vpbraidure (vt natura maris omni flatu venti turbida; as the nature of the ſea is to ſwell with euery blaſt of winde) anew moued their fury, ſo that they cried out Treaſon, and fell vpon him and Huzein Baſſa and cut them into peeces, euery man taking a part of their fleſh to ſatiate their reuenge. The Mufti would ſpeake, but was withdrawne by ſome, for reſpect to his place, and with difficulty conueied away. Now the poore Oſman ſaw his friends ſlaine, and knew not which way to conuert himſelfe, but binding vp his eies with a napkin, expected death as the laſt of their fury. But they carried him firſt before Muſtapha, and accuſed him as the diſturber of the peace of the Empire, and demanded ſentence againſt him (More vulgi ſuum quiſque flagitium alijs obiectans.) The forſaken Prince pleaded for life, and the new King knew not how to condemne, but nodded and agreed to all that was propounded. At laſt they conſulted with themſelues, and put him vpon an horſe (an inſolent Spahy changing turbants with him) and ſent him away priſoner to the ſeuen towers, vnder good gard (in his paſſage begging a draught of water at a fountaine) and then returned to their new maſter, and placed him in the Seraglio and Imperiall Throne; where he had need to haue good broaths and nouriſhment to reſtore his decayed body.

Daout Baſſa ſtrangleth Sultan Oſman in priſon.

The ſouldiers now thought all was done, and (only ſacking the houſes of Huzein Baſſa and ſome others their conceiued enemies) returned in quiet to their ſeuerall lodgings, and had no further malice. But the new Viſier Daout Baſſa, made by Muſtapha, knew well, if Oſman liued, that this ſtorme might paſſe ouer, and he would as eaſily, and by the ſame means returne to his eſtate, as he fell from it (vulgus vt mos eſt cuiuſque noui motus cupidum:) Therefore he conſulted with ſome few intereſſed in Muſtapha's preferment, and thereby obnoxius to Oſman, to ſearch how many of the Royall bloud were left aliue, and reſolued if there remained two, to make an end of Oſman. Two of his brothers were found, the one about thirteene, the other about nine yeares of age: and thereupon the Viſier went himſelfe to the priſon with a packe of hangmen, and gaue order to ſtrangle the vnfortunate Prince: who now hauing had no reſt in two nights, and thinking himſelfe ſecure for a ſeaſon, was newly falne aſleep: but awaked by the comming of theſe meſſengers, asked, What newes? and blaming their ſudden intruſion, they at firſt ſtood amazed, and the King made ſhew to defend himſelfe; but a ſtrong knaue ſtrooke him on the head with the battle-axe, and the reſt leaping vpon him, ſtrangled him with much ado. Thus one of the greateſt Monarchs in the World was firſt affronted by mutined troups, his owne ſlaues, almoſt vnarmed, and few in number, no man taking vp a ſword to defend him: and they who began this madneſſe, not meaning to hurt him, by the increaſe of their owne fury, which had no bounds, depoſed him againſt their owne purpoſe, and at laſt expoſed his life, againſt their will, to the counſels of other men whom they equally hated. And now they mourned for their dead King as freſhly, as they raged vnreaſonably; knowing they had ſtained their honour, being the firſt of their Emperors they euer betraied, and that they had ſet vp another that in all likelihood they muſt change for diſability. Nunquam tulit documenta ſors majora quam fragili loco ſtarent ſuperbi.

This was the laſt act of the life of Sultan Oſman; but his intents and great deſignes, which drew vpon him this fatall blow, will not be vnworthy the communication: the practiſes, reaſons, ſecrets, and counſels, of all actions, being the ſoule of Hiſtory, and res geſta but the bare carkaſſe: and, as many ages haue not produced ſo ſtrange an example of the incertainty of humane greatneſſe, ſo in the diſpoſition thereof, and in the waies leading thereunto, there was

A ſeene euidently the wonderful prouidence of God, in confounding the counſels of the worldly wiſe, who had laid a foundation of new greatnes, wherby this Prince aſpired the vniuerſall Monarchy. And the world may ſee vpon how weake foundations this Monarchy was at firſt builded, how eaſily it was now ſhaken & corrupted; how their Kings are ſubject to the rage of a few ſlaues, how Anarchy hath prepared in as eaſie prey to any able hand that would attempt it. From the inuaſion of Poland all theſe changes tooke their beginning. Sultan Oſman aduanced to the throne in his youth, full of heat and bloud, being of a great and haughty ſpirit, very couragious, ſtrong of body, and a mortall hater of Chriſtians, enuious of the glory of his anceſtors, and ambitious to raiſe his name aboue any of theirs, had projected in himſelfe the conqueſt of the remaines of the bordering Europe. But to ſo great deſignes, B he had one vice that reſiſted all hope of proſperity, which was extreme auarice; vnnaturall to youth, and a ſymptome of the decrepit age of Monarchy: Vbi vires luxu corrumpebantur, contra veterem diſciplinam & inſtituta majorum apud quos virtute quàm pecunia res militaris melius ſtetit. His firſt enterpriſe was that of Poland, moued by the incurſions of the Coſſackes; which then he vndertooke of his owne head, without the counſell of any of his Viſiers (who in a tyranny grown to a height by eaſe, and wealth, are euer corrupt and lazie) and againſt the liking of all the ſouldiers, who (contrary to their inſtitution, being married and fathers of families, entered into trades, receiuing nothing in war more than in peace, beſides danger and trauell) are not eaſily drawne from their owne chimnies. This action he thought ſo eaſie, as he had diſpoſed of his conqueſt, and diuided the liue lyons skinne. But being met vpon the C borders with a poore army in compariſon, he was firſt arreſted at Chotyn, a little fortreſſe, which hee was faine to leaue behinde him vntaken; and then ſeeking to aduance into the plaine country, by forcing the trenches of the Chancellor of Poland oppoſed againſt him, he could neuer procure his Ianizaries to fight, though ingaging his perſon once or twice beyond the regard of his quality, and his owne troupes ready to mutine againſt him, or to forſake him; hee was at laſt enforced ſhamefully to raiſe his campe, and to accept of any treaty to ſaue his outward honour. In this attempt hee loſt aboue a hundred thouſand horſes for want of fodder, and eighty thouſand men for want of fighting: for they would rather die running, or pillaging, or eating, than in the face of the enemy. For this diſgrace he conceiued ſo inward, and rooted an indignation againſt the Ianizaries, and ſo juſtly, that he often lamented D himſelfe, and complained, that he was no King that was ſubject to his own ſlaues, vpon whom he ſpent great treaſures, and yet they would neither fight in war, nor obey in peace, without exacting new bounties and priuiledges. Delauir Baſſa, a man of great wit and courage, lately called from the Eaſterne parts, where he had long gouerned with honor, who came in though late, yet in a very braue and warlike equipage, aboue all other his captains, was ſuddenly made great Viſier, the former Huzein Baſſa being in the ſame diſgrace common with the ſouldier, though not in the ſame fault. This man was neuer bred at Court, but had liued many yeares in action, and ſo had neither faction nor dependance at the Port, but ſtood vpon himſelfe and his owne merit: and being now vnexpectedly aduanced to this high dignity, he wrought vpon the Kings diſcontent, and nouriſhed it: and in concluſion brake with him, That it was E true he was no Emperor, nor could be ſafely aliue, while the Ianizaries had the power which they lately vſurped. Informing him, That they were corrupted from their antient inſtitution, and were lazie cowards, giuen ouer to eaſe and luſt: Et animi per libidines corrupti nihil honeſtum remanet. But if his Majeſty would pull vp his ſpirits, and follow his aduice, hee would prouide him a new ſoldiery about Damaſcus, of the Coords, men euer bred in the frontier, with hardneſſe and warre, of great courage and experience; and that of them he ſhould erect a new Militia, that ſhould wholly depend of him, entertaining forty thouſand in pay, which ſhould alway be his guard: and that in the diſtribution of euery Prouince, he ſhould conſtitute that the Begler-begh in his gouernment ſhould traine ſome of the inhabitants, who in all occaſions of making a great army, ſhould be in readineſſe, and thereby he ſhould ſpare F infinite treaſures ſpent vpon theſe drones that eate vp his eſtate; and with men of new ſpirits and hopes, he ſhould be enabled to do greater matters than any of his anceſtors: but withall he deſired the King to communicate this counſell to no man; nor to truſt his life vpon anothers ſecrecy. Delauir Baſſa neuer reuealing himſelfe to any but the King, who extremely pleaſed

The Grand Signior his deſigne to conquer Europe.

pleaſed with this aduice, that flattered his owne humour, conſented, and remitted all to the G Viſiers direction, who was a true ſouldier, and a very wiſe man, able by his credit in Aſia, to performe all he had vndertaken: for he was exceedingly beloued in thoſe parts, very rich, and had kept Damaſcus, whereof he was Gouernour, for himſelfe in a late rebellion. Vpon this concluſion betweene them, it was firſt agreed, That the King ſhould pretend to go in perſon either to viſit Mecha, or againſt the Emir de Sidon, who was moued to take armes really to aſſiſt in the deſigne; but they vſed it to colour the departure of the Emperour: which when it was well weighed, was found, that then the army of the Ianizaries muſt be kept together, which could not agree with their ends. Hereupon the journey of the pilgrimage was divulged, That the King might vnder the ſhadow of an holy deuotion goe out with a ſmall traine, and diſperſe thoſe who were ſuſpected to him. And for this, preparation was made, H but ſomewhat too groſſely, by melting of all the Plate, Saddles, furniture of houſe, Lampes of Churches, and whatſoeuer could more eaſily be conueied away in mettall, with all the jewels and treaſury. This gaue the firſt ſuſpition, which was confirmed by diuers vnaduiſed words let fall from the King; of diſdaine againſt the cowardiſe of the Ianizaries, and that he would ſhortly finde himſelfe ſouldiers that ſhould whip them: and laſtly, diſmiſſing all his houſehold, except ſome few ſelect; the diſcontented ſort obſerued this and betraied him.
Delauir Baſſa kept his own ſecret, and in the mean time prepared by his friends in Aſia twenty thouſand men; about Damaſcus ten thouſand, from the Coords as many, beſides thoſe in readineſſe of the Emir de Sidon; and all vpon pretence of defending the borders of Perſia, who might take ſome aduantage of the changes in thoſe parts: and gaue order, That all theſe I ſhould meet the King at Damaſcus, where hee would preſently cut off his guard and ſtay there, vntill he had regulated his new army and diſcipline, and then to returne triumphant to Conſtantinople, and vtterly root out the order of Ianizaries, Spahies, and Timariots, and to exauctorate all their captaines and officers, to ſettle a new Gouernment, and to change the name of the city. And theſe things ſucceeding, hee then reſolued with his new ſouldiers to attempt the recouery of his honour in Chriſtendome; in the meane time to hold a diſſembled friendſhip there in all parts. Certainely, this was a braue and well grounded deſigne, and of great conſequence for renewing of that decaied Empire, languiſhing vnder the inſolencies of lazie ſlaues, if God had not deſtroied it: it being very true, That the Turkiſh Emperour ſtands at the deuotion of his owne troupes for peace, or war, life, or death, and is in effect K nothing but the Steward or Treaſurer of the Ianizaries. If this project had taken effect, what euents it might haue produced by a ciuill war, is not eaſie to judge. For doubtleſſe the ſouldiory would haue ſet vp another King, and maintained him as well as they could; and the Europeian part had beene in danger to haue beene torne away by the diuiſion. Beſides, Delauir Baſſa hauing the King and the treaſury in his poſſeſſion, and his owne credit ſo great, and his inclination velle imperare, ſo willing to beare rule, once diſcouered, it might well be thought that hee had ſome ends of his owne to ſhare a part of this mighty eſtate: if on the other ſide the Viſier had proued true and faithfull, the reformation and new erection of the diſcipline of war, and the encreaſe of treaſure conſequent to the diſmiſſion of the old Militia, would haue beene fearefull to all Chriſtendome; but Vbi eſt ſapiens? vbi diſquiſitor ſeculi hujus? L Perdam ſapientiam ſapientum, & vanam reddam intelligentiam intelligentium. It is a great queſtion whether then were the wiſer wiſh, That theſe counſels had ſucceeded, or not: for either diuiſion or ſubuerſion, or a new proſperity and enlargement of their dominion had neceſſarily followed.

Obſeruations vpon Sultan Oſman.

Some obſeruations vpon this occaſion, will not bee impertinent, to thoſe that deſire to know as well the diſpoſition and vſe, as the things themſelues. Firſt in the purpoſe of the ſouldier, not at all to violate or hurt the King, much leſſe to depoſe and murder him; but only to take away thoſe about him whom they thought aſſiſtants in this project: yet the fury once on foot, they proceeded by inſenſible ſteps, to the vttermoſt of outrage, againſt many innocents in that buſineſſe (though otherwiſe obnoxious) and againſt the throne and life of M their owne Emperour, Vbi furor ingruat, innocentes ac noxios juxta cadère; where rage and fury hath got the vpper hand, there the innocent and nocent fare alike. Secondly, in the degrees; that yet the King had not fallen thus low, if firſt he had not loſt that awe and reuerence which alway

A alway attendeth vpon Majeſty, if it be kept vp; by vnſeemly offices done by him in the ſtreets and Tauernes, apprehending many ſoldiers for petty faults; like a Conſtable, making his perſon common, cheape, and deſpiſed amongſt them; which was wont only to be ſeene and feared, as ſomewhat aboue humane greatneſſe. And this he did alſo in hatred and diſdaine of thoſe that had in the warre forſaken him. And now in this laſt act, if his owne obſtinacy had not plunged him into deſtruction, but that he had ſoftened them by a reaſonable yeelding to time, he had preuailed onely by time. Thirdly in the order, that theſe mutiniers hauing no head or direction, kept that reglement, that they tooke oath in their fury, in hot bloud, in the Kings yard, not to diſhonour, ſpoile, nor ſacke the Imperiall Throne; neither committed nor ſuffered any inſolence nor violence in the city to the Neutrals, but rather proclaimed peace
B and iuſtice. Fourthly in the conſequents, that at the third daies end all was quiet, and all men in their trade, as if no ſuch thing had hapned; only the Ianizaries ſuffered no Diuan nor Councell vntill they had receiued a Donatiue as guerdon of their iniquity. In which alſo the infinite waſte of treaſure is worthy your conſideration, which was exceedingly exhauſted by three changes in foure yeares, and by the late warres in Perſia and Poland; for euery Ianizary, abſent or preſent (whoſe rolle was about forty thouſand) receiued twenty fiue Checquines of gold; beſides the Spahies, Iamoglans, and other Orders, at euery alteration: which amounts in all neer to two millions. And now thoſe fellows that had taſted the ſweet of proſperous mutinies (haud ignari ſumma ſcalera incipi cum periculo peragi cum præmio) tooke ſuch a head as could not ſafely be ſuffered on, nor ſecurely be taken off. Fifthly, of certaine preſages C that fore ran: for Oſman dreamed in the night, That he rid a Camell, and being mounted, he could not force him to goe by faire meanes nor ſtripes: and that then diſcending in a rage to reuenge it with his ſword, the body of the beaſt vaniſhed, and left the bridle and head in the Kings hand. Who next day troubled at this fancy, ſent to a learned man familiar with him, for the interpretation. He excuſed himſelfe, as vnfit to giue opinion in a matter of that conſequence, but perſuaded Oſman to enquire of the Mufti. He alſo craued pardon; but withall ſaid, there was none ſo fit to interpret it as Muſtapha the Kings vncle, who was eſteemed a holy man, that had viſions and Angel-like ſpeculations (in plaine tearmes, betweene a mad man and a foole.) The King repaired to Muſtapha, who briefely told him, The Camell ſignified his Empire: his riding, abuſe in gouernment: his deſcention or alighting, his depoſing: the vaniſhing of his Body, the reuolt of D his Subjects: the Head remaining in his hand, only a bare title; and that he ſhould ſhortly die within a few moneths, and loſe his kingdome, onely the empty name of Emperour ſhould accompany him to his graue. A ſecond of leſſe conſequence in the Viſier Delauir Baſſa; with whom his Majeſties Embaſſadour hauing contracted particular friendſhip, about ſix daies before this vprore, he went to viſit; and hauing no other buſineſſe but to perſuade him to ſtay the King from this intended pilgrimage, the Embaſſadour gaue him many reaſons in the preſent eſtate of their owne affaires; eſpecially, the Treaty of Poland yet depending. To which the Baſſa replied very grauely. Then the Embaſſadour vrged the feare of ſome tumult, collected from the licentious ſpeeches rumoured in the towne: And he was bold to deale plainely, ſincerely, and friendly, That if any ſuch thing ſhould happen, the fault would be imputed to the Baſſa, as E being of authority to perſuade the King; whom his quality and youth would excuſe, but all the fury would be diſcharged vpon the greateſt Miniſter: deſiring him to conſider the euent, at leaſt to take his affection in the beſt part.

The Engliſh Embaſſadors aduice to Delauir Baſſa.

The Baſſaes reply.

The old Reinard ſtaied a while from reply: at laſt, ſmiling to himſelfe, that he ſhould be perſuaded againſt that which was his owne counſell, he gaue a finall anſwer, That there was no remedy, he durſt not hazard himſelfe to oppoſe the Kings reſolution: but aſſured him he would ſo order the matter, as this iourney ſhould not proceed ſo farre as was expected. The Embaſſadour concluded for himſelfe, deſiring then that he would leaue him a particular recommendation to the Chimacham or Deputy as his friend. To which he ſuddenly replied, Trouble not your ſelfe, nor feare; I will neuer remoue ſo farre but that I will leaue one of my legges in F this city to ſerue you. Which the poore man fulfilled; for being murthered within few daies after, one of his legs whole and entire was hanged in the Hippodrome, the moſt publike place of the city.

The reading of Hiſtory, to know what is done and paſt, hauing in it no recompence but delight, vnleſſe it looke foreward to vſe and action, either to correct errours, or by that light to gather aduantage in future, it will not be an vnprofitable degreſſion to obſerue what was like to ſucceed theſe monſtrous alterations. It was feared, by contemplatiue men, that the ſouldiers in Aſia, who had loſt their hope, would not ſit downe with this afront, but rather attempt ſome reuenge for the death of the King, who was their martyr: or that ſome great Baſſa, farre remoued from Court, might apprehend this occaſion, not to obey an vſurper, ſet vp by treaſon; and vnder that colour to hide his owne ambition: or laſtly, that the whole State would fall into combuſtion, and inteſtine warre. This they themſelues foreſaw, and it came to paſſe, as will appeare in the ſtory; for within few moneths Abaſſa Baſſa of Arzirum declared himſelfe reuenger of his Princes bloud, and troubled, and almoſt hazarded the whole Empire. The Perſian apprehended the opportunity, and recouered the Prouince and City of Babylon: and the ſame ſoldiers that had betraied their Prince, were neuer quiet vntill they had made ſome ſatisfaction, by reſtoring his brother and right heire: only it pleaſed not God to open the eies of Chriſtian Princes to ſee the inconuenience of their owne vnciuill quarrels, while the diſtractions of this mighty Empire did inuite to conquer it, and to diuide it as a proſtituted prey.

A practiſe to murther the brethren of Sultan Oſman.

On Saturday euening the firſt of Iune following, the Capi-Aga or Major Domo of the Seraglio, hauing receiued a ſecret order to remoue the brethren of Oſman from their lodgings, and in the night to ſtrangle them; as he was performing his command, aided with a few of his carnifices to carry away the Princes, they cryed out: the Pages running to the noiſe, and incouraged by the Caſlariaga, who had ſome ſuſpition, without further examination killed the Capi-Aga, now almoſt euery Order hauing riſen againſt his owne head. That night they ſent ſecretly to the Ianizaries and Spahies, to enforme them what they had done; and in the morning early hanged his body in the Hippodrome for a publike ſpectacle. The ſouldiers returned in fury to the Court, in fauour of the Pages, and demanded juſtice againſt thoſe that had conſented to this wicked order, which had made an end of all the Ottoman race; only this Muſtapha being left aliue, who was ſo holy a Saint, that he would not people the World with ſinners, nor endure any woman neere him. The innocent King proteſted he knew nothing of this purpoſe: and if ſuch command were procured, it was gotten by ſubreption; and he was eaſily beleeued. But his mother, another Liuia, and the new Viſier, Daout Baſſa, who had her daughter to wife, were vehemently ſuſpected. It was a day of Diuan or Councell; but the ſoldiers would ſuffer none, vntill they had an account of this treaſon. The Viſier denied all; the mother was a woman, and hidden in the houſe: yet it is very likely they both were guilty, to vphold and ſecure their owne authority; it being rumoured, that the Viſier determined to place ſubditiouſly in the roome of the elder Prince his owne ſonne, and very like him, and ſo to gouerne Muſtapha for a time, and by his remoue to eſtabliſh himſelfe and his race for euer. But now ſomewhat muſt be done to appeaſe the people; therefore Daout Baſſa was degraded from his office, and one Huzein Baſſa, newly arriued from the gouernment of Cairo, aduanced to his place, with promiſe of further examination. But the fury once ouer, there was no great ſearch nor diſcouery made, for perhaps the Sultana's Chequines quieted the matter. The new Viſier was a man without friends, yet very rich, of a ſtubborne and obſtinate nature, reported juſt in his waies, but peremptory and vnflexible (Audax ferox, ac prout animum intendit, pravus aut induſtrius eadem vi) one from whom all men might expect much good, or much ill: he began his gouernment roughly, and vndertooke to puniſh inſolencies early, and profeſſed a reformation, or to be a ſacrifice: A man fit for thoſe times that were deſperate: for the worſt was, that he muſt at laſt endure their fury. In the meane time he procured a little awe, and reſtored the face of juſtice: yet it was thought it could not laſt long, the Ghoſt of Oſman would not be at reſt vntill there were ſome parentalia made vnto him. The nature of the Viſier was vnſupportable; but if he preuailed, and were once ſetled, he reſolued anew to change the King, and lay an obligation vpon the brethren of Oſman; for he did neuer thinke himſelfe ſecure vnder a man gouerned by an inſolent woman, dominandi auide, deſirous to rule. And what aſſurance could hee haue in that Prince, in whom there was no judgement, neither loue, nor hatred, but as it was infuſed? and though the particulars could not be foreſeene, nor where the ſore would breake out, yet the whole body was ſicke, their King being mentis inops, an Ideot; and the next in expectation a child vnfit for action, and all the great men and ſoldiers decayed, mutined, and corrupted.

In the mean time the Duke of Sbaraſky came neer vnto the borders of the Turkiſh empire, and ignorant of thoſe great changes which had happened, ſent a ſeruant with a Letter to the dead Viſier Delauir Baſſa, with whom only the Poles had treaty. The contents were, That the King of Poland had ſent him to conclude a peace, vpon ſuch conditions as were agreed vpon by the Viſier and the Commiſſioners of Poland, ſigned on both parts; but that it was reported vpon the death of the grand Signior, That the new Gouernment had varied from ſome of them: That he had no other inſtructions to intreat anew, but if he would giue his word to the Engliſh Embaſſador, that there was no alteration in the intents of peace, he was ready to ſet forward on his journey. This letter receiued by the new Viſier was Greek to him, who was lately come from Cairo, and vnderſtood no article nor piece of the buſineſſe: Which was ſo ſecretly carried by Delauir Baſſa, that Sultan Oſman and he being dead, there was no man had ſo much as a copy, or knew the ſubſtance of that agreement. So that the Viſier giuing good words, aſhamed to confeſſe his ignorance, promiſed all things, but knew not what to write in particular anſwer, and therfore was at a ſtand. The meſſenger neuertheleſſe importuned a diſpatch, the which he had in general terms, and ſo returned again to the Duke his Maſter vpon the confines.

With this Nuntio the Duke wrot to Sr Thomas Rowe, and being very doubtfull to intangle himſelfe in this vnſetled gouernment, deſired him both to counſell him, and to tel the Viſier that he would not aduance, vnleſſe hee might receiue ſuch aſſurance of ſafety and publique faith, as that he might ingage his credit to him: hoping therby to haue both aſſiſtance & witnes in all his proceeding. Which gaue the Viſier occaſion to intreat the Engliſh Embaſſador, both to promiſe for the good vſage of the Duke, and to haſten him, and alſo to informe himſelfe by him, of the ſubſtance of the Treaty of Chotyn. Which being by him vndertaken, it turned to the great aduantage of both, eſpecially of the peace it ſelf.

The 17 of Iune in the morning, the Prince Coreſky one of the Lords of Poland, taken priſoner in the late war, recommended by his Maieſtie of great Britaine, who had formerly made an eſcape from the Turks captiuitie, was ſtrangled in priſon after two years of durance. This put all into murmur and deep conſideration, for what politique end this ſhould be don, euen when they themſelues deſired a peace with the Pole, and yet neuertheleſſe did that which might vtterly breake it. But it ſeemed they were at that time either caried with a brutiſh furie, or that the Prince was betrayed from home, by intimation, that his remuant nature would neuer ſuffer the peace long to continue between the Crowne of Poland and the Grand Signior.

Prince Coreſky ſtrangled in priſon.

The Viſier (who cauſed this Polack prince to be ſtrangled) vpon ſome ſpleene towards the Aga or chief captain of the Ianizaries, took this occaſion to caſt the fault on him, and to caſſier him, and ſent him to the Iſlands to be ſtrangled; & gaue order to murder ſome other Baſſa's and officers, that therby way being made to depoſe the Emperor Muſtapha, to ſet vp Morat the child, and brother of Oſman, many being of his party. Wherupon the ſoldiers roſe all in arms at the Seraglio, taking the alarm at the medling with their Aga, reſcued their Captaine and the reſt, and demanded the head of the Viſier. Wherupon he fled, and order was giuen to kil him where he could firſt be found. The ſoldiers alſo required the life of Morat Aga cuſtomer, and diuers others: but for feare of other complices they durſt ſearch no further into the conſpiracie; only the Viſiers houſe was ſacked and infinit treaſure taken; ſo as the ſoldier was quieted for a day or two, by making a new Viſier, Muſtapha Baſſa, who was of a ſoft nature, and ſcarce durſt do juſtice for fear of offending any man. Now a new faction was made betweene Muſtapha and Morat, and it was expected hourly when there ſhould be ſome great ſlaughter or maſſacre in the city; for of neceſſitie one ſide muſt fall.

The Viſier attempts to depoſe Muſtapha.

There was then no ſecuritie for any man, when the King and Viſiers and all Officers held their liues and dignities at the courteſie of the mutined ſouldier, who had taſted the ſweet of rebellion, and caſt off all awe and reuerence, and could not eaſily be reduced to order, without much bloud and haſard of the whole. Therfore the wiſer men retired from Office and imployment, and the inſufficient did cauſe their owne daily change and ruine. The ſouldier adhered to the King of their own creation, and hee was in effect their creature, for they did wholly gouern him. But the lawyers and church-men made ſecret conuentions, and ſtill practiſed ſome great alteration; and feared not to ſay openly, That the foundation of their State was diſſolued, the king vnlawful, and all that had adhered vnto him lapſed into hereſie, hauing deſpiſed the inſtitutions of Mahomet. They wrought by wiſe counſels, and held a large correſpondencie with thoſe of their own coat, and ſpread their confederacie to all parts of the Empire, to procure a faction, and kindle a greater fire than that of the ſoldiers: for at Bagdat the captain of the Ianizaries roſe and ſlew the Baſſa, burnt the Mufti and all his kin, and gaue his daughter in mariage to one Aſlan Begh, a pretender to the antient inheritance of a bordering prouince, to cantonize that part. All Aſia was in doubt whom to obey, and Cairo was eaten vp with oppreſſion: and that which was moſt dangerous, they had no ſence of the ſicknes in the court, wherby to cure it, nor any of them ſo wiſe as to diſſemble it.

The Prince of Tranſyluania's Embaſſador arriueth at the Port.

The 22 of Auguſt the extraordinary Embaſſador of Bethlem Gabor Prince of Tranſylvania arriued at Conſtantinople; who amongſt other inſtructions had order to excuſe his Maſter, and to declare the reaſons why he had made peace with the Emperor without the knowledge of the Port: which were, That the war had continued three years in the kingdom of Hungarie, and had ſo conſumed and deſolated the country, that it was impoſſible for him to ſtay longer in the field and to maintain an army, for the great famin and ſcarcitie of all things which the ſoldiery ſuffered, and could from no place be ſupplied: ſo that if he had not accepted of peace offered, he had bin forced to quit the country of neceſſitie, and by his ſeeming flight haue left the enemy victor. Therfore he was conſtrained to win time, and to return into Tranſylvania to refreſh his men of war, and to re-inforce them: as alſo his own preſſing affaires calling him back, his brother whom he had left Gouernour in his abſence, hauing aduiſed him, That the king of Poland, by the inſtigation of the emperor, by intelligence with ſome of the principal Lords, did practiſe a reuolt, and promiſed aid to make a new prince that ſhould wholy depend vpon the Empire and Poland. Laſtly, ſeeing the grand Signior had ſuddenly concluded a peace with the Poles, he feared he ſhould be left alone to the burthen of the war, in which the King of Poland being at eaſe might aſſiſt the Emperor, which he was not able to ſuſtain: therfore he was content to take the opportunitie to accept of that at the inſtance of the emperor, which he ſhould haue bin forced to do by neceſſitie.

Yet afterward, although he made this apologie for his maſter for concluding a peace, hee aſſured the Port, that his maſter meant not long to keep the ſame: informing them, That the Emperour had made a league (being at that time quiet in Germany) to inuade the Ottoman Empire; perſuading the Port to grant a Commiſſion, with full power and authoritie to him and the Baſſa of Buda (who had bin twenty years in that charge, and knew all the borders) if they ſaw it fit, to preuent the Enemy, and to inuade the Empire, or the kingdome of Poland. This demand was made by Gabor to inſinuate with the ſtate of Turky, and to get a power dormant into his hands, to aduance into Hungarie if he ſaw aduantage, or to oblige the Emperour; and to aſſure the peace, by hauing means not to care if it were broken. But the grand Signior finding himſelfe, by reaſon of Ciuile diſtractions at home, vnfit for a Warre abroad, and that they ſaw Bethlem Gabor had no other thing in recommendation than his owne deſignes and fortune, his Embaſſadors Propoſitions began to be altogether ſleighted and neglected.

The Poland Embaſſador arriueth at the Port.

The Duke of Sbarasky, who came to conclude the peace betweene his Maſter the King of Poland, and the grand Signior, after long delay vpon the confines did at length arriue at the Port, but they made him ſtay fiue weekes before he could haue audience, forcing him to giue a Preſent, contrary to his Inſtructions. Notwithſtanding he could not get them to enter into a Treaty, finding nothing but falſehood and vncertaintie amongſt them, no promiſe nor faith kept, no priſoners deliuered, nor indeed any thing at all performed: for now that they had him within their liberties, they hoped to worke their owne ends, and to wearie him out, who had twelue hundred of his ordinary traine. They threatened to keepe him, and to denounce a War againſt his Maſter: yet by the mediation of the Engliſh Embaſſadour, the Miniſters of the Port and he were pieced again, and the peace concluded, as ſhall be hereafter ſet down at large.

A After many difficulties to obtaine admiſſion to the preſence of the grand Signior, cauſed by the forwardneſſe of the old Eunuch Georgi Mehemet Baſſa, then in the place of Muſtapha depoſed (who diſcouering that the duke would complain againſt Tomſha Vayuod of Valachia, and his creature, endeauored by al fraud, cunning, threatning, and faſtidious delayes, to diuert him from that purpoſe, being loth that the actions of him whom hee had foſtered and maintained in many tyrannies, eſpecially in the occaſion of the laſt Warre, ſhould be examined or layd open to juſtice) when hee ſaw that nothing could preuail, but that he muſt haſard a direct breach, by the diſcontent of the duke; and that the people began to murmur, and the Engliſh Embaſſador to proteſt him; he was admitted, and nobly receiued according to the pompous cuſtom of that court; who with his letter of Credence ſpake theſe following words:

The Oration of the Duke of Sbarasky to the grand Signior.

Sigiſmund by the grace of God, King of Poland, Sweden, Gothia, Vandalia, great Duke of Lituania; and of many other prouinces Prince and Lord: To your moſt renowned Maieſty, moſt mighty emperor of Aſia and Europ, and King of many kingdoms and prouinces, euer moſt happy, wiſheth health; and by me his great Embaſſador ſalutes you with all conuenient reuerence and honor: deſiring to your Maieſtie C from the moſt high God, fulneſſe of all proſperitie, happineſſe, long life, triumph aboue your Anceſtours, Princes worthy of all memorie.

His high Maieſty of Poland, conſidering the depth and highth of the Decrees of the great God, mar-uelling with all the world, and praiſing his high name, doth comfort and ioy himſelfe, beeing more than certaine, That that Eternall power which hath preſerued your Maieſtie from all euill deſtinies of men, and from the bowels of the earth, and hath placed you in this ſhining Throne, hath not done it but for the publique good. And like a wiſe Gardener, who hath weeded out all venomous and noyſom plants, that he hath placed your Maieſtie in their roome, as a noble and ſweet ſmelling floure, full of vertue, clemencie, and peace, deſired of all the world. His Maieſty my Lord and Soueraigne hath alwaies wiſhed, D That not onely the actions of later yeares, but of many Ages paſt, might haue beene forgotten; and that that friendſhip and peace begun with the renowned Ottoman Kings two hundred and more yeares ſince, might haue beene without interruption continued. But ſeeing that the great God hath beene pleaſed to chaſtiſe the people of both parts, by the meanes of wicked men, that muſt be accepted for good, which commeth from his Diuine will. And therefore blotting out of memory whatſoeuer is paſt, doth now returne to deſire the continuance of the firſt antient peace, and doth offer himſelfe vnto your high Maie-ſtie to keepe it inuiolable, as it was maintained in the time of Sultan Amurath of happy memorie. In witneſſe of which his ſinceritie, he hath not apprehended the opportunitie of the breach begun by the Per-ſian, the expiration of the truce with the German Emperour, nor the many reuolts and troubles in Aſia, nor hearkned to the inſtigations of many Chriſtian Princes his friends and allyes, nor to the Tartar diſcon-E tented: but rather hauing refuſed all other wayes, hath with the bloud of his own ſubiects, and the charge of his purſe, regained from the Rebell Valachia, Moldauia, and a part of Tranſyluania, and rendered thoſe Prouinces into the hands of your Maieſties father, and ſuffered no man at any time to diſturbe on that ſide the friends of your Empire; giuing intelligence like a good friend and neighbour to your An-ceſtours, of all your Enemies deſignes and machinations, and in as much as was poſsible, endeauoured to preſerue a good peace and friendſhip; which he offereth vnto your ſerene Maieſty; contenting himſelfe with the Capitulations which were treated at Chotyn, and thoſe of your moſt happy father and brother; praying your Maieſty that they may be confirmed and maintained. And not doubting but your Maie-ſtie will reſtraine the Tartars, as he will do the Coſſackes, and that you will ſuffer no occaſion of kindling new fires, he beſeecheth your Maieſtie to doe what juſtice you thinke meet, vpon Cantemir and Tomſha, F who contrary to the agreements and publique faith, hath made ſpoile and new incurſions into Poland, euen ſince my departure from thence, and with many deceits and falſe deuices haue deſired to diſturbe the hap-pie beginnings of accommodation. And ſeeing that by the antient Capitulations made with the moſt warlike Sultan Solyman, and his ſucceſſors the father and brother of your Maieſty, the prouinces of Mol- dauia, the Baſſaes of Siliſtria, and the Beghes of Ackirman ought to keepe the paſſages of the Riuers to G reſtraine the Tartars; and that thoſe now in poſſeſſion of thoſe Gouernments are already knowne, and growne old in their rapine and ſpoile, the King my Lord deſireth your renowmed Majeſty, that they may be diſmiſſed, and their Prouinces giuen to ſome others more enclined in peace. For Cantemir, it is a true rule obſerued, That one Tartar can hardly gouerne another, where both liue vpon ſpoile: and how eaſily vpon any occaſion new troubles are apprehended by thoſe who are antient enemies, I leaue to your Highneſſe wiſedome; in which his Majeſty is ſo aſſured, that he doubteth not, that for the publike good, and for the complaints, and teares of both ſubjects, you will alſo vouchſafe to accept the requeſt of your friend, and a King your neighbor. And if all the World, and the people thereof rejoyce, and praiſe God of the friendſhip and peace betweene your Majeſty and the King my Maſter begun and concluded, he hopeth that the poore and miſerable priſoner ſhall participate of your clemency, that they may joyne in the general H care to pray to the eternall God for encreaſe of your greatneſſe. The King my Maſter doth therefore de-ſire your Majeſty to grant liberty to thoſe who are in your captiuity, as he bindeth himſelfe to ſet free all ſuch of your Majeſties ſubjects, as are now his priſoners; and I do promiſe on the behalfe of my Maſter, that he ſhall be a friend to your friends, and an enemy to your enemies. In concluſion, he deſireth all happineſſe and proſperity to your Majeſty from a cleere heart; in ſigne and teſtimony whereof, and of the friendſhip begun on his part, he honoureth you with a Preſent, which you may be pleaſed to receiue with your accuſtomed benignity; and ſhutting your eares to ſuch enformers, enemies of peace, as are found at your Port, that you will eſteeme him a friend and neighbour of the moſt royall and antient Kings of your moſt Princely Family. I

The ſouldiers continued ſtill in their mutinous diſpoſition, euen in Conſtantinople the head city of the Turkiſh Empire, and grew to that height of inſolency, that going in troups to the court, they demanded all offices of gaine; to be Stewards to the reuenues of the Churches, which are great; to take the Farmes of cuſtomes; and there committed many other outrages which were vnſufferable. The Viſiers durſt deny them nothing; they drunke wine in the ſtreets without prohibition, contrary to their law; and ſtood in companies in the open day exacting mony of all Chriſtians to pay for their wine; and being denied it, ſtabbed and murthered without any puniſhment: and when complaint was made to the Viſier or Magiſtrate, they anſwered, None durſt meddle with them, who had murthered their own King; and the Baſſaes themſelues deſired the Complainants patience, and that they would beare a part K with the generall ſufferance.

The Ianizaries aſſault the houſes of the Chriſtian Conſuls at Smirna.

About the ſame time, the Ianizaries in the gallies which rid before Smirna, commanded by the captaine Halil Baſſa, aſſaulted againſt his will the houſes of all the Chriſtian Conſuls there. The Engliſh with all thoſe of the Nation, were forced to runne naked from their lodgings, and to ſwimme to the Admirals galley to ſaue their liues: they ranſacked the lower part of the houſe, and carried away to the value of two thouſand dollars; the French ſuſtai-ned more loſſe; and the Venetians at leaſt ten thouſand, and one of the ſubjects of that State cut in peeces. The Generall had much adoe to appeaſe them by threats or perſuaſions, or to ſaue the liues of all; inſomuch as they miſcalled and threatened him, becauſe he would not conſent to their madneſſe. In concluſion, he was faine preſently to put to ſea, or elſe they had L finiſhed the Trade at that place.

In Aſia there was then three open rebellions; one at Babylon, another at Arzirum vpon the borders of Perſia neere Tauris, and the third in Meſopotamia. The Viſiers at the Port diſſembled all this, and durſt take no knowledge thereof, nor ſo much as to ſend a command thither, for feare of blowing the fire, which would haue put all into combuſtion: whereupon they held a ſecret counſell and conſented to remooue themſelues, to proue, if they could re-couer the deſperate eſtate of that Empire, and tooke reſolution to make Halil Baſſa (the beſt ſouldier and moſt beloued) great Viſier; and in his roome Daout Baſſa captaine of the Sea; and the preſent Viſier, Chimacham or Lieutenant at the Port; and in the Spring following, they reſolued to ſend the Viſier into Aſia, with all the force they could make: to which end M they ſent into Greece, to warne all the ſouldiery to be ready at Adrianople, not daring to make a rendeſuous at the Port, for feare of new trouble; and ſo to paſſe the Helleſpont, wide of the city, to appeaſe (if they could) thoſe reuolts, and by that way to draw the mutiniers from
the

the Court into action, and to reduce them vnto obedience. And notwithſtanding that there was no other ſymptome or prediction but ſuch as threatned the deſtruction of that Empire, yet were they neuer prouder, nor more ſeeming not to diſtruſt themſelues, their only ſecuritie being, That they had no enemie but themſelues.

The treaſurie was far exhauſted, the reuenue abated, by the oppreſſion of euery Baſſa in his gouernment: the ſoldier increaſed both in pay and number, and ſo impatient of delay, that at euery quarter, (beſides borrowing, and taking vp the farmes of the Cuſtomes before hand) there were ſo many intollerable exactions to raiſe monies, that the apparance of domeſtique quiet could not long endure betweene two extreames; for meanes could not be found, and the Ianizaries would not be retrenched nor deferred. And this was their general eſtate at that time.

While the Poliſh Embaſſadour was treating the peace at the Port (whereof there was no great doubt, becauſe neither ſide was fit for war) there arriued an Embaſſador from the great Duke of Muſcovia, which gaue ſome interruption therin, preſſing the grand Signior to continue the war ſeuen years againſt Poland, according to the promiſe of Sultan Oſman: offering that his Maſter ſhould enter into Poland with an army, and that they would diuide the country between them. But his propoſition was reiected, becauſe they had had ſufficient triall of his Maſters cunning proceedings in the laſt war; for the Muſcouite hauing made peace with Poland (before the inuaſion of Oſman) for fourteen years, and being inuited by him to break it, and to inuade that country, vpon promiſe that he would continue the war for ſeuen yeares, & make no agreement without their comprehenſion; firſt anſwered, That he could not break the peace, thinking that the other was but a flaſh of a yong prince. But ſo ſoon as he ſaw the Turks in the field and borders of Poland, then he began to hope he might make aduantage; and therfore promiſed Sultan Oſman, on thoſe conditions mentioned to enter into the quarrel. And to that end diſpeeded his Embaſſadour to Poland, with inſtructions to demand three things. Firſt, That the prince of Poland ſhould renounce the title of elect Duke of Muſcouy. The ſecond, That the Poles ſhould reſtore a territory in the border of Lituania, taken in the late wars. Laſtly, That the peace ſhould be perpetuall: threatning, That if they refuſed thoſe conditions, he would enter into the country with an army and get what he could. This Embaſſador being arriued in the confines, heard news that the Poles had repulſed the Turke at Chotyn, that he was retyred, and a peace treated. Wherupon he feigned himſelf ſick, and ſent back a poſt with this aduice, and his old inſtructions, deſiring in this alteration ſome new order from home. The gouernor of the town where he lay, ſuſpecting ſomwhat, intercepted the meſſenger and his packet, and ſent it preſently to the King. The man returned to his Maſter the Embaſſador as robbed, and was again diſpeeded the ſecond time, and ſent backe with another ſtile, to wit, with letters of congratulation, joy, and offers of all help and continuance of the peace: with theſe the Embaſſador went forward to the court, and hauing audience, the King anſwered him, That if his meſſage were ſincere it had bin very acceptable; but he knew it to be a ſugred treaſon, and no faith intended by the Muſcouite, and therfore commaunded him to depart.

The Embaſſador proteſted, vowed, and vſed all meanes to aſſure the integritie of his meſſage; vntill hee was confronted by the Chancellour, with his owne Letter, and his Maſters inſtructions. Hereupon was this other diſpatched to the Port to hinder the peace, and to offer their concurrence to continue an inuaſion. In the meane time the Muſcouite neglected no means to ſecure himſelf, & by renuing two embaſſadors obtained a peace with Poland, which was then again confirmed. To which the Poles were the willinger to agree, not knowing what effects the negotiations of the duke of Sbarasky might produce at the Port: and now the Muſcouite was forced to diſſemble again with the Turk, and make his preparation to depart.

The great Viſier Georgi enuying the authoritie of D'aout Baſſa the beloued ſonne in law of the Queene mother, and brother in law to the Emperour Muſtapha (who had formerly been depoſed) who had bin both the inſtrument and the counſellor to murther Sultan Oſman, ſcorning that he ſhould vnder hand gouerne in his reigne, eſpecially becauſe hee countenanced in oppoſition the Duke of Sbaraskies buſineſſe, he therefore practiſed to put him to death: but not daring to do it by his owne authoritie, and in vain to procure it from the Court, he ſtirred vp the Spahies to demand juſtice of him for the death of their laſt king. This looked G farther than the firſt aſſent; for the ſubtil Viſier, who was faithful to his true lord, & knowing the rage of an vnguided multitude aimed at a by-reuenge vpon others, whom he hoped would be involved and accuſed of the murther: and the ſoldier ſoon raiſed and mutined in the Seraglio, they demanded Daout, who inſtantly fled: but now that the buſines was on foot, if hee were not found, the Viſier himſelf was in danger: but the poore man was brought to the Divan, and there being called to publique juſtice, hee muſt excuſe himſelfe vpon ſome greater perſon; wherin the Emperor and his mother ran a new haſard, which was the ſecret end. Therfore both of them forſook him and left him to the law, and without any trial he was brought before the ſoldiers, ſtripped, his turbant taken off, and on his knees ready to receiue the ſtroke of death. But ſuddenly the Ianizaries came to his reſcue, and carried him away to their cham- H bers. The Spahies who began this action took it in ill part, and followed with great outcries, That they would haue him die; the others demanded that he might be heard in publique juſtice. Thus thoſe two mutined factions were ready to come to blowes. Daout Baſſa now in ſome hope of life, bribed the Ianizaries, and that day diſtributed 40000 Chequines of gold, and they promiſed to protect him. Who did not now think but hee was taken away for ſafety? But the Spahies followed their firſt reſolution, and to appeaſe the fear of that diſſention it was agreed he ſhould die. They that meant to ſaue him could not, but preſerued him for a greater example of juſtice. They would not now let him loſe his head in the Court, for that death was too honorable for him that had murdered his prince. Then the Ianizaries ſent him ſecretly in the ſame coach wherin he had ſent Sultan Oſman to execution: twice in the way I being dry with ſorrow, he drank at the ſame fountains where his late maſter begged drink, and ſo was conueyed into the ſame chamber where he had murthered him. The executioners beginning to tie him, himſelf ſhewed the very corner where hee had committed that foule fact, and deſired that there he might, if poſſible, expiate it: and ſo he was at laſt miſerably ſtrangled. Thus he had his reward, and God was iuſt alſo euen for the wicked.

About the 20 of February, the peace after many rubs between the grand Signior and the King of Poland, by the mediation of the Engliſh Embaſſador (who was choſen by the Viſiers as Arbiter of all differences) after many meetings with Diac Mahomet Baſſa Commiſſioner for the Treaty, was concluded; the Duke hauing firſt been forced to ſend this following remonſtrance for his expedition; which much mooued the Viſier, and quickened the conclu- K ſion.

The Duke of Sbaraskies remonſtrance to the great Viſiers.

YOur Excellencie may be pleaſed to remember the happy and honorable treaty made before Chotyn: in which a peace was concluded between the Ottoman Empire and the kingdom of Poland, ſigned by Commiſſioners on both parts; wherin (with reference to other antient Treaties) it was agreed, That a L great Embaſſador ſhould come to the Imperiall Port, as well to confirm and ſwear the peace, as to ſet in order ſome other incident circumſtances, as then not fully taken into conſideration. Since which, the King and Republique of Poland hauing elected me for that imployment, his Maieſty and my ſelf haue receiued many letters from Delauir, Daout, Huzein and Muſtapha, Baſſa's, all great Viſiers; not only promiſing a ſpeedy end and diſpatch of the concluſion of peace which on both parts is ſo much deſired, but alſo a releaſe of our captiues, and all other effects of loue and friendſhip, according to the antient honor of the Imperiall Port; deſiring me vpon that aſſurance to proceed with alacritie and expedition. And further, it hauing pleaſed his Maieſty of great Brittain (a friend to both) to mediate in this pious office, by his Embaſſador reſident and ſent to that end, who hath giuen me by his letters great incouragement and hopes of a reall M and true proceeding in this buſineſſe, agreeable to diuers promiſes made vnto him, which he accordingly hath informed his own Maſter; I was very glad of this honorable function, and hoped to haue found as ready performance as is by his Maieſty and all the world expected.

To this end I am come to the Port, with full power and inſtructions from his Maieſtie and the Republique

A publique of Poland, to conclude and finiſh a full and perpetuall peace, with all ſinceritie and heartineſſe, and in his Maieſties name to ſwear the ſame; offering to be friend to the friends, and enemie to the enemies of this Imperiall Port reciprocally, and to be ready to treat and accommodate all or any other circumſtances incident to a buſines of ſo great conſequence.

Since my ariuall, notwithſtanding that I haue produced both the mentioned treaty at Chotyn, and Letters, how little I haue aduanced in the main affairs, and the doubtfull conſequences of a long protraction, I deſire you to conſider; hauing as yet proceeded no further in ſubſtance, than the deliuery of my letters and preſents; and to that end there may neuer be imputed to the King and republique of Poland any ſlacknes in preſent, or any breach in future; out of a ſincere and good deſire to eſtabliſh this treaty ſure and firm, and to open a clear and true heart, I am inforced to make this true declaration, and deſire your Excellency to B weigh maturely the motiues following.

I do not repine at myne own ſtay at this Imperiall Port, where I receiue all honour; I do not doubt of the ſincere and faithfull meaning of the Emperor to conclude the peace; but the deferring hereof may againſt our wills breed three inconueniences.

Firſt, your Excellencie doth know, that the Coſſacks are a people not eaſily to be reſtrained, if they bee once at libertie, and that they liue vpon their arms. They haue ready eight hundred boats to make an inuaſion into the black ſea: in the winter they canot moue; they attend onely the aduice of the concluſion of peace: therfore now is the ſeaſon to finiſh and publiſh it; for if by long delaies it ſhal be deferred vnto the Spring, and that jealouſie or their own deſire ſet them free, your Excellencie doth know in wiſedome how difficult it is, to reduce into order a people of that condition; which for our parts we are now able and rea-C die to preuent; the State hauing ordained to ſatisfie them, and to buy their boats vpon the firſt intimation of a concluſion.

Secondly, It is the order of our Nation euery Spring, to call a parliament for the reglement of all publique affairs; of which aſſembly I am a member: if I ſhall be ſtaied here, and not able to render a reaſon therof, it will breed great ſuſpition and diſturbance in the general reſolution: you may conſider that in all parts there are ſome vnaduiſed men, friends of ſedition and war; and many that make aduantage of others troubles, who may do ill offices, ſuch as the innoſent may be ſorry for, but canot help.

Thirdly, The eies of all princes are ſet vpon the honor and faith kept on both parts in this treaty, and accordingly will gouern their own occaſions.

For theſe reaſons I do in his Maieſties name deſire your Excellencie to giue me a Diſpatch, ſuch as may D bring ioy and content to all, by auoiding the miſeries of war; and in ſuch time, that the ſnows and commodities of winter ſhut me not vp, but that I may return, as well to ſatisfie his Maieſtie and the Republique in our generall aſſembly, as to retain thoſe who may be cauſe of much trouble, without our conſents.

There is no difficultie that I vnderſtand; I am content to accept the antient and honorable treaties made with the famous Emperor Solyman and his ſucceſſors; and now laſtly at Chotyn: if there be any other difference, I haue power and am ready to accommodate it.

My deſire then only is, That a preſent end and concluſion be made of a peace, firme and perpetuall: and that the Emperor will be pleaſed, according to many promiſes, to deliuer and ſet free the captiues taken in the laſt wars: as I do in his Maieſties name giue my word that all others taken on our part ſhall haue libertie and paſport to return. And if there haue bin any difficultie made by occaſion of my preſſure for the E reiection of Tomſha and Cante-Emir-Emirze, I doe make this true proteſtation, That as it is the requeſt of his Maieſtie my King in friendſhip, ſo there is no other end nor cauſe of that deſire, but only to remoue all occaſion of offence and breach with this Imperiall Port, which thoſe ill naighbours are euer ready to miniſter. But if that be any inconuenience to this Imperiall Port, I onely then ſeeke that better order may be taken with them for the future, that they may liue quietly, without offence of the publique peace.

I deſire your Excellencie to weigh and conſider theſe my reaſons and proteſtations, which proceed only from a good and ſincere heart, to promoue and maintain an inuiolable and good friendſhip with this Imperiall Port.

F

Within two dayes after, the Duke of Sbaraskie tooke his leaue of the Emperour, to the great ioy of himſelfe and his traine, who thereby ſaw themſelues deliuered out of captiuitie.

The three great and noble priſoners were ſet free, and did make a publique acknowledgment G of his Maieſtie of great Britains fauor; to whom both the Embaſſadour and they attributed the beſt part of their good ſucceſſe, and gaue particular thanks by letter.

Articles contracted between the grand Signior and the King of Poland.

HIs Maieſty of Poland hauing ſent into our happy Port his well deſeruing and famous great Embaſſador the moſt illuſtrous Duke of Sbaraskie, to offer vs ſincere peace, loyal friendſhip, and good correſpondence, and to ſeeke that the antient peace and friendſhip ſhould H be of vs anew confirmed, and the old Capitulations renewed, and that for the time to come there might be eſtabliſhed an eternal peace and friendſhip: his kingly friendſhip hath bin moſt pleaſing to vs, and the peace and friendſhip by vs accepted: and wee haue ordained, That all the antient treaties ſhall be renewed; and at the preſent haue giuen this our Capitulation with the following Articles.

I. FIrſt, That neuer vpon our part, nor of any of our Viziers, Beglerbeghs, Beghs, Cadees, Officers, nor ſoldiers, any harm ſhall be done to the Prouinces, Cities, Caſtles, Towns, villages, I and other places pertaining to the King and State of Poland. And likewiſe vpon the part of his Maieſty of Poland, That by his Princes, Miniſters, or Coſſackes, nor any other his ſubiects, there ſhall be no wrong don in any part of our Empire, city, caſtle, towne, or village, but that both parties ſhall alwaies remain friends to friends, and enemies to enemies.

II. And ſeeing that the Tartars of Dobrirza, Biaolograd, Keil, Ozu, and Siliſtra, and the people of Moldavia, do enter, inuade, and damnifie the State of Poland: We command, that for the time to come, our Beglerbeghs of Siliſtra, and all other Beglerbeghs of Bender, ſhall take care to keepe all thoſe paſſages and riuers, to the end that herafter the ſaid Nations ſhall haue K no paſſage by thoſe waies to damnifie the ſtate of Poland. And whenſoeuer it ſhall be known that the ſaid Miniſters haue vſed negligence in keeping thoſe paſſages, according to the treatie with Sultan Solyman, of happy memory, that ſuch Miniſters bee degraded and ſeuerely puniſhed.

III. The Vayuod of Moldauia likewiſe ſhall neuer grant any paſſage to the ſaid Nations. And whenſoeuer it ſhall be known that the ſaid Vayuod hath tranſgreſſed in this our will, he ſhall be degraded and ſeuerely puniſhed.

IV. And whenſoeuer the ſaid Tartars and others, contrary to this our will, ſhall make any in- L uaſion or ſpoyl in the ſtate of Poland, all our miniſters and gouernors ſhall apprehend and ſeuerely puniſh them: and as it is ſet down in the agreements with Sultan Solyman, all the ſlaues and priſoners which ſhall by ſuch malefactors be brought into our dominions, ſhall bee ſet at liberty, and their goods reſtored to them again, and the malefactors puniſhed for hauing tranſgreſſed our Imperiall Capitulations.

V. And if any of our Subiects ſhall buy any perſon or Poliſh goods, vniuſtly taken by ſuch malefactors, and it ſhall be made knowne vnto vs by the king of Poland; the buyers for hauing bought vnlawfull goods their eſtate ſhall be confiſcate, and they themſelues ſeuerely puniſhed. M

VI. The Prince Chrim Tartar ſhall be obedient vnto vs, and all the Tartarian Nation vnder his commaund. Kalgha Sultan, and other Emirs and Princes of his bloud, from henceforth ſhall neuer enter into nor inuade any part of the State of Poland, nor euer do any damage

A mage, either by the way of Moldauia, the open field or deſart, nor ſhall euer enter into or inuade any part or juriſdiction of the ſame. And at all times that his Majeſty of Poland ſhall giue notice, That the ſaid Prince or others aboue mentioned haue broken this our will and capitulations, and entered and damnified his State; for their diſobedience, the ſaid Prince as well as the others, ſhall be by vs puniſhed and chaſtiſed; and we command that neuer any one, in any part of our Dominion, ſhall ſell either people or goods robbed from the State of Poland; and finding that there be any one that hath dared to buy men, or goods, robbed from them, ſuch ſhall be immediately puniſhed with confiſcation. And as before mentioned, the B Beglerbeghs of Siliſtria, with all diligence ſhall keepe the ſtreights of Oſu, and neuer ſuffer the ſaid people to paſſe; and if it ſhall be knowne they haue trangreſſed they ſhall be puniſhed with loſſe of their charge and office.

VII. And whenſoeuer the ſaid Prince Crim Tartar, or his Kalka, Emirze, or others ſhall by our order be called and commanded in their proper perſons, to go to any part of the war in our ſeruice, if by chance they ſhould paſſe by the confines of Poland, as it is ſet downe in the capitulations of my father of happy memory, They ſhall not enter into any Village, Borough, Caſtle, or City of Polonia, or do any kinde of dammage to the people thereof; and finding that they haue giuen any moleſtation or hurt, they ſhall be corrected, as is aforeſaid.

C VIII. And in conformity of my my fathers ſaid capitulation, euery time that his Majeſty of Poland ſhall inuite and call the ſaid Prince Crim Tartar in his occaſion of war whiles he giueth him his annuall ſtipend, the ſaid Prince with all his forces and army, ſhall go, helpe, and aſſiſt his Majeſty in euery ſuch occaſion, and ſhew all friendpſhi and ſincerity: to which effect we haue giuen order, that our Imperiall Letters be written to the ſaid Prince, in this particular, who ſhall obſerue all according to our will and pleaſure.

IX. And for the better eſtabliſhing of this our peace and amity according to the antient capitulations and obſeruance, his Majeſty of Poland promiſeth to ſend his great Embaſſador to D the ſaid Prince of Tartars; and (beginning from this preſent, the foure and twentieth of the moneth of Iune) to pay yearely to the ſaid Prince his accuſtomed ſtipend in this forme following. Euery yeare his Majeſty ſhall ſend the ſaid ſtipend into the Caſtle of Chotyn in Moldauia, and the Vayuod thereof ſhall certifie the ſaid Prince Crim, who ſhall preſently ſend his Embaſſadour to receiue the ſame, by the hands of the Vayuod. The which Prince ſhall alwaies obſerue this forme, and ſhall be alwaies obedient to this our Imperiall Will.

X. And in caſe that his Majeſty of Poland ſhould faile in any yeare to ſend the ſaid ſtipend, E the Prince Tartar ſhall not ſuddenly riſe with his army and inuade Poland; but, according to the agreement of Sultan Solyman, continuing ſtill in his obedience, he ſhall certifie vs, and we will procure and recouer his right.

XI. His Majeſty of Poland doth promiſe that from henceforward, the Coſſackes ſhould not enter nor come into any part of our Empire by the riuers of Oſu or any other, nor make any ſpoile therein: and if the ſaid Coſſackes do enter into any part of our Dominions and doe any hurt, we certifying his Majeſty by our Imperiall Letters, he promiſeth to correct them ſeuerely, and to put to death the malefactors for breaking the capitulations, and violating the peace and amity.

F XII. And all our ſubjects which ſhall be made ſlaues, and impriſoned by the ſaid Coſſackes, ſhall be immediately ſet at liberty; and the miniſters of his Majeſty ſhall alwaies be diligent to puniſh the tranſgreſſors, and wholly reſtore thoſe perſons and goods, which they ſhall haue taken from our ſaid ſubjects, and that neuer any ſubject of the King of Poland ſhall buy any ſtollen goods : and if any haue preſumed and bought, that he be ſeuerely puniſhed : and in generall, all that which we haue promiſed concerning the Tartars and Moldauians, ſo his Majeſty alſo doth promiſe to vs for the Coſſackes and other his ſubjects. G

XIII. After the concluſion of this Peace, if vpon the confines or open fields, fiſhers or hunters on either part meeting together, ſhall happen to fall out or be at difference by their owne occaſion, it ſhall be no diſturbance to this our peace and amity.

XIV. Alwaies according to the antient agreements, the Princes or Vayuods of Moldauia, ſhall ſhew to his Majeſty of Poland all due reuerence and reſpect, good amity and neighbourhood: and ſeeing that the ſaid Vayuods haue euer beene as it were inſtruments of preſeruation, or of the breach of the Peace; therefore we command, that for the time to come, neither the ſaid Vayuods, nor other of our Beglerbeghs or miniſters, ſhall build in thoſe confines any new Caſtle, Fort, or Bridge; and that in thoſe Caſtles or Forts of thoſe frontiers which are already built, there ſhall neuer any other garriſons be kept but Moldauians: and according to the antient Capitulations, the Tartars ſhall not inhabit, dwell, or till within thoſe confines, of both nations. H

XV. And to the end this peace and amity may be alwaies kept betweene vs, we ſweare by the name of God, and aſſure by this our Imperiall Article, that all the Embaſſadors, great or inferiour, which ſhall be ſent from vs to his Majeſti, or thoſe great or leſſe which ſhall be ſent from his Majeſty to vs, ſhall alwaies be ſafe and ſecure, as well in their comming, as their returne; and that there ſhall neuer be need of any other paſport, but that they ſhall be of vs by all waies honoured and well receiued. I

XVI. Concerning merchants, paſſengers, and other Polacke negotiators, they ſhall alwaies come ſafely and ſecurely by ſea and land into all the parts of our Empire; and for cuſtomes, tolles, and other duties of their merchandiſe, and in caſe of debt, credit, ſuretiſhip, and ſuch other like accidents concerning the courſe of Iuſtice and Law, we command that it ſhall be alwaies obſerued according to the agreements with our father of happy memory, Sultan Achmat. Which Articles we at this preſent accept and confirme, ratifie, and command that they be of all our ſubjects for euer punctually obeyed and obſerued. K

XVII. Furthermore we promiſe, and in the name of God ſweare, to obſerue and maintaine for euer, all thoſe couenants and Articles agreed vpon and written in our Capitulations, by our great grandfather, grandfather, and father, and neuer to diſanull any of them.

XVIII. And whereas to ſhew greater deſire of ſincerity concerning this peace, his Majeſty of Poland hath ſought of vs by his ſaid great Embaſſador, that the ſubjects of Poland may ſafely and ſecurely come by the riuer of Turla with diuers merchandiſe, and ſell, buy, and trafficke in Ackirman, which trafficke being vſed will be of great benefit to both Eſtates; We ordaine and command from henceforward, that the ſaid Nation may come and negotiate ſafely and ſecurely in the ſaid Ackirman. And to the end that this buſineſſe be eſtabliſhed and concluded in a good manner, we will giue order to our Embaſſador, whom we intend to ſend ſhortly to his Majeſty for the ratification thereof. L

XIX. Which preſent Articles, Capitulations, Peace, Amity, League, and Correſpondency, by the grace of God we promiſe vndoubtedly to maintaine ſo long as we liue in this World: and do hereby conclude betweene vs and our poſterity, and the Kings and State of Polonia, an euerlaſting Peace; Sealing it and confirming it with theſe words, Friends to Frends, and enemies to Enemies. M

Notwithſtanding all this, after the Duke was departed one daies journey, where he ſtaied to receiue the treaty ſigned, they altered ſome of the articles to their own aduantage, without his knowledge. Which when he heard, he complained anew by his letters to the Port of the abuſe offered vnto him, and made haſte rather to eſcape than returne. But the Coſſacks at the ſame time being ſtirring about the Blacke ſea, the Viſier and State (hauing nothing more in care than to ſhut vp that backe Port, whereby they ſuffered much loſſe and diſhonour, and could not reuenge it vpon a fugitiue people; which diuided their nauall army, being forced to ſend a portion of gallies to defend the trade, the beſt part of reliefe of the city of Conſtantinople comming from thoſe coaſts) reſolued to giue content to the Poles, and to aſſure the Peace; that they might with more ſecurity attend their affaires in Aſia and Hungary; which action was fauoured vehemently by the preſent Viſier. To which end, hee ſent anſwer into Poland, with promiſes of faith, and reparation for the injuries committed by the Tartars; laying the fault of miſwriting the treaty vpon the Chancellor, which though they amended not, yet they did explaine and interpret: and for better eſtabliſhment and ſecurity on their behalfs of the peace, they reſolued to depoſe Iehan-Begh Prince of Tartaria, and to ſend Michmet Gheray his couſin german and firſt of the blood, late priſoner in the Rhodes, to take poſſeſſion of his dominion; who vndertooke to quiet and reſtraine that people: which he cauſed to be ſignified to Poland, that the King might ſee, theſe alterations were only for the full ſecurity of the peace of their ſide, that the Pole might take the like courſe with the Coſſackes, who were not as yet reclaimed.

The ſouldiers ſtill continue in their fury.

The ſoldiers continued ſtill in their height of fury and madneſſe, and thoſe that were to go vpon the gallies for the defence of the Blacke ſea, and other deſignes, being ready to depart, robbed, ſlew, brake houſes in the face of the Magiſtrate in the open day: What was it not lawfull for them to do that had ſlaine their King, and made and deſtroied their great Miniſters at their will and pleaſure, as their Stewards and ſeruants? and God did ſo blinde them, that they ſhould not ſee, that they digged vp their own roots, and were made by his permiſſion the blind inſtruments of their own ruine. The mint alſo was remoued into the Seraglio, where was brought forth all the ſaddles, bridles, ſtirrops, that had any gold or ſiluer vpon them, with all old plate, to make money to patch vp a quiet, and to ſatisfie and content the ſoldiers, and all little enough for the preſent, to ſaue the city from a totall ſacke.

The Embaſſadours of the Prince of Tranſyluania departed from the Port.

The Embaſſador of the Prince of Tranſyluania, hauing changed their ſtile of excuſing a firme peace with the Emperor finding the opportunity of a friend now made great Viſier in place to aid their Prince, they negotiated new matter, aſſuring the Port, that by the troubles of Germany, a faire occaſion was giuen to recouer Hungary, and to ſet the crowne vpon their Maſters head; and that therefore if the Grand Signior would be pleaſed to grant vnto their Prince the aid of the Græcian army, that he would make another attempt to weaken the greateſt enemy of that Empire; which they eaſily obtaining (the ignorance and auarice of the Turke opening a way to credulity, which was the conſtant aduantage of Gabor, who could conuert both ther vnderſtandings and forces to his owne ends) being in all fully ſatisfied, they departed the 20 of Aprill. Which reſolution of the Port was much wondred at by all wiſe men, who knew how vnfit the Turke was at that preſent for a warre. The Prince was then at Caſſouia, expecting the iſſue of his Embaſſage, and in hope of Turkiſh aid; which beeing granted and gathered vpon his frontier, and joyned at laſt with his owne forces, his whole army was not very great, nor had he any cannon to march withall to beſiege any place: his chiefeſt truſt conſiſting in his intelligence in Hungary, where he expected a generall reuolt, and that all the garriſons would open to him, or at leaſt ſome diuerſion in Sileſia (which he was promiſed) facilitate his waies; and he was not in deſpaire, that vpon the firſt appearance of an army, Morauia by the fauour of the Count of Torne, who had aſſiſted his Embaſſadors in the negotiation of the Port, and his friends would follow the ſame example; and this was the deſigne which his Embaſſadors had ſo long ſolicited at the Port, and diſſembled at their firſt comming. Now there was nothing expected but a war: but not long after, there arriued a new Embaſſador from the Prince, without any mention of the affaires of thoſe parts; which made all men inquiſitiue, thinking he was either come to haſten the ſuccours, or to change ſomething in the manner and other circumſtances depending thereon: but it was found that the States of Tranſyluania had aſſembled at Alba Iulia, and were very loath to entertaine a war, or to breake with the Emperor; and therefore diſpeeded two Commiſſioners towards him, who were well receiued and treated at Vienna: and from the Emperor was ſent to Tranſyluania the Biſhop of Nittia. Whereupon a new peace was treated, and this Embaſſador G ſent to procure the recall of the former commands, giuen to the Baſſaes to moue with their armies. Whereby it was ſuſpected he neuer had any purpoſe to make a war, but only to ballance by the continuance thereof his cares and laſt agreement with the Emperor.

The Baſſa of Arzirum in rebellion.

All men propheſied (by reaſon of dayly diſorders) the fall of the Ottoman Empire. But now Abaſſa Baſſa the Baſſa of Arzirum who was joyned with diuers others, and had made a great army, was in his march towards Angria, the direct way to Conſtantinople (Babylon yet reſting in rebellion) with a pretence of reformation; he tooke nothing by force, but the treaſure of the Empire. He held a generall Counſell in his campe, and ſent to the port to require the Mufti, Cadees, Baſſaes, and antient Beghs, to take knowledge and to puniſh the traitors that H murthered the late King, and to ſettle a new one lawfully, that ſhould be able to goueгne, to reduce the mutined city ſouldier to obedience and diſcipline, and to place about the Emperor ſome great Viſier, choſen by the State, able to direct and apply remedies to the diſeaſes then growne to a deſperat height; complaining, that euery three or foure moneths, by the change of the Viſier, the Prouinces were deſtroied (for they placed and diſplaced the Gouernors according to their owne factions) and ſo contrary orders were ſent abroad dayly, inſomuch as no man knew who was King or Viſier, nor whom they ſhould obey. Theſe were his pretences, and if the preſent State would not conſent to this aſſembly, he then reſolued to come to the Port, and ſettle all things at his pleaſure by the ſword. The great Officers in poſſeſſion of the Emperor and gouernment, loth to be called to an account by the ſouldier, I tooke a worſe reſolution, To make a war; and made choice of Cicala Baſſa for Generall: which he refuſed vpon the ſame pretence, that in his abſence alterations would be ſo frequent, that he ſhould not pleaſe, or at leaſt vncertainely, and according to interpretation. Therefore he required an abſolute Dictatorſhip for the time, equall to that of a great Viſier, or elſe he would not ſtir. This was granted him, and mony giuen out, and order to paſſe the water ſpeedily; enrolling for his army fifteen thouſand Ianizaries, & thitty thouſand Spahies. But thoſe did demur, and alledged it was a war againſt their owne brethren, and ſought any excuſes rather than to come to blowes. But the ſecret was, it was then Ramazan, or their holy Lent, at the end of which they were to receiue their pay; and therefore they would not moue, but pretended religion. Next day after their feaſt, when they ſhould march, they ſhewed themſelues K in their colours, (hauing firſt held many conſultations) and would not moue at all, vnleſſe the Emperor or great Viſier would go in perſon. So euery day brought forth new ſubject of trouble, and the Empire to a great deale of hazard and danger.

MORAT. AVT AMVRATHES IV. ACHIMETI FILIVS. TVRCARVM IMPERATOR VNDECIMVS. Anno Domini, 1623.
Ætatis ſuæ xiu
T. Cecill Sculp.

Morat in tender age the Throne aſcends, For wanton luſt more apt than Princely ends: Sporting he lies in a luxurious bed, Whileſt Bagdat is by Perſia conquered;
A greater loſſe than this, who can diuine, Vnleſſe to loſe the ſeat of Conſtantine.
His other Acts, and how he ſtill proceeds, Shall here enſue in ſtory of his deeds.

THE REIGNE OF MORAT, OR AMVRATH, THE FOVRTH OF THAT NAME, ELEVENTH EMPEROR OF THE TVRKS; HE THAT NOW SWAYETH THAT MIGHTY MONARCHIE.

Sultan Muſtapha depoſed, & Sultan Morat placed in his Throne.

VPon the laſt day of Auguſt, Sultan Muſtapha, brother of Achmat, who had beene twice Emperor, was depoſed; and Sultan Morat, C ſon to Achmat, and brother to Oſman murthered the yeare before, placed in the Throne. But it will not be vntimely nor vnprofitable, to diſcourſe of the cauſes and reaſons of thoſe great mutations, which are the intrinſique part and ſoule of action.

That State for fifteene moneths after the denth of Oſman, was a ſtage of variety, the Souldiery vſurping all gouernment, placing and diſplacing as the winde of fauour or diſfauour moued them.
In that time there were three Emperors, ſeuen great Viſiers, two Captiane Baſſaes, fiue Aga's of the Ianizaries, three Treaſurers, ſix Baſſaes of Cairo, and in proportion as many changes of Gouernors in all the Prouinces; euery new Viſier making D vſe of his time, diſplacing thoſe in poſſeſſion, and ſelling their fauour to others: ſo as the whole Empire was in a manner fined ouer foure or fiue times; ſuch was the exaction fot a welcome of euery Baſſa to their gouernment. Huzein Baſſa the laſt Viſier of them (a tyrant hated of all men, and now reſtored to the dignity by bribing the ſouldiery) conſumed the publique treaſure ſo faſt, and exacted mony from priuate men ſo violently, to maintaine his faction with the Ianizaries, that euen the Receiuers were afraid, and weary, and the wiſeſt of them foreſaw their owne ruine in the generall conſumption: when there was any murmure againſt him, he preſently ſilenced it either by gifts or bloud. As ſoone as he had diſpatched away the Generall Cigala Baſſa with the army for the ſuppreſſion of the great rebellion in Aſia (which vpon the depoſition of Georgi, and the making of him Viſier, was content to E march) which he did rather to disburden himſelfe of feares, by ſending out of the way the Spahies, who were his oppoſites, than for any loue to the Srate: which Army, what inſolencies they committed for thirty daies before their paſſing the water, euen in the face of Iuſtice, was as incredible as impoſſible to relate, he ſent priuatly to ſtrangle Halil Baſſa, Georgi, and Muſtapha late Viſiers; hoping thereby he had remoued all concurrents. Whether this gaue the occaſion, or that his ſin was ripe for reuenge, the Spahies ſuddenly gathered head, and the old Wolfe fled to his truſty guard, the Ianizaries. The city was almoſt diuided; but the Spahies ſent their reſolution plainely, being the weaker in number, That they deſired not to come to blowes with their Brethren; but if the Ianizaries would protect him, that they ſhould keepe him, Conſtantinople, and Greece: but they themſelues would depart and diſpoſe F of Aſia. Which was a bold profeſſion, but eaſie, the forces of the Rebels being of their ſociety. The wiſeſt foreſaw the perill, and they all agreed to depoſe him; and ſo the Seale was giuen to Aly Baſſa, a man reputed honeſt, but melancholy & vntried for ſo great a charge.
Euery one ſaw thoſe outward wheeles of motion, but the ſpring within that moued them was not ſo ſoon diſcouered: The army mentioned for Aſia, arriuing at Nicomedia, fiue daies journy from Conſtantinople, ſhewed little bedience; many disbanded, and the reſt had no deſire to fight with thoſe of the ſame profeſſion both in religion and in humour. The newes G came dayly to the Port, of the taking of Forts by Abaſſa Baſſa the head of the rebels and of other defections and combuſtions in thoſe parts; and that that quarrell was taken vp againſt the Ianizaries and the preſent gouernment, of whom he ſlew all that fell in his power, as guilty of the bloud of Oſman. This ſuddenly wakened and ripened the project of thoſe who had plotted ſecretly this alteration to reſtore Morat to the Imperiall crowne. Hereupon the new Viſier Aly, with the counſell of the Mufti and ſome Captaines of the ſouldiers of both Orders, laied their foundation: they ſhewed the imminent perill and difficulty to reſtore or preuent the rebels by armes: the Ianizaries ſaw that they alone muſt (as the marke of enuy) beare the whole burthen; and therefore all reſolued, that the eaſieſt and ſafeſt way to appeaſe their troubles, was to reſtore the true heire, the preſent Emperor; hoping that thoſe who pretended H their riſing for the loue of his brother, and in reuenge of his cauſe, would obey that Prince, and quiet themſelues. Vpon this reſolution they aſſembled at the Seraglio without any tumult, and deſired to haue Sultan Muſtapha come forth and ſpeake to the ſouldiers, and to anſwer to ſome queſtions: which he refuſing (as truly vnable) they tooke out Sultan Morat and declared him King, with vniuerſall joy and acclamation: inſomuch as the Ianizaries (but the day before his oppoſites) being ſhewed the want of treaſure and the neceſſity of the State, were content to remit their donatiue and encreaſe of pay, vſuall at euery change: a wonder that was not like to laſt long, for many of them did afterwards repent, and demand it freſhly.

The new Emperor the next day made his ſolemne entry into the city, a youth of foureteene I yeares of age, fat, and of a liuely countenance, and good ſtature, a Prince of two faire hopes for ſuch a people; whoſe actions afterward (though vnder gouernment) ſhewed that he would ſoone know himſelfe, and proue of a ſtirring nature. At the returne of the gallies from the Blacke ſea, who brought ſome Coſſacks priſoners aliue, and ſome heads of the dead, he would ſee them all brought before him, a cuſtome vnuſuall. This deſire, and ſome anſwers he gaue, made all men judge he would be actiue, and cruell. All ſeemed then ſerene and quiet, and neuer appeared ſo great a change euen in affections. The moſt diſordered did then aſſume a face of obedience (which was once thought to be vaniſhed that city) and choſe rather ſubmiſſiion to lawes than threatened deſtruction. The calme was as violent as the ſtorme. The firſt actions ſhewed peace, but ſo, as to prepare for neceſſity of warre. They ſought out, and K dayly found the treaſure, plate, and jewels giuen and conueied away by Huzein Baſſa, which returned apace, and many voluntarily rendred them. The laſt Aga of the Ianizaries, who was but three moneths before Caja or Lieutenant (afterward Baſſa of Cairo) did for his part receiue, and reſtore, eight hundred thouſand dollars, to buy his place and peace: ſo that euery day made new diſcoueries; onely he that had beene the author of all this was fled away, and could then by no meanes be found: whoſe apprehenſion would haue aſſured many, and haue brought backe a great treaſure.

Aſia in that ſearch for mony, and new ſettlement of affaires, was almoſt quite forgotten; ſo that the army was ſtaied from proceeding; for it was beleeued, Abaſſa Baſſa depended vpon the new Emperor and would ſubmit. But he had aduanced too far to truſt to any ſafe retreat, L euen although he was the indirect occaſion of the raiſing of the new Emperor. Yet the way was not warrantable in the rule of Monarchy, nor perhaps ſincere in the intent; for Kings ſeldome pardon thoſe that are able to be traitors, and haue ſhewed but a will to reuolt; and that power is neuer ſecure which is too much. Sometimes they make vſe of traitors as a ſafegard for the preſent, and for the future a ſubject of their reuenge. And this maxime Haly Baſſa in the former great Aſian defection approued with the price of his life, being taken into the fauour of Sultan Achmat in all priuacy, made Baſſa of Buda, and within foure months ſtrangled, vnder colour of putting on a Veſt of honour. Therefore it was doubted, that they who had diſcouered ſo high thoughts, and exaſperated the Ianizaries, would not ſo eaſily diſpoſe armes, by which only they might be ſafe; and it was then feared they had intelligence with M Perſia. There reſted one great difficulty, to introduce that awe of Majeſty which had beene trampled vnder foot; and it was a great one, when a people, like the ſea, had made a breach into antient reuerence, and proſpered; the taſte of profitable wickedneſſe was not ſo eaſily loſt.
It was imagined that theſe changes would worke great effects vpon the bordering parts of

A Chriſtendom intereſſed; for they intended peace vniuerſally, to recouer mony, and a habit of obedience and ciuil gouernment. To which purpoſe a letter was written to the Baſſa of Buda, to leaue it to his diſcretion in the mouing of arms againſt the Emperor (being lately excited therto by the prince of Tranſylvania) as a man experienced vpon the border, to doe what ſhould moſt conduce to the ſafety and profit of the ſtate: for as they durſt not abſolutely prohibit them and recal the former licence, for fear of diſpleaſing Gabor and the Baſſa, who were vnited; ſo they would inſinuat their deſires and fears by counſel, now only tending to peace.

In the midſt of this appearing calm, the Ianizaries, ſome repenting (as was ſaid before) and ſome denying their conſent to remit their donatiue and increaſe of pay, did anew ſharply demand it, with threats of innouation: ſo as they were forced to content them, and euery order B of men and officers that were not of the ſword, were compelled to contribute to it. The Viſier ſent ſolemnly to the 4 reſident Embaſſadors, to borrow 30000 checquines, as the friends and allyes of the Port, to whom in confidence they durſt open their ſecrets. Many old experienced officers miſliked this betraying their own wants, as diſhonourable, and vnlike to take dffect: which indeed it did not, for mony was ſo abaſed, and trades ſo poor, as the ſtranger had no ful purſe. The new emperor to ſerue his turn, gaue out 400000 drams of gold, being his beſt veſ-ſel, to make coin; which was ſtamped baſe, to meet with the inſolencie of the ſouldier, who would take no ſiluer, as falſe mony. Except in this ſearch, the ſtate and city appeared to be at ſome quietnes; only the Baſſa of Cairo (Boſtangi Baſſa to Oſman, newly made Baſſa of Buda) ambitiouſly ſeeking the dignitie of grand Viſier, by the gift of 100000 Checquines, his of-C fer was ſeemingly accepted, part of the mony payd, and he ſent for priuatly into the Seraglio, as to receiue the ſeale. But the Emperors beſt Counſell within ſaw how dangerous it was to giue way to ſuch innouations (beſide a priuat grudge, this man being the inſtrument to ſtran-gle the queen mothers eldeſt ſon, when Sultan Oſman went to the Poliſh war) where in ſted of aduancement a hangman took off his head, & his houſe & goods, being very rich, ſeiſed vpon.

Cantemir Mirza Baſſa of Siliſtra was al this time in diſobedience; whom the late Viſier attempted to diſplace, and gaue order to the Chrim Tartar to remoue him by force. But it was thought fit, not to thruſt him further out, and to make him a dangerous enemy. Wherfore a confirmation of his gouernment was ſent him, a ſword & a Veſt, in all honor; the Poles miſliking of it, he being their mortal enemy, & to be remoued at their inſtance in the late Treaty.

Abaſſa aſſaults and takes the caſtle of Tocat.

D At the change of the Emperor all men hoped for peace with Abaſſa Baſſa the great rebel of Aſia; but he ſhewed that he had further intents than to ſet vp the brethren of Oſman; when pretending obedience, hee ſuddenly aſſaulted and took the caſtle of Tocat, which is in the Mint of Aſia, 7 Beglerbegs and 16 Sanzacks being joined with him: all that part of Aſia obeyed him, for he oppreſſed none, only executing his wrath vpon the Ianizaries. This aduice beeing brought by a captain of that Order, made much rumor at the Port; the ſouldiers raiſing a tumult in the Seraglio, demanded to be led out to fight, and to haue thoſe of Aſia declared Rebels: to which end a councel was called, where they receiued ſo cold an anſwer, that they grew into ſome diſorder, accuſing Halil and Georgi Baſſa to haue correſpondence with them; & ſee-ming to doubt that the whole ſtate did conniue at this action, to proſecute the firſt deſigne E of Oſman, To root out that corrupted Order which did diſorder all gouernment: inſomuch as they openly profeſſed, If we be true Muſſulmen and the Emperors ſlaues, let vs go out and fight with his enemies and ours; if not, and that you maintain them againſt vs, we are reſolued to die together, and not to be waſted by pieces. There was much likelihood of this, but that Abaſſa Baſſa had proceeded too far: therfore to ſatisfie the ſoldier, the banner was ſet out at the court gate, and that of the Aga of the Ianizaries at their gate, and Warre proclaimed, That all the force of the Empire ſhould be ready to march within four daies. When they ſaw this reſolution in the great ones, (whether diſſembled or in good erneſt) that day being the 18 of October, 1623, the Ianizaries and Spahies held a councel, and changed their minds; alledging, That Winter approching, and no prouiſion made, they would not moue. The Viſiers were glad, reſpecting their owne F eaſe; and ſo all Aſia was left to the curteſie of the Rebell, and to giue other friends leiſure to declare: of which the Perſian was moſt doubted. In the meane time Abaſſa Baſſa aduanced and tooke the city of Angria, which was ſurrendred vnto him as ſoon as hee came before it; but the Caſtle held out againſt him: and it was reported, he wept at the gates thereof, publi-ſhing the cauſe of his taking vp of armes, which he ſaid was onely in reuenge of the blood of Oſman; deſiring ſuch as fauored him to come on his ſide (diuiding the people) the reſt to depart in peace euery man to his own houſe. He did no harm, nor tooke the value of a penny: his G army was very great, and euery Ianizary that he could catch, he ſacrificed to the ghoſt of the dead Emperor. Men report, he was firſt aduertiſed by a dream to reuenge: after that, Oſman appeared vnto him, and laſtly Mahomet. He called himſelf the poor Mechmet, deputed to reform the world from the great God. The Aſtrologers publikely augured his proſperitie, and euery mans diſcourſe was ful of fabulous fears and prophecies. It was ſaid he would come to the Port and demand audience by juſtice, and haue the cauſe betwixt him and the murtherers of their prince tried by law; and that if he were condemned as a rebell, hee would lay downe his head; if they as traitors, he would execute the reuenge. And it was generally thought, out of the coldneſſe of the Emperor and all the Viſiers, that he was ſecretly maintained by them, and H came to fulfil Oſmans deſigne, to wreſt the gouernment from the mutined ſouldier, and to root out their Order. For all the lawyers and churchmen ſmiled, and rather rejoiced than feared.

The Ianizaries openly murmured, that they were betraied, and accuſed many, yet they eſcaped; and now few ſpoke againſt him as againſt a Rebell. Yet the firſt of Nouember, whether for colour or earneſt, the great Viſiers tents were paſt ouer the water in haſt, with thoſe of the Aga of the Ianizaries, and all the force which could be then made at the Port, commanded to winter on the other ſide in Bruſcia, to amuſe the rebels, and ſtay them til the ſpring; perhaps being willing the blow ſhould be taken on the other ſide, to ſaue the city from a general ſack.

It was afterwards conſidered, that to preuail againſt Abaſſa Baſſa with arms was a doubtful matter, and therſore the Sultan ſent vnto him a Capigi Baſſa, with a Veſt, ſword, and a Letter; I giuing him thanks for the loue ſhewed to his brother and his bloud, but now the reuenge belonged to himſelf, of which he would take care; and therefore deſired him, if he were a true ſubiect, to return to his gouernment of Arzirum, and to diſſolue his army, and there to reſt til further occaſion of ſeruice. Vpon this order from the Emperor he excuſed himſelf, That the incommoditie of winter would not ſuffer him to retyre, but promiſed to liue in peace vntill the Spring, and then he would return in obedience to his gouernment.

The Emir of Sidon takes the city and caſtle of Damaſcus.

During theſe troubles, the Emir of Sidon poſſeſſed himſelfe of the city and caſtle of Damaſcus, with ſome other places and forts, as it were in an inſtant; threatning Ieruſalem, hauing demanded ſupplies, or at leaſt neutralitie from the Baſſa of Aleppo. This defection was of greateſt conſequence, becauſe he was a prince of deſcent, and a pretender in right vnto thoſe K Countries; who had four or fiue good ports to let in Chriſtian ſuccors; with whome it was thought he had intelligence, hauing in the time of Achmat retyred to Florence and Rome; and that he was in ſome meaſure able to ſubſiſt of himſelf, hauing 30000 ſoldiers in his army, and a good foundation and eſtate of his own to maintain them. And yet his actions were only lamented at the Port, and no order taken to ſtop or reduce them, excepting ſome Letters & promiſes, the ordinary remedie that was then applied to thoſe manifold troubles. For that State was then in a kind of lethargie, hauing no ſence nor wil to make ſhew to feele the inward diſeaſes conſuming it; either becauſe they were vnable for want of money (the treaſure being much exhauſted) or that they miſtruſted their own ſouldiers, euery day apter to mutine than to fight; or that the neighborhood of Abaſſa Baſſa did amuſe and confound them: and ſo many L circumſtances croſſed one another as the ſymptomes of confuſion, all things being equally feared, and nothing thorowly vndertaken. Yet a little more ſencible they were of Abaſſa the enemie that was neereſt, whoſe followers took a paſſage and bridge about foure daies journey from Conſtantinople, as if he meant either to poſſeſſe himſelf thereof for his own meanes to aduance his army, or to keep it that none ſuddenly from the other ſide might aſſail him: but how ſoeuer, it manifeſted that he was not yet quiet, nor reſolued to obey, as he had promiſed.
This new attempt of his was very hotly taken at the Port, and many councels held; but (as all things do there) the fury once paſt, the warmth cooled by degrees in 3 or 4 daies, ſo that only a few more Ianizaries were ſent away to make gariſon, and to defend the paſſages; with whom were imploied the falſe French regiment and their Colonel, all the force they could then wel M ſpare. No Spahies entred into that quarrell, as if theſe were purpoſely expoſed to bee cut in pieces: which many beleeued, by the faintnes and diſunited maner of their proceedings; or els that they went out of themſelues, knowing the danger to be moſt iminent vpon them, & that the Emperor and his Councel did ſtil conniue with the actions of that Baſſa.

Bechir-

A Bechir-Subbaſſa who had reuolted in Babylon, and held that caſtle againſt the Emperor all the laſt ſummer, hauing bin ſtreitly beſieged by Haſis Achmat Baſſa, and in danger to be forced, ſent his ſon to Sha-Abas the king of Perſia for ſuccors: wherupon he obtained ſome Perſian horſe. Vpon diſcouery of which, the Baſſa fearing he ſhould be compelled to raiſe his ſiege, betook himſelf to diſſimulation, as if he had ſuch authoritie from the grand Signior; he made a compoſition, and not only pardoned Bechir, and all offences paſt, but conferred the gouernement of that city and prouince vpon him as Baſſa, and ſo retyred his army. Yet although Bechir-Subbaſſi was content to free himſelfe from the preſent neceſſity by treaty, yet really hee held the place for the Perſian, and to his vſe; whoſe Agent at the Port demaunded both that and Abiska, as the antient patrimonie of his Anceſtors.

B Bethlem Gabor hauing with great expedition marched ouer Hungary, and reduced moſt part thereof to his obedience, except the townes of Presburgh, Rab, Comoran, and ſome few other forts; his army conſiſting of 33000 Tranſyluanians and Hungars, and almoſt as many Turks and Tartars voluntarily following for booty; met with no ſhew of reſiſtance vntil he approched Tyrnavia, within four daies march of the borders of Auſtria: whither ſending before ſome regiments of his horſe, to the number of foure thouſand, to ſummon the town, they diſcouered ſome Imperiall troupes ſent to make gariſon therein, being ſome 2300 foot and 200 horſe, and arriued within half an Engliſh mile; betweene whom and the city they thruſt themſelues. Theſe troups perceiuing they were ſuddenly preuented, and not knowing how far the Princes whole army was behind, tooke downe to a ſmall village, and fortified themſelues in a C church and church-yard walled. The commander of the Hungars diſpatched away a Currier to Bethlem Gabor, with aduiſe that he ſhould ſend him ſome foot with expedition; relating the maner how he had incloſed this garriſon. In the mean time he ſummoned the Imperaliſts, and told them that he had taken poſſeſſion of Tyrnavia for his maſter: And at the ſame time ſummoned the town and told them, that their ſuccors ſent had yeelded vnto him; keeping all intelligence one from another, and both from attempting any thing. The next day, the Prince with his Vantgard arriued in ſight, and then this Colonel ſent ſome troups to make gard before one of the ports very neer the wall. Thoſe Germans ſhut vp in the Church-yard, ſeeing the enemies horſe vnder the command of the town, and no ſhot made at them, beleeued that it was true that the place was rendred: ſo before the foot came forth to force them, they D yeelded themſelues and tooke pay of the Prince, all except ſixe and thirty of the principall, who had licence to depart. Thoſe beeing then won, the Citiſens the next day opened their gates, and receiued Bethlem Gabor for their Lord; and thus theſe were gained without any ſtroke. From thence he marched directly toward Moravia, and ſent before him a daies journey, eight thouſand horſe to diſcouer and ſpoile. The Emperor finding theſe beginnings vrgent, ordered the brother of the prince of Licheſtein, to draw downe his garriſons from Bohemia and Moravia to the frontire; and ſent the Marquis of Montenegro, with Colalto, Don Baltheſar de Maradas, the Count Slick, Walſtein, Tiffenbacke, Count Torquato kinſman to the Pope, Sampach, and all his principal Captains to meet them, and to form an army for defence. There was gathered together fifteene thouſand beſides the baggage; who being lodged at the foot E of an hill in the borders of Moravia, and many of their ſouldiers ſtragling to gather grapes, were by the Auantcurriers of Bethlem Gabor diſcouered, and preſently beſet, who took & ſlew ſeuen hundred. Some eſcaped and gaue the alarme, or elſe the whole Imperiall Campe had beene ſurpriſed without Sentinell or gard; theſe hauing proued as ſeruiceable as the Geeſe to the Capitol. The Hungars hauing gotten the top of the hil, and ſeeing the Bohemian and German army ſo neer in the bottom, and in ſome confuſion, reſolued to make triall how they were prouided, and made ſhew of a charge; but finding them in better order to receiue them, they retyred: one Captain only aduenturing too neer, was taken priſoner, and carried to the Imperial quarter: who being examined, told them, that the prince with a mighty army would the next night be in ſight; and therefore hee aduiſed them to prepare for their ſafety, for that F he came with a reſolution to fight, and ouermatching them with their number, there was no poſſibility of other than death or captiuity. The Imperials rather ſcorned than beleeued theſe threatnings; but the captain aſſuring them it was no time to jeſt with his own life and theirs, they remoued the next morning, and marched toward a town called Ghoding, vpon the Riuer of Moran that diuides Hungary from Morauia, about which was a ſmall trench, and within it a caſtle of ſome defence. The horſe of Bethlem Gabor ſeeing them mooue towards that place, preſſed in a gallop before them, and ſet all the houſes on fire, which burned a day and a night, vntill the whole was conſumed. In the meane time Bethlem Gabor arriued with his army; and the Imperialiſts ſtood in battalion to expect their fortune: but the fire being ended, gaue them leaue to enter among the ruines and aſhes, and to make the beſt of neceſſitie, where they fortified themſelues, hauing no ſtore of prouiſion. In this eſtate being cloſed about thirteen daies, it was diſcouered to Gabor by a priſoner, that they were in great want, and that the ſoldiers began to mutine; demanding of their captains either to lead them out to fight, and die like men, or to make ſuch a party for them, as their preſent condition would admit. Don Balthaſar General of the horſe, in the name of all the commanders, gathered the army together, and acknowledging to them, firſt the great vertue they had ſhewed to abide at once the aſſaults of perill and famine, for their honour; and proteſting that their caſe and their Generals, was all one for matter of allowance, intreated them to ſtrengthen themſelues with hope and conſtancie, and required of them an vniuerſall promiſe, that they would abide with patience, vntill the end of October then at hand: if in that time, neither God nor the Emperour ſent them ſuccours, he would make ſome compoſition for them; not doubting to finde Bethlem Gabor a Chriſtian and a ſouldier, though an enemy; and to this propoſition they all gaue their words and faith. The reaſon of this ſhort obtained time, proceeded not from any thought of ſupply from the Emperour, but from an opinion and cuſtome, that the Turks would breake vp their campe vpon Saint Demetrius day the ſix and twentieth of the month of October; neuer vſing to ſtay longer in the field for the incommodities of Winter; and that now they ſerued in the nature of voluntaries, and had gotten their prey, it was likely nothing could hold them from riſing: but if that hope failed them, they then reſolued to giue the ſoldiers leaue to make quarter for themſelues; the Generals and commanders purpoſing to retire into the caſtle with ſome competent numbers, which they doubted not to keepe vntill ſupplies or weather ſhould force the enemy to diſlodge. The Prince of Tranſyluania knowing likewiſe that at that time he ſhould haue trouble enouh to ſtay his ſuccours, and if they ſtaied, hee feared they would prooue ill Winter gueſts, and diſcredit him with his Hungars, whom they indifferently ſpoyled, tooke counſell either to force the enemie by that day, or to winne them by policie; but the later was the ſafer way: for it ſeemed he had no deſire to put ſo many perſons of qualitie into the power of the Turks, whoſe priſoners by agreement they muſt remaine; and hauing alſo intelligence, vpon what hopes the Imperialiſts held out, hee counterwrought with the Turks, to giue him a promiſe to abide with him fifteene daies after Saint Demetrius; in which time he pretended to deliuer the Fort and all into their hands; conjecturing as it ſeemed, that before that day the Germanes would make ſome ouerture, out of which hee might worke his owne aduantage, and obtaine his owne ends, and they would admire and feare his power and credit in the Turkiſh army: for doubtleſſe hee might haue forced them if he had pleaſed, but then he had made his eſtate deſperat of any reconciliation with the Emperour, and muſt reſolue to continue the warre; vncertaine of the conſtancie of the Turks, aſſured, they being once retired, would very late draw againe into the field; and perhaps hee doubted the various ſucceſſe of warre, and of the ſetling of the State of the Grand Signior in Aſia, where all things were in diſtemper; and was ſomewhat carefull of his reputation in Chriſtendome, which he knew was farre aduentured in this action: for which aboue twenty thouſand poore ſoules loſt their libertie, and endangered their faith. Therfore he made vſe of his time and his wit, and the Imperials finding themſelues deceiued in the hope of breaking vp of the camp, now no longer able to ſuſtain their wants, ſent Commiſſioners to him in the Emperors name, to treat ſome agreement. Hee ſeeing his fifteene dayes weare out apace, and the Turks beginning to diſlodge, accepted the offer; and that very day to giue ſatisfaction to the Port, diſpeeded one of his chamber in poſt to make knowne to the Vizier (a man not vneaſie to abuſe) that hee had done his vtmoſt, to detaine the Turks to winter in Hungarie; but being not able longer to hold them together, hee was forced to come to a treaty: for to venture to aſſault the trenches, was full of perill; to riſe without ſome concluſion, were to quit the place, to honour the enemie, and to weaken his owne reputation: to continue the ſiege after the depar-

A ture of his ſuccours, would haſard his owne Army into mutinie: therefore he was reſolued to make a truce for eight moneths; that ſeeing the grand Signior had conſented to receiue the Emperors Embaſſadour, time might be allowed for treaty and final concluſion. He gaue him inſtruction to ſay, That as then he had not fully agreed, but that it was reſolued on to be don, onely with a formall reſeruation of the approuement of the Viſiers, without which it ſhould be held as not done. That he ſhould require the finall reſolution of the Port, Whether the grand Signior would continue conſtant, and maintain him in the war or not. If they reſolued vpon Warre, then to demand prouiſion of munition, money, ſouldiers, and all other neceſſaries, in ſeaſon and in a meaſure, in thoſe times impoſſible. If they deſired peace, that they ſhould giue a draught of what conditions they affected. But withall, an abſolute power vnto B himſelfe to mitigate them, and to make ſuch other at his diſcretion as the neceſſity of the affairs and time required for the profit of the Empire. The Prince at the firſt arriuall of the Commiſſioners of the beſieged at his Quarter, diſcouered ſome jealouſie and diſcontent in ſome of his followers: Wherupon he called before him moſt of his Commanders, and deſired them not to miſtruſt him; he ſhewed ſome reaſons why he might be inforced to make a truce, but proteſted he would neuer depoſe armes, nor conclude a finall peace with the Emperour, except he would alſo diſarm, and leaue thoſe prouinces and the Empire in quiet. For though it were a hard choice for him to be bitten by a Wolfe or by a Dog, (which were his owne words) yet ſeeing he could better truſt the one than the other, hee would make vſe of one to curb the other. This gaue not full ſatisfaction; but the words of a Prince muſt bee currant C payment, becauſe they beare his ſtampe; for his meaning, or what he treated, he truſted none withall but his own breſt. The meſſenger hee ſent vnto the Port, played his part ſo well and ſecretly, as he gaue ſatisfaction to that State, ready enough to beleeue well, and procured a ratification of the Truce ſuppoſed then to be made: and for inſtructions in the intended treaty, he propounded in his maſters name three articles, and one Commiſſion. Firſt, That the Emperor ſhould diſclaime all right and title to Hungary, and ſhould leaue the people free, and the Prince of Tranſylvania to gouern them. Secondly, That the Princes and all the prouinces that had ſent their Embaſſadours and preſents to the Port, and had made league with him, and had taken the Imperial protection, ſhould bee reſtored to their priſtine liberty and eſtates. Thirdly, That the emperor ſhould pay a tribute of forty thouſand dollars for Auſtria, D pretended to be granted in the daies of Sultan Solyman. But the Commiſſion was the key of the work, wherby the Prince, with the counſel of the Baſſa of Buda, obtained ful power at his own diſcretion, if he found peace conuenient, to make and conclude it, this laſt being (as was ſuppoſed) the end and ſcope of Bethlem Gabors deſires: the other propoſitions onely a garniſhing, to make the Turks beleeue that he was careful of their honor and ſeruice; and the Emperor, that he was very powerfull, and much eſteemed at the Port. Which all men imagined would produce an end of thoſe wars: for the prince of Tranſylvania confeſſed, That hee drew not in the Turkes for any need he had of their ſuccours, nor for any benefit intended to them, but to make a glorious ſhew to the Emperour, of his credit with the grand Signior, therby to facilitate his ends.

E After ſome time ſpent in treaty with the Commiſſioners of the army, a truce was taken between the prince of Tranſylvania and the Marquis de Monte Negro, General for his Imperiall Maieſty, before the town of Ghoding on the frontier of Morauia, where the Germans were beſieged; and letters preſently written therof by the prince to the great Viſier, which were dated the tenth of Nouember. The mediator between them was the Palatine Staniſlaus Turzow an Hungarian. The articles of greateſt importance, or that were then publiſhed to the world, were foure:

A truce betweene the Emperor and the Prince of Tranſylvania.

I. That on both parts armes ſhould be depoſed for ten months (ending the ſixt of September F 1624.) and all other acts of hoſtility giuen ouer. That there ſhould of neither ſide any attempt be made, nor by force nor fraud to take any caſtles, forts, cities, or places of defence during this time; and that both Germans, Hungars, and Turks ſhould be alike comprehended.

The Articles of the truce.

II. That if the Emperour were deſirous to treat and conclude a finall peace with the Graund Signior,

Signior, he ſhould vſe Bethlem Gabor as the mediator, and doe nothing therein without his priuitie.

III. That all the places and forts taken in by the Prince of Tranſylvania in his late expedition, ſhould reſt quiet in his poſſeßion vntil the time expired. And that all cities and caſtles now in the poſſeßion of either, ſhould ſo remain without any alteration.

IV. That all paſſages ſhould be open for free trade and ſecure intercourſe of Merchants, and all other the ſubiects and friends of either ſide.

This done, the Prince of Tranſylvania made a ſhew of redeeming all the poor captiues taken by the Turks, at his own charge, with ſome help from the Imperials, vpon whom hee layd the blame, as hauing failed to meet him vpon a paſſage of water, where hee entertained the Turkiſh army; but they not comming, he pretended the Turkes roſe in the night and carried them all away, to the number of twenty thouſand.

The Prince warned the Turks to keepe in order, and not to ſtraggle in their retreit, nor to commit any inſolencie and ſpoil, the country being all in arms, and already inraged. But they followed not his counſel; which cauſed ſome 2000 Hungarian horſe to ſet vpon them as they were diuided, and ſlew fiue or ſix hundred of them, and recouered ſome priſoners: whereupon the Turks vnited and returned, and killed as many of the Hungars, took one man of qualitie, and many other ſlaues.

The King of Perſia inuades the prouince of Babylon.

Vpon aduice from Haſis Baſſa General of the prouince of Babylon, That the King of Perſia with a powerful army had entred thoſe quarters, and that both the city & that country would be loſt, if aids did not ariue very ſpeedily; and the rebels in Aſia continuing their inſolencie, a War was ſuddenly proclaimed at the Port, in ſuch termes as neuer had bin heard of in former times; to ſay, That whoſoeuer took pay of the grand Signior in any kinde as a ſouldier, if he came not to the rendevous appointed, with his arms, he ſhould be confiſcated, eſteemed as a Rebel, and his wife and children ſold for ſlaues. This was ſent into Greece, Natolia, Trabizond, and all the vtmoſt confines of the Turkiſh Empire. Herupon the grand Signior and the wiſeſt of the Baſſa's inclined to buy Abaſſa Baſſa, and to ſend him a generall pardon and grant of all his demands, vpon condition, That he would preſently march and turn his army againſt the common enemy: fearing either the doubtfulnes of a battel with deſperat men, or to force him to retyre and join with the Perſian, where he might be wel receiued. And as the preſent condition of the ſtate then ſtood, the counſel was good: but the Ianizaries would not conſent nor hearken to any reconcilement with their profeſt enemy; but required to be led out againſt Abaſſa Baſſa firſt, and ſo to proceed in the war: and becauſe their own Aga, brother in law vnto the Emperour, did not concurre with them in opinion, they mutined againſt him, who wiſely gaue way to the ſtorm, and ſurrendred his charge, to which a Page of the court was preſently aduanced. Thus whilſt it was vnreſolued how to proceed againſt the Perſian and Abaſſa Baſſa jointly, who continued to ſpoil and put to ranſom all the leſſer Aſia, and could not be reconciled for the Ianizaries, nor ſafely attempted for the Spahies (between which two orders there was as yet bad intelligence and emulation) the king of Perſia conquered the prouince and city of Babylon, put to flight Haſis Achmet Baſſa the General of that defenſiue war, & tooke priſoner Chur Haſſen Baſſa a renowned old ſouldier, cut in pieces all that oppoſed him, poſſeſſed himſelf of * Moſul, and Leska on the Perſian ſea, and diuiding his army, ſent part toward Van and Diarbeck, and the other toward Mecha; as if he had hope and deſigne to ſhare all the Eaſtern part of the Turkiſh empire.

* Niniuie.

His Maieſtie the King of great Brittain hauing by his firſt letters in 1621, complained to the grand Signior, and commanded his Embaſſador to ſeek redreſſe againſt the piracies and inſolencies of the inhabitants of Algier and Tunes, who in the two former yeares had taken aboue an hundred ſhips and Veſſells of all ſorts, and had made ſlaues of aboue twelue hundred of his Maieſties ſubiects, and had then vpon their wharfes a thouſand pieces of iron ordnance, beſides thoſe in their ſhipping, taken from the Engliſh and Dutch; The Embaſſadour preſſing to obtain juſtice againſt them, or that they might be abandoned and left to the

iuſtice

A juſtice of his Maieſty, without offence of the Port; the great Viſier offred to giue what commands ſhould be required. But he knowing how weake effect thoſe letters of courſe had produced in other occaſions, and how little obedience and reſpect thoſe common Theeues did beare vnto the Port (the Baſſa's themſelues conniuing, and nouriſhing therby their own gain) eſpecially conſidering, that what face and ſeeming diſlike ſoeuer was ſhewed and pretended, yet inwardly the Turks did take pleaſure and glory, that the Chriſtian was robbed, weakned, and ſpoiled, vnder the ſhadow of peace; did vtterly refuſe to accept of ſuch feigned remedies, but inſiſted vpon two points, wherby only there might be ſome hope of redreſſe in that affaire.

Firſt, That the grand Signior would ſend an expreſſe Chiaus to Algier and Tunes, to call B to the Port ſome of the principal inhabitants and aduenturers of all the Orders of thoſe Cities, ſuch as ſent and armed out the ſhips of courſe; that being conuented face to face, and accuſed & conuinced of the fact, the State might be truly informed of the conſequence of their outragious theeuery, and prouide ſuch remedie as ſhould be requiſite and ſufficient in the future, to ſecure the commerce and free nauigation in thoſe ſeas.

Secondly, That the Baſſa's who were ſent from the Port rather for cuſtome and pretence of dominion, than for any great fruit or hope of obedience (yet becauſe they returned at the end of their gouernment, they might be reſponſible for matters concerning themſelues) might receiue ſtrict and abſolute order, not to take the tenths of the prizes, becauſe being diſ-intereſſed, and ſharing no profit, there might be more hope, by their authoritie, of execution of the C grand Signiors pleaſure in reſtraint of their robberies.

Theſe propoſitions at firſt found much oppoſition, but the Embaſſador refuſing all other ordinary & vneffectiue means, required either this form of proceeding, or that the grand Signior would declare them out of his protection, and ſtanding neutrall, leaue them to their own defence: proteſting, That this courſe was offered for good reſpect to the Port; yet if really ſome order were not eſtabliſhed, that there was no remedie but to redreſſe theſe injuries by the ſword, and to puniſh thoſe Barbarians as Inimici humani generis, publique enemies to mankind. Deſiring the Viſiers to take it to ſerious conſideration, that ſeeing amitie and correſpondence between the kingdom of England and the Turkiſh empire, did principally and almoſt integrally depend vpon commerce and traffique, the whole foundation was ſhaken and D made vſeleſſe to both, by the interruption of thoſe theeues. Theſe reaſons concurring with the diſtemper of thoſe times, and their own fears, ſo far preuailed, that by a general conſultation it was concluded, to ſatisfie the Embaſſador in his own waies; and accordingly a meſſenger was diſpatched from the Port, to call to juſtice ſome of all the orders, to anſwer as Deputies for the Cities, before the Viſier and Divan, in ſuch accuſations as ſhould be obiected againſt them.

This negotiation was begun and finiſhed, as much as concerned the authority of the grand Signior, Anno 1622; but being not perfected and tranſlated vntil the next, and that time full of various mutations, we haue thought fit to continue the thred of the former hiſtory, and not to mingle and confound it with relations of ſeueral and vnlike ſubiects and relations: and al- E though this part be found a little out of his own time, yet both wil be the clearer by the diſſeueration.

The Baſſa and inhabitants of Algier hauing receiued letters by Mehemet Aga, both reprehending them for inſolencies committed vpon the Engliſh nation, and commanding them to keep the peace of the Empire, and to bring with him ſome of the principall of that gouernement, did elect foure and twenty Commiſſioners (amongſt whom the Mufti was both head and Aduocate) and gaue them inſtructions and order to recriminate and accuſe the Engliſh of many depredations and iniuries: hoping thereby either to extenuate their own offence, or by pretending iuſt cauſe, to leaue themſelues at libertie to continue their piracies. And the Baſſa and city of Tunes hauing receiued by the ſaid meſſenger reprehenſions and commands F to the like effect, they reſolued to conſult with their fellowes of Algier, and in their paſſage to Conſtantinople, to joyne to them two of their Councell, and gaue them inſtructions to bee aſſiſtant. But with this caution, That they ſhould not declare themſelues openly, but to obſerue the proceedings of thoſe of Algier, and to conforme with them; that if they were inforced to make peace, they ſhould concur and be comprehended; but if it were poſſible for both to eſcape, that they ſhould leaue the breach open, and themſelues at libertie.

They arriued together at Conſtantinople in the month of Nouember, in that yeare in the reign of Muſtapha, and made their firſt addreſſes priuatly to the Engliſh Embaſſador, ſubtilly pretending to end all differences ſecretly with him, becauſe they were vnwilling to anſwer and diſcouer to juſtice, what infinite ſpoiles they had gotten; and that if they could accommodate with him, and treat without the authoritie of the Port, they reſolued to promiſe any thing, which they meant not to obſerue; and ſo eſcaping for the preſent, they hoped to doe more miſchiefe, by the aduantage of the ſecuritie of the Engliſh, and their owne breach of faith. But the Embaſſador refuſed to treat with them, as being ſubiects, and not ſui juris, and to giue them any hearing, but in the preſence and by the mediation of the great Viſier, Wherupon they applied themſelues, and returned to their reſolution of complaint, and the Embeſſador proſecuting their accuſation, after many meetings and diſputes, by the interpoſition of Halil Baſſa, there was an Amneſtia accepted on both parts, and a peace concluded on the Articles and conditions following; which were ratified by the proper ſignature of the grand Signior Muſtapha, and re-confirmed by Sultan Morat, proclaimed in Tunes and Algier, and recommended by ſeuerall letters from the Viſier and Captaine Baſſa, to the Baſſa's, Caddees, and Councell of both cities.

Imperiall Commands ſent by the Grand Signior to the Baſſa's of Tunes and Algier, Caddees, Aga of the Ianizaries, Dyes, Captaines, Antients, and other gouernors.

OVr high and Imperiall Firm° being come vnto you, know, That from the time of our great Grandfather, Grandfather, and Father of happy memory, the Kings of England haue alwaies bin firme and conſtant with all ſinceritie, in friendſhip, league and correſpondencie with the Imperiall Port, our glorious progenitors, and with our Maieſtie. And in conformitie of the Imperiall Capitulations, League, and peace heretofore agreed vpon betweene both parties, and alwaies vntill now obſerued of vs; Foraſmuch as the Engliſh nation, their Merchants and ſubiects, with their merchandiſe, ſhips, and goods, are free to come and go, traffique and negotiate ſafe and ſecure in all the parts of our Empire; it hauing neuer been our Imperiall will and permiſſion, that by any of our ſubiects or ſlaues they ſhould at any time be troubled, ſpoiled, or damnified. Which Nation, whileſt vnder the ſhadow of our juſtice and protection they paſſe through the ſeas with their ſhippes and goods, for traffique and negotiation, diuers of you my ſlaues of Algier and Tunes, without conſideration or reſpect of the friendſhip, peace, and League betweene vs and the ſaid King, whereſoeuer you meet with the ſhips of the ſaid Nation, either at ſea, or in any port or hauen, take the ſaid Ships, ſpoiling them of their goods and merchandiſe, making ſlaues and killing the men which you finde in their ſhips, a thing not onely vniuſt, but alſo contrary to our Imperiall capitulations. Wherfore that for the time to come the ſaid Nation ſhall not be ſo vniuſtly ſpoiled and indammaged, there haue bin ſent to you diuers times our Imperiall and expreſſe commands: but you ſhewing your ſelues arrogant and diſobedient, (as we vnderſtand) do ſtill continue to rob and ſpoile the ſaid Engliſh, contrary to our ſaid capitulations, intention, and will. The concourſe of merchants and traffike being the nutriment and ſplendor of kingdoms; you ſhall vnderſtand, That it is by no means our Imperiall will, that the ſaid Nation, now in league and friendſhip with vs, be any more in like ſort, contrary to aur capitulation, will, and promiſe, ſpoiled and moleſted. Which iniuries and other wrongs don vnto them, beeing a great diſhonor to our ſtate and Imperiall Maieſtie, all you haue not only deſeruedly fallen into our iuſt diſpleaſure, but alſo are worthy of all diſgrace, ſhame and puniſhment. And to the end hereafter all things may be performed by you, according to the tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations, and that all ſuch as haue committed ſuch inſolencies and ſpoiles, be apprehended and worthily puniſhed, we haue at this preſent vnder our Imperiall hand affirmed and commanded, and haue ſent you this our Imperiall commandement by this bearer Mehemet Aga, who as ſoon as you ſhall be there arriued, we command you that you call together all, great and ſmall, noble and mean, which dwell in the ſaid places of Algier and Tunes, and publikely in the preſence of them all, with a loud voice you ſhall reade this our Imperiall commandement; and after that, with the aſsiſtance and aid of this our Meſſenger, you haue deliuered into the hands of the Engliſh men, there appointed for the ſame, without further excuſe and delay, all ſuch Engliſhmen, their goods and merchandiſes and ſhips; which haue beene taken, contrary to our Imperiall Capitulations, from the ſaid Nation; all thoſe tranſgreſſors and malefectors, whoſoeuer they be, who haue committed theſe outrages, and cauſed ſuch diſturbance to the peace, league, and friendſhip, you ſhall without any fauour chaſtiſe and puniſh according to their deſerts. And afterward ye ſhall haue care, that the Nation, Merchants, and ſubjects of England be not ſo vnjuſtly ſpoiled, hurt, or moleſted, contrary to our Imperiall promiſe and will. Therefore you ſhall publikely proteſt and declare vnto all, That hereafter no man do trouble or moleſt them, but rather meeting them in any place whatſoeuer by ſea or land, to helpe and ſuccour them, obſeruing the termes of true peace and friendſhip, according to the tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations; and that euery one take heed and beware, that he do, or permit nothing to be done contrary to our will, peace, and Imperiall Cipitulations. And eſpecially you ſhall looke and procure all things to be obſerued, conformable to this our Imperiall will. And if, according to the antient cuſtome, the King of England will eſtabliſh there any Conſull, we command, that the ſaid Conſull, as alſo the Merchants, and other ſubjects, be accepted, aſsiſted, and protected at all times, according to the intention of our Imperiall Capitulation. And all of you, with all your care, endeauour, and diligence, ſhall alwaies prouide that the ſaid Nation may paſſe free and ſecure vnder our Imperiall protection and ſhaddow, and traffique and negotiate, buy and ſell through all the parts of our Dominions, to their content and full ſatisfaction. And if after the date of this our Imperiall Commandement, we ſhall vnderſtand that the ſaid Nation be again robbed and ſpoiled by you; be you hereof aſſured, that our true ſlaues and ſubjects are thoſe which do obey our Lawes and Commands, and obſerue our will, as alſo it is written in our Alcaron, Obey God, the Prophet, and your Souereigne Lord: But thoſe that doe not obey nor obſerue our Lawes and commandements, are not our ſlaues nor ſubjects, but rather by their diſobedience do fall into our diſpleaſure, diſgrace and malediction. For which, our Imperiall Commands ſhall be ſent throughout all the parts of our Empire, eſpecially to Tunes and Algier, and to all the Ports of Natolia and Gracia, and to what places ſoeuer elſe they ſhall come, to be alwaies driuen from thence, abandoned, and puniſhed, and by all our Officers and Gouernors perſecuted. Therefore take you heed, that you ſay not hereafter you were not warned hereof before hand, but giue notice publikely vnto all men, of the effect of this our command, and looke that you cauſe euery man to be obedient thereunto. By which doing, you ſhall be bleſſed of God, and obtaine our fauour: for if the ſaid Engliſh Nation be againe troubled and moleſted, and the King of England do ſend any forces againſt thoſe tranſgreſſors, to chaſtiſe and puniſh them, do you conſider that it ſhall diſpleaſe vs, that ye are the cauſe to diſturbe the peace and friendſhip betweene vs. Therefore take heed and beware of all ſuch actions as may any way tend to the diſturbance and violating of our ſaid Peace and friendſhip. And it being our chiefeſt deſire, that this buſineſſe be duely fulfilled and effected when this our Imperiall commandement ſhall come vnto you, and that you haue performed our will therein, and ſhall haue deliuered into the hands of the Engliſhmen, all ſuch men, ſhips, and goods as haue beene taken from them; you ſhall aduiſe vs particularly and punctually thereof, and in what manner you haue ſatisfied and contented them, and ſend the ſame to our Imperiall Port. And all this let be knowne vnto you, giuing alwaies credit and obedience to our Imperiall Firmo.

Written the laſt of the Moone Gemaziel Abir, from the departure of the Prophet 1031. Giuen at our Imperiall City of Conſtantinople.

The Capitulations or agreement of the peace made with Tunes and Algier at Conſtantinople, and accepted and ſigned by the Commiſsioners of Algier and Tunes.

LEt infinite laud and praiſe be alway giuen to the moſt omnipotent God, who of his great mercy and grace hath bleſſed this World with peace and tranquility, for the ſafety and repoſe of his people: Jn conformity to whoſe diuine will and pleaſure, the moſt inuincible and mighty Emperor hath alwaies entertained peace and amity with all thoſe who haue deſired his friendſhip, that both rich and poore, and all ſorts of people might liue at their eaſe and G content, to giue thankes, and ſerue the diuine Majeſty. Which moſt bleſſed peace and correſpondence hath euer been obſerued by all the Ottoman Emperors. Therefore whereas heretofore in the happy time, of famous memory, of Sultan Morat Han now tranſlated into Paradiſe (vpon whoſe ſoule let the diuine mercies be multiplied) the Kings of England, according to that truth and integrity infuſed into them, hauing alwaies made demonſtration of their loue and ſincerity to this happy Port, then, on both ſides there was concluded and eſtabliſhed a true peace and amity, and from that time to this preſent haue maintained their Embaſſadors here: And whereas there was then granted and giuen to the Engliſh Nation an Jmperiall H Capitulation and priuiledge (To ſay) That the ſubjects and Merchants of England, with their ſhips and faculties might freely and ſecurely nauigate in our ſeas, and traffique and negotiate at their owne pleaſure and content, in any part of the Imperiall dominion: Notwithſtanding, ſome yeares paſt there haue hapned ſome diſcontents and quarrels betweene the ſaid Engliſh Nation and the Souldiery of Tunes and Algier; and thereupon haue ſucceeded diuers acts of hoſtility, and mutuall damages, contrary to the honour of the ſaid Jmperiall Capitulation: for which cauſe, the mighty and famous Prince, among the Princes of the faith of Jeſus, obeyed of the greateſt followers of the Meſſiah, only Gouernour of the important I affaires of the Nazaren Nation, Souereigne of the limits of honour and power, Lord of greatneſſe and authority, the benigne and ſincere friend, the glorious IAMES King of England, to whoſe affaires we wiſh all proſperity, and whoſe laſt daies may be filled with honour and felicity, hath ſent to this happy and high Port his elect, eſteemed, and prudent Embaſſador Sir Thomas Rowe, Knight, with his Royall Letters; complaining vehemently againſt the ſaid Souldiery of Algier and Tunes. The ſubſtance of which Letters being ſignified to the Imperiall Majeſty of our Emperor, he with his owne proper hand Imperiall Seale hath expreſſely commanded, and giuen his Imperiall order, that the people of Algier and Tunes K for the future ſhould alway be obedient and obſeruant, according to the Imperiall Capitulations, and ſhould neuer commit nor make ſhew of any act contrary thereunto. Which Imperiall command and Edict being ſent to thoſe cities by one Mutafaraca, of the high court, and our eſteemed Capigi Baſſa Mahomet Aga; who arriuing there, and cauſing the Imperiall Commands to be read with a loud voice, in publique Councell, and in preſence of the Beglerbegh and the whole ſouldiery of the countries, euery one of them with all readineſſe and ſubmiſſion did ſhew themſelues obedient to the ſaid Orders and Edicts of his Jmperiall Majeſty.

But withall replied, That while we did remaine conſtant and firme in the Peace with the Engliſh Nation, ſome of their Ships, contrary to the Capitulation, league, and Frendſhip L long ſince contracted on both parts, haue done diuers damages and injuries vnto vs. And whereas from vs there ſhall neuer any action proceed contrary to the ſaid Imperiall Capitulations, the ſaid Engliſh Nation oftentimes made warre vpon vs; for which cauſe wee haue alſo been inforced to reuenge our ſelues: but now our deſire is, That his Imperiall Majeſty may be truely informed of our ſtate and cauſe in this buſineſſe, and accordingly let his Majeſty diſpoſe and order vs at his owne will and pleaſure: for we will alwaies remaine, and be obſeruant and obedient. To which purpoſe they haue joyntly and with one conſent, choſen the wiſe and honourable Lord, reuerend among the prudent, the prouinciall Mufti called M Seich Seidi, and the honourable and diſcreet, the Mufti of the City, Seich Salmi, and the two Caddees, Judges of the Prouinces, two that haue beene Gouernors, two Colonels of the army, two Captaines of foot, aſſiſted with other Antients, both Burgeſſes and ſouldiers, whom they haue

A haue with one conſent created and eſtabliſhed as their Generall Procurators and Commiſſioners; and in company of the ſaid Mahomet Aga, ſent to this happy Port: who being here arriued, and hauing made knowne his petition to his Imperiall Majeſty, he and his abſolute miniſter the Grand Viſier, haue expreſſely commanded vs, That we ſhould call before vs the Engliſh Embaſſadour and the ſaid Commiſſioners, and with all ſincerity and juſtice that we ſhould heare their differences, and make a finall and good concluſion betweene them; to wipe out all diſtaſte and rancor, and for the time to come, to conuert, and in place thereof to plant a firme and holy peace and amity. In obedience to which order, we haue ſent for the Engliſh B Embaſſador and the ſaid Deputies; betweene both whom, after long and litigious diſcourſes, we, according to the expreſſe command of his Imperiall Majeſty, haue declared and commanded in the name of his Imperiall Majeſty, to the ſaid Commiſſioners of Algier and Tunes, That for the times to come they ought to obey and obſerue the tenour of the Imperiall Capitulations, and in this particular to conforme themſelues to this Imperiall order and ſubſequent Articles: viz.

I. That for euer hereafter, the hoſtility and enmity betweene them and the Engliſh ſhould be anulled and blotted out of memory, and conuerted into a good peace and commerce. And after the date of this preſent writing, That the Engliſh Ships ſmall and great, merchants, and all C other ſubjects of England, freely and ſecurely, at their owne will and content, ſhall and may paſſe in the ſeas, and come not only to this our Imperiall City, but alſo ſafely go to any part of our Dominion, without any oppoſition or hinderance, according to the antient vſage, and Imperiall Capitulations granted in behalfe of both parties.

II. And that his Majeſty the King of England, hereupon may giue order through all the cities and ports of his Kingdomes, to publiſh, That from henceforth euery traueller or paſſenger ſhall ſecurely go in his buſineſſe peaceably, and that they ſhall receiue neither in their waies outward or returning, any moleſtation, trouble, or impediment; but that the ſubjects on both D parts ſhall alway obſerue and be obedient, conformable to the tenor of the Imperiall Capitulations made from the beginning of the peace vnto this day; and that for the time to come, there may in Algier be eſtabliſhed an Engliſh Conſull, prouided he be a man of quality and credit: to which Conſull and his Merchants, and to all his Nation and their goods, neither from thoſe of Algier, nor from any other ſubjects of the Imperiall Port, ſhall be offered or ſuffered to be done, any wrong or injuſtice whatſoeuer; but arriuing at the Port, the Officers of Algier (as it behoueth all ſtrangers ſhould be protected and cheriſhed) ſhall receiue them with all manner of courteſie and honour. And for the time to come, in caſe any of the Engliſh Nation ſhould commit any act contrary to the peace, amity, and Imperiall Capitulations, for E ſuch offence the publique peace ſhall not be broken, but the officers of Algier ſhall certifie the ſame to the Conſull, who (if it lie in his power) ſhall puniſh any ſuch offendor; if not, he ſhall then certifie his cauſe to his Majeſty of England, or elſe to his Embaſſador reſident in our happy Port, to the end, that the diſturbers of the publike peace may be duely puniſhed. In conformity whereof, if for the time to come any of the inhabitants of Algier and Tunes, ſhall haue committed any action contrary to the Imperiall Capitulations, by continuing to trouble or quarrell with the ſaid Engliſh Nation, the ſaid Conſull ſhall make certificate and complaint to the Beglerbeghs and Commanders of the army, who ſhall alwaies ſeuerely puniſh all ſuch F malefactors, to the end that thoſe of Algier may be carefull, neuer to do any act prejudiciall to this peace and amity.

III. All thoſe Engliſh ſlaues which ſhall be found now in Algier ſhall be ſet free, who with a note or liſt of their names ſhall be deliuered to the ſaid Conſull at his arriuall; in exchange whereof there ſhall be another liſt giuen vnto the ſaid Conſul, of the names of diuers Muſſulmen taken not long ſince by their Engliſh ſhips and made ſlaues: which liſt the ſaid Conſull ſhall ſend to his Majeſty of England to procure their liberty; and in this particular, of either ſide there ſhall be vſed no fraud or deceit.

IV. For the time to come, all the Merchants and other Engliſh which ſhall arriue at Algier or Tunes, ſhall be receiued, cheriſhed, and protected from all wrong and injury; and as in all other parts of the Empire they do ſafely and ſecurely traffique and trade, ſo alſo they ſhall peaceably, quietly, and ſafely go, come, and negotiate in theſe cities, without any moleſtation, and alway they ſhall liue according to the antient Capitulations.

V. That the ſhips of Algier and Tunes, ſmall and great, meeting with any Engliſh ſhips vpon the ſea, or in any Port, or ſeale, or other where, ſhall alway ſalute one another; and the Engliſh ſhewing their Colours, that they are Engliſh and friends, there ſhall be no diſturbance or quarrell betweene them, but all mutuall courteſie ſhall be ſhewed; and they ſhall do one to the other all ſuch offices of friendſhip as may encreaſe and fortifie this good amity and correſpondence: and there ſhall neuer be don any wrong or outrage one to the other; prouided that the Engliſh Ships ſhall not take part nor aſſiſt the enemies of the Imperiall Port, nor tranſport in their veſſels the armes or faculties of our foes, nor protect nor defend them. And if it ſhall happen after this concluſion, that it ſhall be found that any Engliſh Ship ſhall ſo carry or protect the goods of our enemies, they ſhall ſtand to their perill, and receiue puniſhment; and yet this our accord and Peace ſhall remaine ſafe and vnbroken vntill the day of Iudgement: And that alway on both parts, with all care and reſpect the antient and Imperiall Capitulations and Commands ſhall be preſerued and obeyed.

The ceremony of the acceptation of the Peace.

T*He Commiſſioners, (to ſay) the two Muftics, Caddees, and other aboue mentioned, in our preſence made anſwer, That,* We all in the name and behalfe of our city of Algier, and as the generall Procurators thereof, are content, and do accept of this accord and agreement, and we doe all ſweare and promiſe to obſerue the ſame; and that for the time to come, on our parts, nor on the behalfe of our ſucceſſors and poſterity, there ſhall neuer any act be committed nor ſuffered in prejudice or diſturbance of this peace and agreement. All which foreſaid Commiſſioners hauing before vs confeſſed, promiſed, and ſworne; the ſaid Engliſh Embaſſador did alſo ſay, I in the name of my Lord and King, and as his full Procurator, do accept and receiue theſe Conditions; and do promiſe, That the Subjects of his Majeſty my Lord and Maſter, ſhall alway maintaine with the Subjects of his Imperiall Majeſty, peace, according to the antient Capitulations; and that neuer on our parts ſhall be done any act of wrong, injury, or hoſtility: and at all times, when of either ſide there ſhall ariſe any controuerſie, or be done any injuſtice, that this peace ſhall not therefore be broken, but that the malefactors ſhall be ſought out and duely puniſhed.

Which declaration made on both parts, it was by vs regiſtred and publiſhed, and this our preſent aſſurance and writing giuen the firſt of the moneth Gemaziel, in the yeare of Mahomet 1032, being the middle of March 1622. Signed by the Commiſſioners of the Grand Signior, deputed for the Treaty.

A Ratification of the former Treaty and, Peace ſent by Sultan Morat at his aſſcention into the Imperiall Throne.

The Commands ſent to Algier and Tunes by a Capigi of the Grand Signiors, in company of Iſerug the new Baſſa of Algier.

[Written by the Grand Signiors owne hand :]

In conformity hereof let it be obeyed of all my Subjects.

To the Diuan of Algier.

THe Imperiall Command ; To the Caddee of Algier, to all the Doctors and Churchmen, to all the Captaines of Iſuph ; to all the Commanders, Elders, and Officers ; to all the heads and Antients, and to all the Souldiery of Algier, and many ſlaues there inhabiting : At the arriuall of the high and Im-C periall Affirmo, you ſhall know ; that whereas from the times of happy memory of my Grandfathers and Fathers (entred into mercy, whoſe Sepulchres let God glorifie) vnto this day, alwaies the Kings of England haue with all ſincerity beene in good peace and friendſhip with this high Port and all my Anceſtors ; and therefore the Imperiall minde and will alwaies hath beene, That according to the Imperiall Capitulations contracted at the firſt Treaty betweene both parties, That the Subjects and Engliſh Merchants might freely and ſecurely go and come into all parts of this well-gouerned Empire ; and that they ſhould neuer be troubled, hindered, nor dammified by any man, and that the ſaid Engliſh with all their Ships ſhould haue ſafe and ſecure paſſage in the ſea, vnder the Imperiall protection, and to their hearts content and quietneſſe they ſhould follow their trades and merchandiſe ; and whereas in all times paſt, there was neuer done to them any wrong or dammage by any of our ſubjects : you my ſlaues of Algier, D or ſome of you, not reſpecting the friendſhip of thoſe with whom the high Port hath peace and correſpon-dence, do whereſoeuer you meet their Ships, either in the Sea, or any other Port or harbor, take them and all their goods, doing them many injuries & violences ; and contrary alſo to the Imperiall Capitulations, do make them ſlaues, and many others you kill : for which your actions ſo vnjuſt, contrary to the Imperiall will and Capitulations not long ſince in the time of our brother Sultan Oſman Han (now in mercy placed in Paradiſe) his Majeſty the King of England hauing ſent his expreſſe Embaſſador, and his Royall Letter, aduiſing him of the wrongs and ſpoiles (ſo contrary to the League and peace contracted, and the Imperiall will) committed by you : to the end that all you ſhould obey, and with all diligence, care, and reſpect, ſhould maintaine and obſerue the peace and friendſhip with all the friends of the high Port ; that all thoſe who had committed ſuch actions, ſo contrary to the Imperiall will and Capitulations, E ſhould be puniſhed ; the ſaid our brother did then ſend you his expreſſe Imperiall commands, ſigned with his hand ; which was deliuered vnto you by one Mutafaraga, of the high Port, called Mahomet, whoſe dignity God encreaſe. Which commands being read in the preſence of you all, euery man did anſwer, ſaying, You were ready to obey the Order and Commands of your Lord ; but that you had ſome particulars requiſite to be preſented to the Imperiall ſtirrop, and therefore that you did elect certaine of the principall of your Country, and ſent them hither to him as your Procurators ; who being arriued in the time of the regiment of my honourable Vncle, and hauing made knowne at the foot of the Throne of his Majeſty, all thoſe your reaſons which you had giuen in inſtruction ; He gaue command, that thoſe ſaid Commiſſioners, come hither in your behalfe, with the Embaſſador of England reſident in our happy Port, ſhould haue a conference in the preſence of my late Viſier Halil, then Captaine Baſſa ; and that all things F there ſhould be accommodated and appeaſed. Which conference being made in the preſcribed forme, there all your grieuances were largely repeated, to the end that by reaſon of the aboue mentioned inconue-niences, there ſhould not happen any breach of the antient Peace and friendſhip, all matters were then anew pacified, and by writing and new treaty accorded, That according to the antient cuſtome there ſhould be ſent an Engliſh Conſul to Algier and Tunes, and that their Merchants ſhould ſafely and friendly go thither, and into all other parts of this well gouerned Empire, and traffique in all parts thereof, and that G they ſhould neuer hereafter be any way hindered, offended, or moleſted by any of you; and for more caution and aſſurance, there being written an authenticall Letter, ſent vnto the King of England, he gaue order and hath appointed a Conſul with many rich merchandiſes arriued in thoſe Ports. Which my ſaid Vncle did alſo then ſend you his expreſſe Command, That you ſhould obſerue all the ſaid agreement. But now being newly aduertiſed, That you my ſlaues of Algier, who wholly contrary to the laſt promiſe, contract, and faith giuen, do get, take, and ſpoile the Engliſh Ships, that you meet on the Sea, robbing them of their goods, and making ſlaues of their men, doing them all wrong and damage; and conſidering the King of England is conſtant and ſincere in his Peace and League with vs, and that the protection and cheriſhing of his ſubjects is neceſſary vnto vs; and that for you of Algier, or other of my Beghs whoſoeuer, to take veſſels, goods, or men from the ſaid Engliſh nation, ſo contrary to the laſt agreement made, H and faith giuen, is a thing much againſt our will and the Imperiall Capitulations by vs granted; and alſo it being our will, that betweene you and them there ſhould be a good peace and correſpondency, and that the ſaid Engliſh Nation may ſafely and ſecurely traffique in all parts of this our well gouerned Empire, and that no man preſume to do them any dammage or injury, and that for the time to come the tenour of our Imperiall Capitulations in their Land may be duely obſerued, we haue ſent you this our Imperiall Command, and We do command you,

That euery one of you, of what condition ſoeuer, do obey according to the tenour of this my Imperiall Command, ſent you on purpoſe for this only reaſon; That whether by ſea, or in any other place where you ſhall meet any Ship of the Engliſh, their people or goods, you do vnto them no violence or wrong whatſoeuer; but alway according to the Capitulations giuen them, and the laſt treaty and agreement made with you, that you hold and keepe a true peace and friendſhip with them; and alſo that you obey according to I the commandements formerly ſent to you in this buſineſſe; and that you neuer do nor ſuffer to be done any act contrary vnto them, but that you with all diligence obſerue and obey this my Command ſent you: in doing whereof you ſhall obtaine our fauour and benediction. And ſeeing according to the agreement made betweene you, there were diuers ſlaues ſet free and ſent vnto you from England, you alſo ſhall ſet free all thoſe Engliſh ſlaues that ſhall be found in your hands, and ſhall conſigne them to the Engliſh Conſull. And that whereas the Ship of England which was ſent vnto you with diuers Engliſh goods, hauing beene diſcharged, and receiuing your ſafe conduct, and returning to their Country, being met by ſome of Algier, who had no reſpect to the accord and faith giuen, they did take both the Ship and goods, and make the men ſlaues: therefore that act being very contrary to our louing peace and friendſhip, you K ſhall deliuer the ſaid Ship and goods and men to the Engliſh Conſull; and take heed you do not herein ſhew diſobedience to our Command, and that thoſe whoſoeuer, who haue been ſo bold to commit ſuch an offence ſo contrary to the Peace and faith giuen, you ſhall cauſe to be ſeuerely puniſhed. In concluſion, know you, that in no caſe it is our Imperiall will, that the ſaid Engliſh Nation hereafter ſhall be any way troubled or damnified, ſo contrary to our Imperiall Capitulation. Therefore let euery one of you be admoniſhed, That according as it is written in our Law, ſaying, Obey the Lord God, the Prophet, and the Emperor; that thereby obeying you ſhall obtaine my bleſſing; you ſhall neuer conſent nor permit that any thing be done contrary to my Imperiall will: for if hereafter it ſhall be made knowne vnto vs, that the ſaid Engliſh Nation ſhall be againe outraged and injuried by you, be aſſured that euery one of you ſhall fall into my indignation and diſgrace, and you ſhall bee puniſhed with all ſeuerity. Therefore L be you aduertiſed, that the obeying of my Imperiall Command ſhall be vnto you an aſſurance and ornament both of glory and felicity; and hauing my benediction, euery one of you undoubtedly ſhall obtaine happineſſe in this World, and glory in the World to come, and you ſhall enjoy all your deſerts. Then you my ſlaues of Algier, according to the tenor of this my command ſent you, be you friends with the Engliſh ſincerely and perfectly, and doe you entirely obſerue the Peace and League, and vſe kindely the Engliſh Conſull among you; and protect and defend their Merchants, and whether by Sea or in Port you ſhall meet any of their Ships, ſhew vnto them all friendſhip, and omit no occaſion to aid, defend, and to ſhew loue vnto them: and this our Imperiall Command, both of the arriuall, and in what ſort you haue accepted and obeyed it, and in what forme you haue eſtabliſhed the Peace, and reſented my will and command, you ſhall aduiſe the whole by your anſwer vnto our high Port. And thus let it be knowne vnto you, giuing alway M credit vnto our Imperiall Signature.

To

To the Baſſa of Algier.

THe High and Jmperiall Affirmo being arriued, you ſhall know, Whereas in times paſt the Gouernorus in that Prouince before you, by receiuing the fifths and tenths of the ſhips, goods, and men, which the Souldiery of Algier did take and rob from the Engliſh Nation, and by giuing them leaue and authority to do ſuch depredations and acts, ſo contrary to the Imperiall Capitulations, the ſaid ſouldiery haue taken ſo much boldneſſe and daring, that they continue to do innumerable ſpoiles and violences vnto the ſaid Engliſh Nation: which their inſolent actions being made knowne vnto the high Port, and there was inſtantly written and ſent vnto them exſpreſſe and Jmperiall Commands, That in no way, nor by no meanes it was not the will nor the Imperiall minde, that the Gouernours, ſhould in ſuch ſort conniue, and ſo euidently (contrary to the Imperiall Capitulation) ſhould take any fifths or tenths, nor giue nor permit any licence vnto the ſaid ſouldiers, to do ſo injuſt things; but that in this particular they ſhould all do their diligence & loue, and that they ſhould neuer take any fifths or tenths of the goods of the ſaid Engliſh, ſtollen by the ſaid ſouldiers, nor that they ſhould permit vpon no pretence, that the Engliſh ſhips, goods, and men, ſo contrary to the Imperiall Capitulations, ſhould be neither by them nor any other, outraged, moleſted, or damnified; and that if hereafter it ſhould be knowne, that the ſaid Gouernours ſhould notwithſtanding anew haue taken and accepted the fifths and tenths of the ſhips, goods, or Engliſhmen, robbed and taken by the ſaid Souldiery, and becauſe they haue conſented and ſuffered the Soulaiery to doe ſuch depredations, wrong, and ſpoiles, and for hauing alſo beene the cauſe to violate the Peace, League, and friendſhip betweene vs and the King of England; that as faulty and guilty men they ſhould be condignely puniſhed. Now being that we are anew informed, That the Souldiers do not obey the ſaid Commands and Orders ſent by vs, and that by you the Gouernors there is leaue giuen them to continue in their injuſt courſe of robbery and oppreſsion, and that ſtill you do take the ſaid fifths and tenths, and that you proceed in violating of the Imperiall Capitulations; Know you, That you are fallen into a diſgrace, being it is in no ſort our Imperiall will, that the ſaid Engliſh Nation ſhould be ſo damnified and outraged. And to the end that all the Commands giuen and ſent into thoſe parts for this buſineſſe, may be obſerued and obeyed, and that hereafter by no meanes there may neuer be giuen nor permitted any liberty to the ſaid Souldiers to do the like depredations vpon the ſaid Nation, and that neuer you nor any after you, do neuer take any fifth nor tenth, nor any part, but that alway the ſaid Nation ſhould be protected and defended, We haue giuen this our Jmperiall Chmmandement, and we do command,

That when this ſhall be arriued, you ſhall obſerue and do according to this our high and Jmperiall Command; onely giuen for this reaſon, and alſo in conformity of the former Commands ſent in this buſineſſe: which you ſhall obey with all diligence and care; and that you ſhall neuer take nor accept any fifth nor other ſhare, of the ſhips, goods, or men, that the Souldiers of Algiers ſhall ſo vnjuſtly take (contrary to our Imperiall Capitulations) from the ſaid Engliſh Nation: nor neuer hereafter ſhall giue leaue, nor ſuffer, that the Souldiers, ſo contrary to my will and Imperiall Capitulations, ſhall doe ſuch ſpoiles and depredations to the ſaid Engliſh Nation; and that in no caſe you ſhall neuer permit that Engliſhmen ſhall be there ſold, but you ſhall alway protect and defend them. And know of certainty, That if after the arriuall of this our Command, we ſhall vnderſtand, that the ſaid Nation ſhall be anew outraged and injuried, no excuſe from you ſhall be accepted nor heard; and not only you ſhall be depriued of your gouernment, but you ſhall be ſeuerely puniſhed. Therefore be aduiſed, and take heed that you commit no act that ſhall be contrary to my will and Imperiall Capitulations giuen to the ſaid Nation. And in concluſion, take you order that all my ſlaues of Algier may keepe peace and friendſhip with the ſaid Engliſh; becauſe it is my Imperiall deſire, that the ſaid Nation and their Merchants may come, go, and traffike in all parts of our Empire. Therefore do you do all your diligence and endeauour, and to ſee that the Peace be ſetled with the ſaid Engliſh, and take heed that you commit no negligence nor errour whatſoeuer. And thus be it knowne vnto you, giuing alway faith to our Imperiall Signature.

The like three ſeuerall Commands, only ſome circumſtances altered, according to the requiſites of the place, were written and ſent to the Dye, and Baſſa, and Diuan of Tunes.

This Peace thus concluded and promulged, was well and exactly obſerued for fiue yeares, and not one Engliſh ſhip aſſailed or taken, and at laſt ſix hundred Mariners, ſubjects of his Majeſty, releaſed from a miſerable ſeruitude and captiuity; vntill a ſmall offence was done to them, which they eaſily apprehended, to renew their deſire of ſpoyle, by which onely they liue, as being a people without induſtry or traffique; there being but one way to maintaine a Peace with them who are glad of any occaſion of warre, not to begin, nor to vnbinde their hands; for the ſoule of Wiſedome is Preuention. And ſo we proceed to our generall Story.

Ali Baſſa the great Viſier beheaded.

On the foure and twentieth of March Ali Baſſa the great Viſier, by whoſe meanes Sultan Morat was aduanced to the Crowne, was ſent for into the Seraglio; where being queſtioned by the young Emperor about the affaires of the Perſian inuaſion, he was condemned inſtantly to loſe his head, which was executed in the place, and his body throwne out naked into the ſtreets. The occaſion of his ſudden death was attributed to his diſſimulation with the Grand Signior in the loſſe of Babylon, that he had ſuborned falſe aduice that there was no ſuch matter; either for ſloath, or feare to take vpon him the charge of the war, with an army that would not obey in the city: and the baſe mony which he had cauſed to be coyned, being but one fift ſiluer, with which he made a whole payment to the Souldiery, putting the good dollars into his owne purſe. But indeed the true cauſe was his owne ſordid couetouſneſſe, who in ſix moneths had heaped vp an infinite treaſure, by ſale of all Iuſtice and Offices; which in the end weighed him downe to the ground, and ſupplied (like a large ſpunge) their preſent wants for the intended war in Aſia. To this dignity was aduanced Cerques Mechemet Baſſa, an antient Viſier, a man of an honeſt and ſincere nature, and one too good for thoſe times; who after he had enjoyed his place but a ſhort while, laboured to ſurrender it, as vnable to ſupport or content the inſolency of the Spahies in their vnreaſonable demands of impoſſible benefits. In the meane time the preparation for the warre in Aſia was aduanced, though the reſolution to ſet forward was deferred, vpon hope that by the authority of Cherques Mehemet Baſſa and other new Miniſters, Abaſſa Baſſa might be reduced to obedience, and that great feare and impediment remoued; they hauing vndertaken to endeauour it, though it appeared very difficult, being that he yet continued the ſiege of the caſtle of Angria; and that his ſcattered army that wintered abroad, begun to returne to him from all parts, it was iudged he would be loth (although the Grand Signior had ſent him another) to truſt his life vpon a pardon.

The Emperor prepares for a war in Hungary.

While the Grand Signior was thus threatened in Aſia with the King of Perſia, and his owne Rebell Abaſſa Baſſa, the Emperor of Germany made great preparations for Hungary, to the number of fifty thouſand men, which bred great jealouſie at the Port: But his Embaſſador the Baron of Curcy, lately arriued, to preuent a generall breach, and the expiration of the laſt Treaty made for twenty yeares at Zitwar, in the yeare 1606, diſſembling all the aids giuen to Gabor, gaue the Grand Signior full aſſurance, that his Maſter had no intent of breach with him; but openly diſauowed the Truce with the Prince of Tranſyluania, made at Goding: and that Cæſar would make war vpon him, vnleſſe he might haue all the places in Hungary in Gabors poſſeſſion reſtored; deſiring only a neutrality from the Port, according to the antient

A antient Treaty. The Prince of Tranſylvania, who now repented that he had giuen away the vſe of his late victorie which he might haue enjoyed,and foreſeeing the ſtorme that was like to fall vpon him, ſent to the Port for ſuccors:who with much ado obtained ſome Tartars,and Commands to the Baſſa's of Boſna,Buda,Caniza,Agria, and Temizuar, to be ready with all their frontier garriſons to defend and aſſiſt him in any motion of the Emperor, or elſe not to ſtirre:being vnwilling to abandon him,who was then their chiefeſt bulwarke toward that part of Chriſtendom,whilſt moſt of their forces ſhould be employed againſt the Perſian in Aſia; who had then entred Diarbech,the antient Meſopotamia,and taken Misbin and Merdin,two principall places,and all that prouince,except Hamit the chiefe city, wherin was a Baſſa who defended the ſame with great valor and reputation:and it was not then known where the Per-B ſian would limit his ambition, many other parts fearing him for that which he had alreadie done:for he had ſeparated the Arabia's,and all to the Eaſt of the Perſian ſea,from the Turkiſh empire: as hauing conquered from Balſara Northward, almoſt all to his own Derbent vpon the Caſpian ſea.

Vpon the 18 of April the Victuallers for the Aſian army paſſed ouer the water, but the diſpatch of the Vizier and the army was ſtill delaied, and little ſpeech when they ſhould depart. In the mean time the Perſian preuailed,without any oppoſition of conſequence: & no man could diſcern the inward cauſe of this ſlowneſſe,only the outward appearance was, a ſuſpition and complaint from the Black ſea, the City of Caffa hauing ſent their Mufti & other Commiſſioners to inform the grand Signior, That 400 boats of Coſſacks were abroad; That C they had done great ſpoiles in the coaſt of Tartaria and the Turkiſh Empire, and taken many ſhips laden with prouiſion for the Port; and forty thouſand more armed and horſed,ready for ſome land attempt:which put all thoſe parts into great fear; of which they deſired that preſent care and prouiſion might be taken and ordered for their defence. Whereupon there was held a new Councel,and Ibrahim Baſſa diſpatched with thirteen gallies,to make gard til more aids could be prepared; intending not long after to ſend a land army, and the Captain Baſſa with their whole fleet.

Abaſſa Baſſa (the ſuppoſed rebell of Aſia) hauing collected his Army together, ſuddenly roſe from Angria, and departed Eaſtward, hauing done no ſpoile to the city nor inhabitants, but left behinde him a better fame than any Gouernour ſent from the Port: he now accepted D of the grand Signiors pardon, and in obedience to his command,and ſhew of his ſubmiſſion, marched directly towards Diarbecher, to vnite himſelfe with Hafis Achmet Baſſa,as was ſup-poſed for the defence of that Countrey, who onely made ſome head againſt the Perſian. This reſolution of his departure did much ſeruice to that State,for thereby the Ianizaries & Spa-hies were accorded, and incouraged to goe to the Warre,who before could not be drawn out, ſuſpecting one another, and fearing Him more than the common enemy. For it was euident,if he had ſtaid in the way, either the ſouldiers would neuer haue gone out, or beene ſubiect to delay, mutinies, and diſſentions, by reaſon of their factions. But now vpon this good fortune to the State,the great Vizier, Treaſurer, Aga of the Ianizaries, and all the Officers and Army were paſſed ouer to Scutari, and muſtered the tenth of May, beeing ordained to march the E twentieth; which was expected with great longing, in reſpect of the Souldierie, who as yet behaued themſelues ſoberly, and made ſhew of reformation and obedience to Laws. They were all about 30000 Ianizaries and 40000 Spahies, many being gon before to make the army compleat,and the place of their rendevous about Bruſſia.

In the mean time a report was ſpred,that the king of Perſia was dead;but that gained little credit with the Turks,who knew it to be a vſual policie of that King,in hope therby to ſlacken the haſt of their forces ſent againſt him: but it did rather quicken them, inſomuch that they ſaid he had bin often dead,bur ſtil reuiued to ſome greater miſchief.

Biram Baſſa was diſpatched General of the frontier of Poland & Bugdania,with four thouſand ſoldiers,and order to draw together and command al the Beghs and gariſons,and to raiſe F forces in that quarter,in preuention of ſome attempt feared from the Coſſackes, who were in arms vpon the border, and had put all into diſtraction. To the 13 gallies before mentioned, to make a gard in the Black ſea,were added ten more; who firſt tranſported Iean Gheray Han, to re-eſtabliſh him Prince of the Tartars,and depoſe Mechmet aduanced the year before. That reſolution was caried very ſecretly, and though there was ſome whiſper, yet he was not declared vntil the day he kiſſed the grand Signiors Veſt, took his leaue, mounted his gally, & departed. The cauſe of this ſudden mutation was pretended, That Mechmet was accuſed by the Poles to haue broken the peace, and ſo they would pacifie the Coſſackes on better hopes: but the truth was, he was ſuſpected, becauſe he had excuſed to ſend aid to the Aſian War, being therto required, as fearing the entry of the Coſſacks into his country; and the rather, becauſe his brother Shachin Gheray, who fled twelue years before to the Perſian, being in diſgrace with Achmat, was now returned into Tartaria, at the inſtant when the Perſian did inuade the Turks dominions, as if there had bin ſome confederacie between them, both thoſe brethren beeing braue ſoldiers: and therfore it was feared that a dangerous reuolt or war would breake out in thoſe parts; for if Mechmet were not ſuddenly ſurpriſed, it was thought he would defend himſelf and his poſſeſſion. When the Gallies had performed their ſeruice to the new prince, they were appointed to join with the others, and to diſcharge Ibrabim Baſſa; one HuZein Baſſa a Vizier of the Bench being ſent to that command: Biram Baſſa hauing likewiſe order to haue an eye vpon the Tartars, as well as on the Poles. At the firſt departure of the firſt gallies, as ſoone as they came into the Blacke ſea they met with a ſmall Carmiſal, who reporting, That only forty boats of the Coſſacks were before them, the Ianizaries mutined, and forced their General to retire into the chanel, and demanded more ſtrength; who were ſupplied with more men, and ſo proceeded.

The Pyrats of Tunes and Algier in rebellion

Amongſt other diſtractions and reuolts of the ſubiects of that Empire, the pyrats of Algier and Tunes caſt off all obedience, not only vpon the ſea where they were maſters, but preſuming to do many inſolencies vpon the land, and in the Grand Signiors beſt ports. They began at Rhodes, where the caſtle ſhot at them. Afterward, a fleet of ſix pyrats of Tunes met with a Flemiſh ſhip called the Moon, laden at Alexandria; with whom notwithſtanding their peace, they fought and fired her, not ſauing any thing but ſome of the men, whom they made ſlaues: and after comming into the port of Salines at Cyprus, they found two Flemings more, and two Venetians, able to fight with two ſuch fleets. As ſoone as they came into the Road, they now claimed peace of the Flemings, ſeeing themſelues too weake to ſet vpon all foure; proteſting, That if they would aſſiſt their enemies, the breach was on their parts: who therupon vnworthily promiſed a neutralitie. Then they ſet vpon the Venetians, the captains wherof went aſhore to craue protection of the Caſtle in the graund Signiors port; for which the Begh demanded fifty thouſand Dollars, or elſe they ſhould take their fortune. Which they refuſed, and ſo were expoſed to their own defence; and the pyrats beginning with the ſmaller ſhip, ſhe made a good reſiſtance, but hauing no help, ſhe was thrice fired, and at laſt burnt to the water. The Captaine of the Dolphine (the greater ſhip) not ſhooting a ſhoot, with his men ſtole aſhore and fired her, being a Veſſell of eight hundred tunnes, and armed with forty eight braſſe pieces. The ladings of theſe two were valued at 300000 dollars, of which the Pyrats ſaued nothing: & in euils it was a bleſſing that ſuch a ſhip fel not into their hands, ſeeing the Cowards were not able to hold ſo ſtrong a fort. From thence they ſailed to Scandaron, where finding another Fleming and a Polacra, they ſurpriſed both, and then prepared to land. The Aga of the Scale and all the inhabitants fled, and they ſacked the town, and robbed all ware-houſes: and not therwith content, they ſet it on fire, ſo that nothing remained but ſtone walls, that would not burn. The greateſt loſſe to ſtrangers fell vpon the Dutch and Engliſh; for the former loſt about thirty thouſand, and the later about ten thouſand dollars; and ſo they reigned in the port eight daies and departed. An inſolencie vnſufferable, if that State had any ſenee of honor or profit: for by this example there was no Scale of the grand Signior ſecure, and all trade muſt be giuen ouer, if no preſent courſe were taken for a ful redreſſe.

Vpon the laſt of May, after long expectation, the great Vizier Cerques Mehemet Baſſa and the Army for Aſia began to march: and Abaſſa Baſſa had made ſo many halts on the way, that he was greatly ſuſpected of the Ianizaries, that he lingred vpon purpoſe for them; and at the beſt it was feared, that he would onely returne to Arzirum and keepe the ſame. The Perſians death was no more ſpoken of, but it was rather doubted hee would be found aliue ſuddenly neer Aleppo: and the Emir of Sidon did once more threaten Damaſcus and Ieruſalem. Thus Troubles in Tartary.

A the miſchiefs and feares of that State followed one another like claps of thunder: For Mechmet Gheray, made Tartar Han the yeare before, being encouraged by his brother Shachim, newly come from his baniſhment in Perſia, would not ſubmit to the Grand Signiors Order, and reſigne his Principalitie to his Couſin Iean Gheray (not long after ſent and made Prince) and therefore he was againe recalled, fearing to put that countrey to trouble. But before that Order could ouertake him, hee was landed, and Mechmet Gheray came downe with a great army to reſiſt him; and the Generall of the gallies in the Blacke Sea was forced to land both his Ianizaries and Artillerie for his defence, and with ſuch power as they could make (not exceeding foure thouſand) to entrench them vnder the countenance of their Ordnance, whence there paſſed ſharpe blowes in three ſkirmiſhes, and on both ſides about B two thouſand ſlaine; the Generall diſpatching one galley to the Port with aduice, and requiring preſent ſuccours. Whereupon the eleuenth of Iune a peremptorie Order came from the Grand Signior, That ſeeing his honour was now ingaged, hee would maintaine Iean Gheray, and giue him ſpeedy ayds. To which end a Councell was held the ſame day, and reſolution taken to ſend ſupplies, either the Captaine Baſſa, who was then ready for the Mediterran, or by order to the Princes of Bugdania and Wallachia. And thoſe brothers, then in poſſeſſion, had no retreit, but muſt maintaine their diſobedience by the ſword, which was a matter of as much danger as euer befell the Turkiſh Empire. Hereupon the Captain Baſſa with ſixteene gallies went into the Blacke Sea in ayd of Iean Gheray, made Prince of the Tartars, whom Mechmet Gheray had beaten off the land, and forced him to retire to the Grand C Signiors gallies that carried him thither. The Emperour being ſtill reſolued to giue thoſe people a Prince, ordered all the frontier ſuccours to meet him to place him by force; which was, in the opinion of many that knew the countrey, held a matter of great difficultie, all the Tartars taking part with Mechmet, who had in his army neere threeſcore and ten thouſand horſe.

In the mean time the great Vizier Cerqués Mehmet Baſſa marched towards Dierbecker; from whence there was news, That the Arabs, ioyned with ſome of the Grand Segniors forces, had giuen a checque to the Perſian: which did encourage their owne army, who were not yet out of feare of Abaſſa Baſſa and his troupes (that ſtayed about Keſarie) earneſtly expecting what part he would take. Yet the ſeaſon being hot, the Perſian aduanced little, but onely forraged D the countrey.

The Coſſacks enter the Boſphorus.

Vpon the ninth of Iuly, betweene ſeuenty and foureſcore boats of the Coſſackes, with fifty men apeece (rowers and ſouldiers) watching the opportunitie of the Captaine Baſſa's being ingaged in Tartarie, entred the Boſphorus about breake of the day; where diuiding themſelues, they ſackt and burnt almoſt all the villages and houſes of pleaſure on both ſides the Riuer, as farre as the Caſtles, and within foure miles of Conſtantinople. The principall places were Biugdary and Ienicoie, on the Grecian; and Stenia on the Aſiatick ſhore: where hauing made great and rich booty, they ſtayed vntill nine of the clocke in the forenoone; and then all the City hauing taken the alarme, the Grand Signior came downe to the water ſide, the Chimacham to the water Port: Halil Baſſa made himſelfe Generall in this tumult, E and hauing not one galley ready for defence, hee cauſed to be manned and armed all the ſhipboats, barges, and other ſmall wherries, to the number of foure or fiue hundred, with ſuch people, as they could either get to row, or hope to fight; and diſpatched all the horſe and foot in the city, to the number of ten thouſand, to defend the coaſt from further ſpoyle. Neuer was there ſeen a greater feare and confuſion for the time: yet they expected that thoſe poore Theeues would vpon their preparation preſently retyre. But they ſeeing the Turks boats make towards them, drew themſelues together into the middeſt of the channell, not farre aboue the Caſtles, and ſtayed firme vpon their Oares in battalion (in forme of a Creſcent) expecting the aſſault, the wind and current being againſt them. Halil Baſſa cauſed ſome ſhot to bee made afarre off, but they anſwered not with one musket, onely houered from one F ſhore to another, without any ſhew of retreit. Hereupon, the Generall ſeeing their forme and reſolution, thought it not fit to aſſaile them with ſuch boats as hee had, but eſteemed it wiſedome enough to keepe them from further attempts; fearing if they had broken his fleet of boats, which was eaſily done, that they would venture downe to Conſtantinople, which was now empty of all defence. And thus theſe few Rouers hauing firſt made great ſpoile, lay the whole day vntil Sun-ſet, facing and brauing that great and formidable city of the World, G and all the force it could make, and departed with their booty, with their Colours ſpred, vnfought with or almoſt reſiſted.

This ſmall action and bold attempt to affront ſo great an Empire, made a ſtrange diſcouerie, how much vnder the reputation the terror and ſtrength of the ſtate was then, how weake and vnprouided they were. But as the Oracle commanded them, firſt to ſeat ouer againſt blind men, it hath bin their fortune euer to haue blind enemies. Philip of Macedon had neuer proiected, nor his ſon Alexander neuer aduentured with ſo ſmal forces, the large enterpriſe of ſubduing the Eaſtern Empire, if they had not diſcouered the effeminate and faint courage of the Aſiatiques, by the admirable retreit of Xenophon, & ſwift incurſion of Ageſilaus, Great armies not daring to oppoſe the vertue of their ſmall numbers. So we ſee, of ſmal beginnings H oftentimes great matters do ariſe; for by this attempt of the Coſſackes the Poles had abſolutely broken the peace with that Empire.

Huzein Baſſa ſtrangled in the Court.

Huzein Baſſa that had beene twice great Viſier, and vpon the tumult of the Souldierie had made an eſcape the yeare before (a man turbulent and hated of all men) beeing at laſt taken and carried into the Seraglio; after hee had (by many faire promiſes) confeſſed and reſtored much of the treaſure carried away by him, was ſtrangled in the Court, and had the iuſt reward of his tyrannie. And the preſent great Viſier, ſent to make head againſt the Perſian, did yet ſtay at Iconium, expecting the Soldierie, who did ſlowly draw to him: ſo that it was thought he would Winter in Aleppo, being not able to proceed in the war that ſummer.

The Captain Baſſa, ſent into the Black ſea, to eſtabliſh Iean Gheray Prince of the Tartars, I was forced to retyre to Caffa, being repulſed from the land; the people retaining Mechmet in poſſeſſion. Wherupon, to cure the wound with as little skar as was poſſible, he in the Grand Signiors name was conſtrained to confirme the other, and to be content to accept a curteſie, for which he gaue ſmall thanks. And Cante-Emir-Emirze hauing again entred Poland, & done ſome ſpoil by the cutting down of ſome woods, was intercepted in his retreit, and routed with the loſſe of two thirds of his Army: and the Poles with a very great Campe intrenched neer Chotyn (the fort beſieged by Sultan Oſman in the late war, & ſurrendred vpon the peace) expecting the euent of the great troubles on that ſide.

The Coſſackes returne to the Boſphorus.

The Coſſackes after their firſt retreit returned again to the mouth of the Boſphorus, with double the number of their firſt fleet, being an hundred and fifty boats at the leaſt, the ſupply K hauing lurked behind, either for ſuccour in caſe of need, or for ſome other aduantage. They ſtaied off and on vpon the coaſt three daies more, burnt the Pharos, and ſome two or three villages. They threatened to come to the Arſenall, putting all the City in great confuſion. Gards were continued and re-inforced in all parts vpon the land; and at laſt two Gallies, filled with porters and labouring men taken vp in the ſtreets, and about twenty boats, were ſent out to keep watch, where they remained at the entrance of the Channels. But the Coſſackes with their great booty, and two or three Carmiſals taken, retyred; and ſo the feare was paſt for that time. But ſome of the poore Coſſacks beeing taken ſtragling too far vpon the land, confeſſed vpon examination, that Mechmet Prince of the Tartars was confederat with them in this attempt, in reuenge of the offer made to diſplace him. And this confeſſion haſtened L the death of Huzein Baſſa, who in the time of his gouernment, of a priſoner made Mechmet a Prince, and gaue libertie to the Lords of Poland that were priſoners at the Port, (of whom mention hath bin made before) and diſpeeded ſuddenly the Duke of Sbarasky, who if they had then bin there, without doubt they had been kept hoſtages; for in this tumult the Agent of Poland ranne ſome haſard, if by the wiſdome of the* Chimacham it had not bin preuented.

 Lieutenant to the great Vizier.*

About the four and twentieth of Iuly the Prince of Tranſylvania made an abſolute Peace with the Emperor, without the knowledge or warrant of the Port. Which cauſed great ſuſpition among them, but they bare it both ſilently and patiently, in reſpect of their own troubles then in Aſia and other places, Therfore the Prince kept the conditions the more ſecret: M howſoeuer, it was known that he ſurrendred and diſclaimed all title to Hungary, and conſented that the Emperors ſon ſhould be preſently choſen King thereof, and keepe his Court at Presburg: That all the Eſtates of Hungary ſhould receiue him, and the prince of Tranſilvania aſſiſt and ſerue him in all his occaſions: That Bethlem Gabor ſhould remain quietly prince

A of Tranſylvania, and Earle of the Siculi: That he ſhould hold Caſſovia, & two or three other Signiories which he formerly poſſeſſed, during life; and after, that they ſhould returne abſolutely as members to the Crown of Hungary. And this article did trouble the grand Signior, That the Prince at all had mentioned Tranſylvania without any relation to him, as if that prouince had depended of the Empire. Some other articles there were concerning the eſtates of priuat men, and mutuall pardons; this which hath bin ſet downe is the ſubſtance of the Treaty.

In the mean time a Chiaus (ſent by the grand Signior to the Emperor, with newes of his inauguration, and to offer the continuance of the antient leagues and treaties between them) returned to the Port with the Emperors letter of acceptance, and confirmation of the Treaty B made at Zitwa, which was the laſt: wherein it was agreed, That what either ſide poſſeſſed at that time ſhould remain as it was; and if any road ſhould be made, and priſoners taken, or places ſurpriſed during the truce, on either part, that reſtitution and full ſatisfaction ſhould bee giuen by him that innouated. Ali Baſſa the Viſier before, and Cerques Baſſa at that preſent, did both of them conſent to the renuing of this treaty, which was often broken: ignorant vtterly of the affaires of thoſe parts, and of the diſaduantage to the prince of Tranſylvania and their own State; for herby the Truce being again in vigor, the grand Signior was bound to ſurrender Vatz, and many other places of importance, which had bin ſurpriſed in a time when there was neither abſolute peace nor war between them, and was obliged to make many other reſtitutions of damage. But the Imperial party did not preſſe thoſe ſmaller matters, only deman- C ding Vatz, with all the country depending, held themſelues for their limits, ſtrictly vnto that treaty, which was then again confirmed on both ſides. This concluſion diſcontented many, who laid the blame on the information of the Baſſa of Buda, a ſuſpected pentioner of the emperor: but it was the grand Signiors troubles in Aſia that made him ſilent, and ſuffer both that loſſe and many affronts from Tartary and the Coſſacks.

There arriued in the mean time from the Black ſea two gallies, which brought the bodies of two Viſiers, and certain newes of the ouerthrow of the Army, ſent vnder the command of the Captaine Baſſa to plant the new prince of the Tartars: who hauing landed his forces and artillery, was routed and beaten, himſelfe wounded, twenty eight pieces of Ordnance loſt, two Viſiers of the Bench, and about fiue thouſand ſoldiers ſlain and taken, the reſt ſaued by flight D vpon the Gallies; onely the Captaine Baſſa with his fleet ſtaied about Varna to receiue new order. There had not happened to that Empire in many Ages a loſſe of more importance in reſpect of the conſequences; An Imperiall Army beaten, and thereby Tartaria ſeparated from obedience to the Turkiſh Empire, and that people taught to know, That they were able to make and maintaine their owne Prince. But this was no time to take too much knowledge of that diſgrace; Policie teaching them, rather to cure, than to make the breach greater. For the grand Signior after that, diſpatched a galley to the Prince of the Tartars, with a Veſt, and a Sword for his ſonne, and a confirmation to him of his place. Caſting all the faults vpon the Captaine Baſſa, and diſavowing his attempts; though hee was ſent with Commiſſion to do it. Which (to make the diſſimulation good) was like to coſt him his head, being ſent for E in to anſwer the ſame. The ſudden yeelding on the grand Signiors part ſhewed a great weakneſſe and feare, to flatter a victorious enemy: and it was doubted how the Tartarian would accept a gift which he had gotten by his own ſtrength: for if he ſtood out hee would proue a dangerous neighbor, the city of Conſtantinople being alwaies open to him; for Adrianople and the borders did then fear him, and euen ſome Coſſacks did ioyne with him, although before they had been mortall enemies. Yet to make ſome compenſation of this defection, Abaſſa Baſſa the ſtrong rebell had made his peace with the great Viſier in Aſia, and to ſeale the credit of his faith by another trecherie, ſent in the heads and eſtates of three of his chief followers to redeem his own. Which much raiſed the dul countenance of that Court; for although the pardon was diſhonourable, yet was it ſeaſonable. But they durſt not ioyne their F Armies for fear of new ſtirres, for he went toward his own gouernment of Arzirum, with promiſe to keep it ſafe; and the Viſier marched ſlowly towards Babylon, as then held by the Perſian.

Newes of the Turks army ouerthrowne by the Tartars.

About the twentieth of September the great Viſier Cerques Baſſa abiding in Iconium, and Abaſſa reconciled to the great Viſier.

Abaſſa Baſſa in Kaiſerie (neer thereunto) he was erneſtly prouoked by the Ianizaries to ſet vpon him. But the Viſier hauing expreſſe order, not to make the breach greater with the rebel, G but to vſe all means to appeaſe him, and to reconcile him to them, would not be drawn to conſent therunto: for which cauſe, and ſome other their ſmall diſcontents, they twice ſtoned the tents of the Viſier, and wounded him in the head. Wherupon hee aſſembled the Commanders of the Spahies, declaring vnto them the great truſt the grand Signior had in them; and ſhewing them an abſolute Order giuen him to keepe good-tearmes with Abaſſa, and neuer to fall to blowes with him, he deſired them to finde ſome way of pacification betweene him and the Ianizaries: who inſtantly promiſed their obedience and aid to execute all his commands.
Then, the Viſier called together ſome of the Captaines of the Ianizaries, and perſuaded them ſo to worke with their companions, that a peace might bee concluded betweene H them and Abaſſa Baſſa. Who finding their fellowes very vnwilling, had much adoe to perſuade them: in the end it was agreed, that the Viſier ſhould treat and accommodate all differences.
Who preſently ſent to conferre with Abaſſa Baſſa; but he by no means would truſt himſelfe, or giue a meeting, and anſwered, That hee would neuer depart from his Followers and Army; but if he deſired to ſpeake with him in priuate, that he ſhould firſt ſend his brother the Beglerbegh of Caramania, and Elias Baſſa of Natolia in hoſtages, and that then he would come vnto him. Which diffidence of his much diſpleaſed, and the Viſier was conſtrained to treat the peace by mediation. Which hauing at the laſt brought to effect, he took his oath three times vpon the Alcaron, To hold him as a friend, and neuer to doe him any violence. The Ianizaries alſo gaue their conſent in publique, promiſing to maintaine the I word of the Viſier: and the articles of their reconciliation being drawn in writing, were ſent to Abaſſa; who reciprocally made the like oath, and accepted the peace vpon the conditions following, ſigned by the Viſier: That he ſhould be confirmed Baſſa of Arzirum, his ſon Beglerbegh of Orfa, and his Lieutenant of Maras (all on the borders of Perſia) and that he ſhould depart with all his army to the defence and cuſtodie of that prouince, and wait vpon the aduantages of the Enemy.

While Abaſſa Baſſa did treat this accommodation, Colophon Muſtapha Baſſa (the principal of his Colleagues in all his rebellion) made ſome ſhew of retyredneſſe from him, and vnderhand to parle with the Viſier apart; and in concluſion wrot vnto him, and promiſed to deliuer or to kill Abaſſa Baſſa. Which Letters of his being either intercepted or ſent him, and ſeeing K that Colophon had reſolued to kil him treacherouſly, he called him into his tent, and asked him plainly, Why he went about to betray him; and withall ſhewing him his own hand, hee drew his ſword and claue his head, deliuering all his goods to ſome ſeruants of the Viſier, to conſigne vnto their maſter. Then it was anew moued to Abaſſa Baſſa, That he ſhould aduance with his forces preſently towards Babylon, againſt the Perſian, who had retired his main Army to oppoſe the princes of Vsbecke, who had made ſome incurſion; leauing fiue thouſand garriſon ſouldiers in the city. But Abaſſa refuſed to go, vrging, That hee was onely bound by the Treaty to returne and make gard in his gouernment of Arzirum. Whereupon the Viſier, forced to ariſe and aduance, he arriued at a caſtle called Nigda (neere Aleppo) wherein were diuers chiefe followers of Abaſſa Baſſa; who hauing vnderſtood of the Pacification made, L came out with preſents and victuals to meet the Viſier and his Army, and were of him well receiued. But the Ianizaries enuying to ſee them ſo well vſed and honoured, in a fury fell vpon them and killed them all; and vſing the opportunitie, entred the Caſtle, put to execution their wiues and children, and euery perſon found therin, and all others that could be diſcouered in the bordring villages appertaining to him, to the great diſcontent of the Viſier. Which being known to Abaſſa, and ſeeing they had broken their oath and faith, he roſe with his Army, and marched right to the Imperial camp; where arriuing, one of his captains with 400 horſe began the dance, and without delay fell into the Quarter of the Ianizaries, doing ſome execution for an hour and half; in which ſkirmiſh there fell on both ſides two or three thouſand.
The Viſier ſeeing this beginning, partly forced by the Ianizaries, and partly for his honor, M drew vp his whole army to come to a battell in their defence. Which Abaſſa Baſſa perceiuing, and that which hee expected not (who hoped that the Vizier & Spahies would haue giuen him leaue to reuenge many iniuries vpon the faith-breakers) vnwilling to fight with
the

A the grand Signiors General ſounded a retreat, and got himſelf and his army a mile or two diſtance off. The Vizier to ſhew himſelfe faithfull to the Ianizaries, and to keepe in grace with them, ſent four Beglerbeghs with their regiments in purſuit of him; who finding Abaſſa Baſſa and his army in good order and firm, made ſome ſhew of ſkirmiſh to little purpoſe. But they returned to the campe, and told the Vizier, that they had found him in battalion with 40000 men, and that they were not able to deale with him. The next day Abaſſa with many great threatnings marched away directly for Arzirum; and the Viſier to Diarbecher, for his hybernation; in great diſpleaſure of the Ianizaries, and the rather for that he was beloued and protected by the Spahies.

The brother of Mechmet Gheray in the mean time brake through the prouince of Bugdania B (Radula the Vayuod hauing made eſcape) and entred into Poland, firſt ſpoiling the country, and driuing away all the cattel; and afterward entred Wallachia, and beſieged his ſon prince of that country, in his caſtle of Tergouiſta, notwithſtanding they were ſubiects of the graund Signior. And in ſted of ſending back the artillery loſt in the laſt defeat (which was expected) he entred the caſtle of Caffa, the chief port of the Negropont, and carried away from thence all the cannon and munition, which he tooke vp into the land to his town of Bagchaiſeray, as if he meant to fortifie himſelfe, a practiſe at that time vnknown to the Tartars. Which were ill ſignes of ſubmiſſion, & yet the name of Muſſulmen, at any time when they come to blows doth eaſily accommodate all quarrels.

The Tartars make an incurſion into Poland.

About the 12 of March following, the Tartar Han ſent an Embaſſador to the Port, with an C offer of his Maſters ſeruice, which was receiued with great joy; excuſing the entry of the Tartars into the frontier of the Turkiſh empire, as being don in the ſeruice of the grand Signior, only to fetch Cante-Emir-Emirze and his followers out of Siliſtria, and to compel them to retyre, to auoid and take away all occaſion from the Poles to lament the injuries don by them; that therby they alſo might take the like order for their Coſſacks, and ſo the peace might be duly obſerued on both ſides. Whereupon a poſt was diſpatched into Poland, aduiſing what was done, and requiring that on both parts the like correſpondence might be obſerued; or els that the grand Signior would vnderſtand, if the Coſſackes made any new attempt, that the peace was broken on that ſide, being they could haue no excuſe to lay the fault vpon the Tartars.
This vſe was made of the Embaſſage: yet the Vizier was not without jealouſie of the D ſinceritie of the meſſenger, but thought he was ſent for exploration, to diſcouer the force, preparation and reſolution of that State; and therefore they made all ſhew of good prouiſion, arms being giuen out to the Boſtangies, and a great fleet dreſſing for the black ſea, wherin the Coſſacks had bin already ſeen, and rumor made them to exceed 300 boats: inſomuch that all the inhabitants of the Boſphorus did daily retyre to Conſtantinople. The fear was generall, which was ſufficient argument of weakneſſe; and the year before had ſhewed what might be don with a ſmall and reſolute force.

Tartar Han ſends an Embaſſadour to the Port.

1625

Now that the ſeaſon ſerued, the Perſian prepared to continue the inuaſion, and the Vizier to oppoſe him. All the Soldierie departed towards the campe, though they intended not to E meet, but to make war by diuerſion. Abaſſa got ſome credit at the Port, and they eaſily apprehended all occaſion to beleeue his reconciliation. One of the chief commanders in the Perſian army ſent to Abaſſa, to perſuade him to deliuer Arzirum his gouernment to the Sha: which he ſeemingly accepted, and trained him on with 8000 men to take poſſeſſion; when in the mean time he drew together his troupes, and ſuddenly ſent them vnder the conduct of a prince of Georgia, and ſet vpon them, who ſuſpected no ſuch treaſon, routed them, and ſlew a thouſand, whoſe heads he diuided and ſent for preſents to the Port and the camp. Vpon which action, by the multitude he was proclaimed to be the beſt ſubiect of the graund Signior, and named to be Vizier. But ſome thought it not ſo great an aſſurance of his fidelitie, becauſe he went not in perſon, nor would come out of his ſtrength, though commanded to draw into the F field to aſſiſt in the generall ſeruice: excuſing himſelfe vpon the neceſſitie of defending the frontier. Neither could he refuſe to ſend ſome of his followers to this exploit (being vrged therto by ſome of his Captains) without diſcouering himſelf too ſoon; his reſolution vndoubtedly being, That while thoſe two great Oppoſits ſtroue for the whole, he would keepe a part of Aſia,and his own head; knowing that hee could make his peace with the ſurrender to the G Conqueror,at pleaſure.

From theſe parts were not the greateſt nor neereſt feares: for the Prince of the Tartars hauing made peace with the Poles, and taken the Coſſackes into his fellowſhip, made ſhew of ſome deſigne againſt the Turkiſh Empire, and the people were indifferent,many inclining to him. The Coſſackes with three hundred Frigots croſſed the Black ſea,ſacked and burnt the ſuburbs of Trapezond,and all the adioyning coaſt; and retyring, were receiued into the port of Ghioſleue,belonging to the Tartars; which augmented the jealouſie, that they would vnite.

A new rebel in Aſia.

At the ſame time there appeared a little rebel in Natolia,one Ianet Ogli,a ſimple Spahi not aboue 24 years of age,dwelling in the plains of Tyria; who vnder the colour of reformation H of the commonwealth, came down to Smyrna with ten thouſand ſoldiers. The city amaſed, ſent to Conſtantinople for ſuccours, but receiued an anſwere as cold as their means to helpe them: The Chriſtians fled to their ſhips, by chance in the Port: the gouernor to the Caſtle. But it ſeemed he had priuat quarels with ſome great men in the towne,whoſe faction ſent out 4000 ſhot to keep the paſſage, which being beaten, he came before the city and executed his wil,beheaded two Caddees,puniſhed diuers inſolent ſoldiers,placed and diſplaced the Officers,and proclaiming peace in the grand Signiors name,offended no man, nor did any ſpoyle; but giuing a particular protection to the Conſuls,and promiſing them in their quarel,if they were oppreſſed,to return with his rod of correction,he departed to his own home without any further trouble. The operation of that medicine proued wholeſome, though it appeared dangerous; I and he pretended to haue had order from the State, a diſorderly way: but it was likely they did rather conniue at, than approoue of that rude execution of juſtice. Howſoeuer,not long after he had diſturbed Smyrna, he tooke vp armes again with a greater power; which followed the impunitie or proſperitie of his former attempt; for he marched toward Burſia in Natolia: and the State was forced then to take his actions into conſideration,which they would haue ouerſeen. There were two Councels held about him,and a reſolution taken, while his forces were but new and wauering, to reſiſt the beginnings, and to ſend out ſome ſtrength to ſuppreſſe him: but who ſhould command,who would obey,or whom to truſt,could hardly be agreed. He ſtill vſed the name of the Grand Signior, and the common blind of rebellion,Reformation: but what he would haue,or whither his deſigns drew him, was the more K dangerous for the vncertaintie.

The Armado ſent into the Blacke-Sea for ſuppreſſing the Coſſackes, arriuing at Varna, a garriſon towne kept by Gebegies (an inferiour Order of ſouldiers) there fell out a quarrel betweene them and the Ianizaries. Theſe (after the ſway of their inſolence) would take from the other their Ouens in their owne Towne: which being not endured, a priuate fray was begun betwixt them; which breaking out into a faction, the fellowes of both Orders became intereſſed and ingaged, and they fought a ſharp battell; many of both ſides fell,to the number of a thouſand. The Captaine Baſſa, who could not preuent this quarrell, ſought to appeaſe it, by doing ſome juſtice againſt the Gebegies; but it proued onely enough to inrage them againſt him as partiall; L and too little to ſatisfie the Ianizaries,who thereupon forſooke the gallies,and kept the land,leauing the Armado without ſoldiers to gard it,in danger of the Tartars and Coſſackes.

The great Vizier in Aſia gaue command, That no ſoldier ſhould retyre to Winter Garriſon,but ſtay with the army about Babylon, the fitteſt ſeaſon being then to make the war; diſpoſing himſelfe in the mean time to take in places of leſſe import. Abaſſa Baſſa moued not, and promiſed obedience in other things,but to go out of his hold of Arzirum he did peremptorily refuſe.

Strange predictions of a great plague inſuing.

The yeare and ſeaſon was full of contagion, which was obſerued by ſome forewarnings, and ſome extraordinarie diſpoſition of the aire and accidents: For on the eighth of May at midnight there was a great and fearfull earthquake at Conſtantinople, which indured about M ſix minutes, and croſſing the ſea, was felt in Greece, Aſia, and the Iſlands. And on Munday being the twenty ninth of Iune, at night there began a moſt terrible tempeſt, with ſo violent and continual thunder & lightning,that al the city of Conſtantinople ſhewed as if it had bin

A on fire; at the end whereof fell a ſtorme of haile, that brake tiles and glaſſes, ſo that ſtones by report were taken vp of a hundred and fifty drams; but from credible witneſſe that weighed diuers of them, the next morning there were found of ſixty and ſeuenty drammes apiece, (which is about ſeuen or eight ounces) wherewith many were wounded. On Sunday the third of Iuly, another tempeſt of thunder and lightning began at Conſtantinople, which burned a woman and her childe in their bed, and ſlew much cattell in the field. And the fifth of Iuly the ſickeneſſe was growne to that height, that the Turks proclaimed their publike proceſſion and prayers; which is performed with great ſolemnity by the Muſti and all the Mullaes, accompanied with the Viſiers and chiefe of the city, attended by the people at a little Moſchy on the edge of the plaine of Achmadan, ouer the water on Grecia ſide: which ceremony B is neuer vſed vntill the mortality exceed a thouſand a day; which was eaſily knowne by the burials, that were all made without the wals, and account of them were kept at euery Port; and that day was numbered only to go out of the gate of Adrianople nine hundred and ſeuenteene. On the eighth following there died a thouſand thirty foure: by computation of the whole (being many Ports of buriall) there could not die leſſe than two or three thouſand a day, beſides Galata, Pera, and Scutari, the infection being ſpred almoſt into all the villages.
The ſame day, Proclamation was made in the city, That no Butcher ſhould kill mutton; a murrion or plague (whither was vncertaine) hauing taken that ſort of cattell ſo violently, that they died in multitudes with ſores in the fields; and it was not knowne what men ſhould eat, nor where ſafely to prouide it.

C Vpon the approch of the great Vizier toward the Prouince of Babylon, there was a motion made on the part of the King of Perſia, of peace; but it was vnderſtood by the Vizier to be but an artifice to delay his Army. There came Embaſſadors from the Princes of Georgia, who hauing formerly depended vpon the Perſian, were about nine yeares before betraied and tyranniſed by him: in reuenge whereof they hauing taken protection of the Grand Signior, and the laſt ouerthrow giuen to the Perſian (though attributed to Abaſſa) being executed by a Nobleman of that Nation, they then ſent to offer themſelues in a confederacy of that war.
The meſſage was acceptable, and the Archbiſhop of Calcedon their countryman appointed to receiue, entertaine, and returne with them as Embaſſador from the Port, to confirme and diſpoſe the whole Nation (who were gouerned by three Princes) to enter into this League, D and to make warre vpon the King of Perſia. The race of thoſe three Families had long ruled that Countrey, whereof one was accounted the chiefeſt (though the others had ſeuerall juriſdictions) of which the maſculine line was then failed, except only one, who being made Turke young, was a Baſſa neere the Red Sea. The State ſent vnto him, and made meanes to the Vizier, that hee might returne and be their Prince; but on condition that he ſhould become a Chriſtian: but that being denied them, they elected the daughter of their laſt Prince, notwithſtanding their antient Law, that excludes the ſucceſſion and rule of women; and hauing procured therein a diſpenſation from the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, thoſe Embaſſadors had alſo order for formes ſake, to procure the confirmation from the Grand Signior; which was granted them.

The Perſian feignedly deſires peace, and the Georgians ſend their Embaſſadors.

E The Ianizaries mutined in the Blacke-Sea being againe appeaſed, the Captaine Baſſa ſent out Sackſachi Baſſa, hauing made a fleet of an hundred and foureſcore frigots, and armed them, to keep the riuers about Oſu, by which the Coſſackes deſcended. Sackſachi arriuing at Oſu, and finding all quiet, on the Biram day went aſhore; and being at dinner, was ſurpriſed by the Coſſackes, and hardly eſcaping, loſt all his fleet, and many of his men. The Captaine Baſſa hauing aduice of this ouerthrow, made all haſte to Oſu, and finding no ſhew of enemy, reſolued to go on towards Caffa; but that night the Coſſackes deſcending with their boats by many out-lets, the Baſſa of Oſu ſent to him to returne ſpeedily and make haſte towards Conſtantinople, for that the enemy, growne proud with their late victory, ſuppoſing no other force abroad, were directly gone for the Boſphorus, and were reſolued to aſſault the Imperiall F city, or at leaſt (as they boaſted) to burne the Arſinall. Vpon this aduice, the Captaine Baſſa ſet ſaile, and the next morning by breake of day, and in a fog, fell in with the fleet of the Coſſackes (conſiſting of three hundred and fifty frigots, that carried from forty to foureſcore musketiers apeece) and was ſo mingled with them, that he could neither vſe his ordnance for the danger of his owne gallies, nor auoid them without fight. Thus engaged, the Coſſackes furiouſly began the aſſault, and being three or foure boats to one gally, boorded them; twice they entred the maine maſt of the Admirall galley of the Turks, killed three at the helme, G and broke the rudder off; which being againe faſtened by foure Chriſtian ſlaues, and the Sunne breaking out, ſo as the gallies could vſe their great ſhot, and the winde riſing, the Coſſackes were forced to leaue their fight, and betake them to their oares; where in parting, with the ordnance (as was reported) thirty boats were ſunke, and ſix or ſeuen hundred men taken vp. The conflict was bloudy on both ſides, being come to hand blowes, and therein the Ianiyaries almoſt conſumed. The Captaine Baſſa ſent to the Port for ſupply of men, and all that tooke pay of the Grand Signior, euen to the old ſoldiers which were put to penſion, were ſent away, ſome to make gard at Chanakchy by land, on the mouth of the Boſphorus; other by water to re-enforce the Armado, and all was filled with trouble and terrour. The feare of the H Tartars likewiſe was not ſo extinquiſhed that there was not cauſe to expect ſome attempt by land, Shachi Gheray being in armes; and thoſe motions if not ſuddenly appeaſed, would occaſion another breach with Poland.

The Plague at that time raged as if it would haue diſpeopled the city of Conſtantinople and the villages adjacent, and the Francke Nations did all feele it; but the Turks and Iewes by Armies, as if they went to conquer hell, if there were no league and confederacy betweene them. On the three and twentieth of Iuly there was Corban or ſacrifice made at the gate of the Seraglio, two Beeues and a hundred Sheepe: at euery other Port of the city two Beeues and ſome Sheepe for the contagion and warre.

Ianet Ogli returned againe towards Smyrna, and the Chaya or Lieutenant of the Bey of the I city, raiſing three thouſand ſouldiers, went out againſt him, hoping to draw more to follow him: they met at a plaine, and fought valiantly, Ianet Ogli remaining victor, with the death of the Chaia, and two thouſand of his men: and he was dayly expected at Smyrna, hauing ſent before to aſſure the people that he would do no violence to any Trader or Inhabitant, but only renew the Oath of obedience to him, and puniſh ſome that were authors of this enterpriſe againſt him. The Merchant-ſtrangers were ſo confident in him, as they purpoſed not to ſtir, but to receiue him as their Protector; and thought the Rebell an honeſter man, than any Iuſtice of their Towne. The myſtery of this ſtrange courſe could ſcarce be penetrated, for he ſtill reported he had authority from the Grand Signior; though it was denied at the Port, for they were glad to know how to quiet him. K Ianet Ogli taken and ſlaine.

Yet not many daies after, he fought a battell which he loſt, and was taken, being betraied by his owne followers; and it was deſired that he might be brought aliue to be ſeene at the Port; but the Ianizaries crucified him, and ſent his, and his mothers, and his brethrens heads together, ſo that the tumor was ſuddenly allayed.

About the foure and twentieth of September the gallies returned from the Blacke-Sea, with the loſſe only of foure, by a great ſtorme. The Captaine Baſſa brought in triumph two hundred and ſeuenty poore Coſſackes, and was receiued, as if Pompey had againe finiſhed the Piratique war, that almoſt famiſhed Rome. But they did not triumph at the victory, but ouer the conquered people; and they eſteemed this ſea fight next to that of Lepanto; but the nobler for the eſcape: for doubtleſſe if the winde had not riſen too great for the frigots, which L were in number neere foure hundred, the whole fleet had beene in danger to haue been towed Northwards euen vnto the jawes of the Enemy.

The great Deſterdar ſtrangled and throwne into the ſtreets.

About the ſame time, the great Deſterdar, Treaſuror of that Empire, was ſent for into the Kings Gardens, and there by the Buſtangi Baſſa ſtrangled and flung out in his ſhirt into the ſtreets; an vſuall end of riches and greatneſſe in that Court. Otherwiſe, the State of that Empire did then produce no remarkeable alteration: for the jealouſie of the Tartars was ſomewhat appeaſed; but the Termes with Poland were vncertaine, while the Coſſackes were yet vnreſtrained. The Grand Signior vſed all flattery to the Tartar Han, to enter Poland in reuenge: Which he promiſed, and rode as farre as Akyrman; but from thence excuſed his not proceeding vpon the waters: which was doubtfully interpreted, That he had no will. In the M meane time the King of Poland ſent an Army againſt the Coſſackes, to ſhew his ſincerity to the Peace; which was very well taken of the Turks.

The Perſians ouerthrown by the Georgians.

The Georgians in the meane time gaue a blow to the Perſian, and ſent many of their heads to the Port by a Nuntio; who was preſently diſpatched away with the Biſhop of Calcedon,

as

A as Embaſſador of the Grand Signior, to enter league with thoſe Princes, to make ſome di-uerſion. Abaſſa the old Rebell would not yet truſt himſelfe with the Viſier, but pretended he would vnite himſelfe with the Georgians in the ſeruice of that State; although he fortified himſelfe ſtrongly, and diſcharged all his Ianizaries. The Grand Signior to aſſure him, or to preuent that hee ſhould not reuolt, ſent him the dignity of a Viſier, a Sword and a Veſt, and authority to make war in company of the Georgians, in quality of a Generall (ſo well a ſtrong Theefe proſpered there:) and hee arriued not long after with his army at * Moſull, a  Niniue.* place recouered from the Perſians in the way to Babylon: who vnderſtanding of ſupply of eight thouſand, ſent thither by the Perſian to re-inforce the garriſon, ſent out a party of Courds, that encountred and broke them, obteining a full victory with the fall of two thou-B ſand, and the Generall and two young Sultans taken priſoners; who were ſent to the Port, with the heads of their followers. The news of which ouerthrow was receiued with much joy and content in the Court. The Viſier demanded a million and two hundred thouſand Checquines to be ſent before-hand for foure moneths pay of the Army; giuing this reaſon, That foreſeeing he muſt Winter in thoſe parts, and that Babylon would be defended, it was neceſſary to haue mony to hold his ſouldiers together; for if he ſhould diuide them to their Hybernation, it would be Auguſt before they could be drawne into the field, and the Spring loſt: and to hold them that were already almoſt in mutiny, were impoſſible, vpon credit. To this end all waies were vſed to raiſe money; a third of which ſum was ſent from the Port, but the reſt was hardly found (for the ordinary charge far exceeded the reuenue) and fell very heauy C vpon ſuch as were forced to contribute.

The Perſian King, reported to be taken in his limbes at the ſame time (which did commonly forerunne ſome ſudden enterpriſe) lay with his Army about Tauris, indifferently to ſuccour Babylon, and to attend the Circaſſians, or to make ſome diuerſion when he ſhould ſee the Viſiers Army ſetled and ingaged in a ſiege: Which was not long deferred; for hee beſieged Babylon, wherein was eight thouſand Perſians in defence. His regular army (conſiſting of Ianizaries and Spahies, directly paied from the Grand Signior) were lodged on the one ſide; and the Beghs (which were thirteen) with the Timariots and Souldiers repartited on their gouernments on the other. As they began their approches, in a morning twenty thouſand Perſian horſe fell into the quarter of the Vizier, and did a great execution: but the D alarme taken by the Beghs, they came to his reſcue, and the Perſians retired. In that faction there fell fiue or ſix thouſand Turks. Whereupon after there was made a generall muſter, and not found aboue foure thouſand Ianizaries of twelue thouſand; nor ten thouſand Spa-hies, of thirty thouſand that were written for the war: ſo that all the ſtrength did reſt in the Beghs, who were well followed, and little care or obedience in the other Orders. There were ſeuen Princes of the Arabs, who were ſubject to the Grand Signior, and ought to ſerue and aid him when they were commanded; but being ſummoned, they raiſed their forces by common conſent, and ſtaied vpon their owne borders; anſwering, They durſt not diſpleaſe the poſſeſſor of Babylon; but if the victory did returne, they would yeeld their antient obedience vnto the Grand Signior: and if the Perſian did hold his recouered right, they alſo E would no longer acknowledge any ſuperiour, being (as they pretended) borne of free An-ceſtors.

About the fiue and twentieth of March there fell a great ſtorme vpon the Bailo of Venice, 1626. for an accidentall fight by a Venetian Veſſell with a Bey of Andry: Many of the Turks were ſlaine, and the Captaine Baſſa pretended great damages; auerring, That their gally was rich and rifled. He anſwered wiſely and ſtoutly, That it was a chance, and would vnderſtand of no compoſition, but onely write to the Senate to examine the cauſe by juſtice. But the Turks ſought to draw an inference, That he, as Procurator of the Republique, was bound to ſtand in Law before the Iudges of the Port (where he was like enough to be heard and condemned F together) and then to remaine as a Pledge for ſatisfaction. But he would not yeeld ſo much aduantage; inſiſting, that he was an Embaſſador, to expound the ſence of his Prince, and to maintaine the amity: and ſo by his ſtanding mute the buſineſſe reſted in diſcontent.

The gouernment of the Turkiſh Empire daily declined, and (as a great and ſtrong Body) The Ianizaries had violent luctations before it yeelded and waſted. The Ianizaries about the laſt of March mutine againſt the Boſtangi Baſſa.

mutined againſt the Boſtangi Baſſa, for beating one of their Order (for diſorder in the night) G by the Grand Signiors command, and before his window. For by their Canon, they ought to be deliuered to their owne Capes to be judged and puniſhed; yet, though the Emperors Word ſhould be aboue the Law of his ſlaues, and though he avowed the fact, ſent, and wrote vnto them, nothing would appeaſe them; onely his life they pardoned, exacting his diſplacing, with ſentence of incapability euer to beare office. He had beene a good ſeruant to his Maſter, carefull of the publique Honour, ſeuere againſt the licentiouſneſſe of the times, and therefore vnfit for them. Afterward (following the example) they began to quarrell with the Vizier, who had fauoured the Boſtangi; and with much labour they were ſilenced for a time, but not quieted. This was their eſtate: What could then ſtrangers expect, when the Emperor ſuffered injuries of his owne bondmen? H

At the ſame time, an open rupture betweene the Grand Signior and the King of Poland was like to ſucceed an inuaſion made a little before into Podolia by the Tartar Han; who returning from thence with a great prey, was met, and loſt with a part of it, the greateſt part of his Army. Whoſe brother Shachin Gheray refuſing to accompany the action, as contrary to the Peace and his Oath, ſent the Generall Koneſpolsky the copy of the Order from the Port; which being diſcouered, the Vizier hearkened after any ouerture or meanes to make vp the breach, and to procure a new reconciliation. But the ouerthrow giuen to the Tartars encouraged the Poles to declare their reuenge, and to auow the attempt of the Coſſackes, who were then ready with ſeuen hundred frigots to fall vpon ſome part neere Conſtantinople, munition being allowed them, and a Poliſh captaine to euery boat. They threatened to fight with I the Grand Signiors Armado, and made a vow to inueſt and carry away the Admirall galley. All the villages on the Boſphorus to the gates of Conſtantinople trembled, and the city it ſelfe was not without feare; ſoftened by certaine propheciés and Aſtrologians, who foretold a great blow from a Northerne people. Twenty gallies kept the mouth of the channell, and the Captaine Baſſa was to depart within ten daies with forty more; almoſt already conquered with his owne and the common feares.

The Grand Signiors army beſieged before Babylon.

Certaine newes was brought from Babylon, That the King of Perſia had beſieged the Viziers campe, and that he was lodged vpon his Trenches, and had cut off all acceſſe and prouiſion: ſo that the Grand Signiors care was then greater to ſaue his Army, than to recouer that City. Yet his Miniſters did abate little of their pride, but were more ready to doe a wrong or any inſolency than euer; inſenſible of their owne eſtate, or diſſembling it a peruerſe K way.

The King of Poland being yet very loth to breake the peace with the Grand Signior, which had been concluded betweene them chiefely at the inſtance and mediation of his Majeſty of Great Britaine; although the Tartars had entred his countries, and done great ſpoile, he cauſed his Miniſter to write to his Majeſties Embaſſador at the Port, to lay downe their juſt complaint: which the Embaſſador did, in confidence of his friendſhip with the Chimacham; to whom he went, directly preſſing him as well to a conſideration of his Maſters and his owne eſtate, as of that of the King of Poland: That all the burthen and blame would finally light vpon him; it being the vſuall way of great Princes, to diſcharge their failings and L errours vpon their Miniſters. This admonition moued the Chimacham much, and this was the ſubſtance of his anſwer:

In all Lawes and Religions (ſaid he) there is nothing more odious than to be eſteemed a Lyar; becauſe Law and Religion preſuppoſe truth, eſpecially in great Miniſters, vpon whoſe faith much of the publique quiet doth depend: but moſt eſpecially at ſuch a time (for then it was * Ramazan) ſeparate to deuotion, that it was moſt abhominable to God to ſweare a lye, by whom he ſwore, and by the life of the King, all whoſe benefits might be poyſon to him in his heart, if euer either he or his Maſter gaue any order or intimation to the Tartar Han to enter Poland, or to doe any act contrary to the Peace: which if he had done he might juſtifie, ſeeing the Coſſackes the yeare before did make the firſt breach, and gaue the occaſion. To witneſſe this aſſertion hee called the * Reitzkatab, who made no M ſcruple, jurare in Verba Magiſtri, to ſweare to what his Maſter had ſaid: onely he confeſſed there were Commands written to Mehemet Gheray, by intelligence and conſent of the Poliſh Generall, to enter the country of the Coſſacks on both ſides, to reduce them to obedience; with reſtriction of any damage to be done to thoſe comprehended in the Peace: and that what-

A whatſoeuer the Tartar Han had don more, was and ſhould be diſauowed, as beyond his Commiſſion.
Many other matters he repeated, as the remoue of Cante-Emir, and the death of Hagy-Key, only to auoid any occaſion of their parts. And in concluſion, all his diſcourſe tended to an expreſſion of deſire to maintaine a good and perfect Peace. His Majeſties Embaſſador asked the Chimacham, what he was willing he ſhould write in anſwer to the King of Polands Miniſters? Who briefely anſwered, That they had no other intent but to keepe the late Treaty; and that if vpon the Poles part (as they had begun) the Coſſackes ſhould be reſtrained, they would take abſolute order with the Tartars; who had no other pretence of quarrell, but a claime of a certaine penſion (mentioned in the Treaty) vſually giuen them; which if his Majeſty of Poland would eſtabliſh, there ſhould neuer be more occaſion of thoſe B mutuall laments: that it were a diſhonour to the Grand Signior, to ſeeke and entreat the comming of an Embaſſador to ſettle thoſe late diſorders; but if the King of Poland pleaſed to ſend one, he ſhould be receiued with all rites and reſpects. To this the Engliſh Embaſſador replied, That he doubted ſome ill example of the vſage and detention of others, would make the Polacke wary, and difficult to engage any perſon of Quality. To which he gaue all ſuch aſſurance of good and free acceptation as words could expreſſe. All which, the Embaſſador returned in writing to the Miniſters of Poland; entreating both parties to conniue at what was paſt, and endeauor by all meanes afterward to reſtraine thoſe mutuall incurſions, which were begun anew by the Coſſackes, the noiſe of whom had ſtrucke the Imperiall city with great feare.

The Spahies cauſe the Chimacham to be ſtrangled.

 Maſter of the horſe.*

C Vpon the third of Iune the Spahies aſſembled in the Hippodrome; diſcontent with the gouernment of the old Chimacham Georgi Mehemet Baſſa (the ableſt and wiſeſt man in that State, but to Chriſtians malicious, and of the Poles a continuall perſecutor) who had the authority of the great Viſier in his abſence at the war; and in great fury ran to the houſe of the Mufti, and demanded of him to pronounce a ſentence of death againſt him, and that hee would riſe and informe the Grand Signior of their will; which if he refuſed, they threatened a generall reuolt, and to doe their owne juſtice. There was no remedy; the Emperor being enformed, was pleaſed inſtantly to diſplace him, and to giue the office to Regeb Captain Baſſa, or Admirall, and his office to * Imbrahor Baſſa; hoping thus to quiet all matters. But this gaue them no ſatisfaction, they demanded in greater fury his life. The poore old man was D retyred into the Grand Signiors protection, who vſed all meanes to appeaſe them, offering to baniſh or confine him: but nothing would content or ſeparate them vntill he had deliuered him vp; who the next day was ſtrangled and throwne into the ſtreets, where the Barbarians vented their ſpleene vpon his dead body, cutting off his eares and noſe, and carrying them in triumph to their fellowes. Preſently they demand the life of ſome others, principally of Morat Chiaus the Cuſtomer (odious to all men) whom when they could not finde, they ſacked his houſe. Within a day or two after they began to be quiet, vpon promiſe, That if he could be found he ſhould be rendred to them, and others be brought to Iuſtice: but all feared that that Peſtilence and Deſtruction of the city would eſcape by force of his money, hauing three times before beene in the like danger. That great Miniſter or Chimacham was ninety ſix E yeares old, had been forty fiue yeares Viſier, and thrice Chimacham. The great ſeruices he had done, euen to the preſeruation of the Empire, nor any other reſpect could protect him from this rage. The occaſion then taken againſt him, was, That he did conceale the ill eſtate of the army in Babylon, flattering the Grand Signior, while their fellowes periſhed; and certaine Letters written in bloud, pretended from the Campe, produced to accuſe him; which afterward were diſcouered to be written in Conſtantinople. When the ſentence was deliuered to the Boſtangi Baſſa, he came to the lodging of the Chimacham in the Kings Garden, where he thought himſelfe in ſanctuary, and for reuerence to his age and place, held it (being written) in his hand, rather to intimate, than to be the meſſenger. The poore old man perceiuing it, deſired an houre to pray; and conjured him to warne the Grand Signior, hereafter, not F to be ſo eaſie to conſent to ſhed innocent bloud, which within few daies he would repent: and laſtly he entreated, that he might not die by the foule hands of the Hangman: which coſt him deare; for the Boſtangies executioners, either for reſpect, or for want of skill, could not finiſh his life (ſo great was his old heart) in one houre: he was buried by a few Raſcals, his owne ſeruants hid, and no man daring to accompany him to his laſt Bed.

The immediate foregoing diſcourſe was filled with the injuſtice and inſolency of man; G but this bringeth with it the example and juſtice of God, who reuengeth the bloud of his enemies and wicked men, vnjuſtly ſpilt, to preſerue his image euen amongſt them that ſtudy to deſtroy it. To this may be fitly applied that boldneſſe, Non eſſe curæ deus ſecuritatem eorum, eſſe vltionem: The Ianizaries either enuious that they had no part in the laſt ſedition, or being innocent, vnwilling to participare in the infamy, or rather it was theit turne to do ſomewhat; forced the boats of the gallies which lay aboue Conſtantinople in the channell, and came downe to a garden houſe vpon the ſea in the night, where the Emperor priuatly repoſed, and began to exclaime againſt the death of the innocent; proteſting they had no ſhare therein, but as obedient ſlaues they deſired the peace of the State, and that Iuſtice and quietneſſe might returne to the City; and requiring reuenge vpon diuers whom they accuſed as H the authors of thoſe tumults, they named their owne * Segmen Baſſa as the principall, and eighteene of their owne officers, and diuers others of the chiefe Spahies, who held councels together, and were become heads of Factions; which vntill they were all cut off, there was no hope of good gouernment and peace. The Grand Signior gaue them milde words, and promiſed to do juſtice, and to puniſh all ſuch as ſhould be found guilty: but nothing being don to ſatisfie them, and it being beleeued that the new Chimacham conniued, and had bin a party to all their counſels, at leaſt his preferment made him obnoxious to that ſuſpition; and it was moſt true, that the Segmen Baſſa and his followers & faction were the contriuers of the fall and muther of Georgi Mehemet Baſſa, and very probable that he was fauoured if not protected by the new Miniſter; the Ianizaries roſe againe, and by force brought downe the gallies I neere the City, and landed and held a Councell very ſecret in their chambers. This bred much ſuſpition and feare; but the day of publique audience being come, according to the cuſtome, they repaired all to the Seraglio, and waited in their order: their Segmen Baſſa only did not appeare; and it was thought he abſented purpoſely by agreement with the Chimacham, leſt there ſhould be ſome occaſion to examine the paſt buſineſſe, which would not endure the light. The * Diuan being finiſhed, and the Viziers and * Caddee Leſchers comming towards the gate, they were ſtopped by the Ianizaries, and told plainely they would ſpeake with the King. Such perſuaſions as were requiſite were vſed; but there was no remedy, they would deliuer their owne meſſage. The young Emperor at firſt was afraid, and retired; but to auoid greater inconueniences, reſolued to come out to them. Order was inſtantly K giuen to ſend for the Mufti and the Antients of the Law, and many * Santons, for the Segmen Baſſa, and others of quality to be preſent at this action. In the meane time a Throne was brought out, and placed in the great Court, and the Grand Signior came forth and ſate in his Majeſty, attended and aſſiſted by all the great Miniſters and Officers of his Empire, to ſtrike a reuerence and feare into the ſouldiers, whoſe purpoſes were not yet diſcouered. Contrary to all expectation, an Electo ſpake for them: In all humble manner profeſſing their obedience, and lamenting the ſickeneſſe of the State, and the dayly inſolencies; and declaring, as they were not guilty of this laſt mutiny, ſo they were ready to ſpend their bloud in defence of their Prince, and for the reformation of thoſe diſorders (to which there could be applied no remedy but by the ſword of Iuſtice to cut off all thoſe heads which held Conuenticles, and plotted dayly alterations, onely to gouerne the whole L Empire at their will.) They deſired their Petition might be accepted, and thoſe diſturbers of the peace ſought out and executed, in which they would aſſiſt: and that new names and titles might be forbidden, which many had taken vp as Heads of Factions; and the Souldiery reduced to their antient diſcipline: Which if his Majeſty would grant and ſpeedily put in practiſe, they were ready to die in his ſeruice; otherwiſe, as there was no hope of quietneſſe, ſo they did foreſee greater miſchiefes dayly contemplated, which they would oppoſe as well as they were able. At the end of this Oration (which might haue become a Cato) they deliuered a briefe petition in writing, wherein they modeſtly accuſed the new Chimacham of confederacy and conniuence with their Segmen Baſſa, whom they anew appealed, and gaue vp the names of thoſe their owne Officers, and Spahies, vpon whom they layd all the burthen of the dayly tumults. The Emperor gaue them a ſhort, but ſatiſfactory M anſwer; yeelding to their requeſt, yet mingled with ſome admonition ſuch as became a Prince: and ſo they departed euery man to their owne reſt. Afterwards diuers of both Orders were taken (as was reported, to the number B of twenty two) priuately ſtrangled, and throwne into the ſea; and ſome (principally branded) were hidden and fled. This trouble turned the Grand Signior to account many waies; for by confiſcations he aduanced a million and two hundred and fifty thouſand Dollars of the Segmen Baſſa; by the Scriuano as much; by others, very great ſummes; and, as if peace had riſen out of the graue of the old Chimacham, there was heard no more noiſe: the Spahies ſhrunke, and the Ianizaries as their glory tooke vpon them an auſtere reformation. But there were many inward ſores and diſcontents, which notwithſtanding all this cleere aire, were like to breake out, and one ſtorme could not be ſufficient to cure or purge the corruptions of that State.

But hereupon there was a publike Councell held, in which all Orders as well ciuill as military aſſiſted; and a preſent ſupply collected, and a Generall choſen to conduct them.

Written in the middle of the month of Iuly, 1626. In Conſtantinople.

About this time there arriued a Letter from the King of great Brittaine to the grand Signior, concerning the Treaty of Algier and Tunes, and complaining of diuers injuries done to B his ſubiects, and requiring juſtice and redreſſe, Which being reſpectiuely anſwered, are worthy of publique communication.

His Maieſties Letter to the grand Signior.

CHARLES by the grace of the moſt high God, King of great Britain, France and Ireland; Defender of the Chriſtian Faith, &c. To the high and mighty Emperor Sultan Morat Han, chiefe Lord and Commander of the Ottoman Kingdom, ſole & ſupreme C Monarch of the Eaſtern Empire, ſendeth greeting.

WE haue vnderſtood by our Embaſſador reſident with you, with how much honor and reſpect the death of our dear Lord and Father of euer-glorious memory was condoled at your Imperiall Port; And if the ſignification therof, and of our peaceable ſucceſſion to theſe Crowns, haue not in all this time come vnto you immediatly from our ſelfe, it hath not bin through any default of our affection, or reſpect to you, but many important affaires vpon our firſt acceſſe, and the dangerous infection wherewith our royall city of London, and many D other principall parts of our Kingdom haue been viſited, haue diuerted vs, and forced vs to defer theſe offices longer than we intended or deſired. And as we hope you will for theſe important reaſons, readily and freely excuſe thoſe omiſſions which in ſo weighty occaſions may well be diſpenſed withall; ſo we pray you to be aſſured, That wee are deſirous that the amitie which hath of long time bin held between our predeceſſors, may be renued, continued, and confirmed; and the intercourſe of trade betweene our ſubiects and yours, be maintained and preſerued, for the good of both our kingdoms and people. And to giue you the better proofe of our reall and ſincere intentions therein, we haue ratified, and do ratifie the treaty made by our Embaſſador Sir Thomas Rowe in that your Imperiall Port, with your E Subjects of Algier and Tunes; and we canot doubt, but that you for your part will keep a conſtancie in the exact performance thereof, and to that end will lay your royall command vpon theſe your vaſſals of Algier and Tunes, duly to obſerue the articles of that Treaty in all reſpects toward our ſubiects. We do likewiſe recommend vnto you, and pray you, in conformitie to our deſire of friendſhip and good correſpondencie, to confirme and ratifie thoſe priuiledges which haue bin formerly granted by your predeceſſors to our Merchants, and to inlarge the ſame according to preſent occaſions, and as ſhall be moſt conuenient for the good of both our Kingdomes: which as we will ſtudy by all good means to keepe vp in full force, and moſt aduantagious F execution; ſo we may not omit to repreſent vnto you the grieuances of our ſubiects when they are vniuſtly wronged, contrary to the capitulations between vs, and we preſume without your knowledge or conſent. That which we haue now to deſire your juſtice in, is, Firſt, for extreame injuries done by inferior officers, and eſpecially by one Morat Chaus a Cuſtomer of that Port, who hath not only broken, but alſo ſcorned and contemned the articles of the Capi- G tulation, and that in the publique Divan, to your diſhonour, and to the great preiudice of our Merchants. Secondly, an open injuſtice don to our ſubiects in Algier, wherin our Engliſh Con-ſul and the reſt of our Nation were reſtrained of their liberty, their goods ſeiſed vpon, and forced to pay great ſums of mony, contrary to juſtice and the direct terms of the Treaty. But if while we on our behalfe do obſerue the Capitulation, and all good tearmes of friendſhip, ſuch meane perſons as Cuſtomers and other Officers be ſuffered and borne out in theſe vniuſt inſolencies and oppreſsions vpon our ſubiects, in a manifeſt breach of the Capitulations, we canot ſhut our ears againſt the petitions of our ſubiects, but muſt according to their humble ſuit, giue H order to withdraw their perſons and eſtates from ſuch dangers, wrongs, and injuſtice; vnleſſe vpon this our inſtance we find a ſpeedy redreſſe & exemplary puniſhment inflicted vpon ſuch as haue or ſhall tranſgreſſe the rules of juſtice, and the amity and contract between vs; which we recommend to your iudgement and care, as a matter wherein the welfare of our and your people and countries is intereſſed. We do further particularly pray you, to giue expreſſe order for the vpholding and maintaining of that article of priuiledge, for the paying but only of one Cuſtom within all the ports vnder your juriſdiction, with free liberty to export any commodi-tie, hauing once payd cuſtom, without further charge, and that our ſubiects be not exacted vp- I on contrary to that priuiledge. The further particulars of our ſubiects grieuances, and what elſe we deſire to be negotiated with you, we haue giuen in charge to our Embaſſador Sir Thomas Rowe, to whom we pray you to giue credit, and to return vs full anſwers to the ſeuerall points of this our letter. Wherin if you ſhall giue reliefe to our ſubiects, and puniſh thoſe that violate the capitulation, we ſhal receiue it as a ſingular teſtimony of your juſtice, your good intentions toward vs, your conſtancie in your contracts, and your iudgement in what hath relation to the good of your owne Dominions; and we ſhall be ready to anſwer that realtie of yours, in whatſoeuer ſhall reſt on our part to perform.

Dated the firſt of March, 1626.

The grand Signiors Anſwer to his Majeſties Letter of Great Britain.

Prince Morat, euer ſucceſſefull;

L

TO the mighty Prince, reuerend amongſt the Maieſties of the Princes of the Law of Ieſus, obeyed of the great Potentates Followers of the Meſsia, the onely Director of the important affairs of the Nazaren people, Soueraign of the limits of honor and power, the most glorious CHARLES King of Great Britaine; To whoſe laſt dayes we wiſh all felicitie.

M

TO the ſublime and happy Throne of our high Port, the Seat of the perpetuall Vicariat, the which by the mercy of the Diuine Maieſtie of the mighty God, and by the grace of the Lord was the Seale of the Prophets, vpon whom be continuall bleſsing, and the refuge of the Princes vpon the face of the earth, and the Sanctuarie of the Potentates of the world; your Letter with accuſtomed ſinceritie is arriued, by the hands of your Embaſſador, the elect among the Nation of Meſſiah, Sir Thomas Rowe, reſident in our happy Port, to whoſe end we wiſh bleſſedneſſe. The which, according to the antient Ottoman cuſtome, and the vſed Imperiall forme, was by our ſupream Vizier and glorious Vicegerent tranſlated and expounded; and being preſented before our State of moſt ample honour and felicitie, and ſeene by our Imperiall eies, and conſidered by our benigne ſight, from the beginning to the end, our noble vnderſtanding hath intirely perceiued the inſerted buſineſſe, and all particulars thereof; and our diſcreet aſpection, from the leaſt to the greateſt, hath comprehended all your propoſed affaires, all which conduce to loue. The principall whereof is (beſides that you haue fully mentioned, and declared the ſtate of the Amitie that between both Dominions hath been preſerued by your Fathers and Anceſtors) That now your Majeſtie, after your Father of glorious memorie, being by iuſt inheritance aſcended to the Regalitie of thoſe Crownes, doth aduiſe vs, That you alſo more than your Father, are ſtable and firme in the ſame way of friendſhip, and moſt conſtant towards vs, in preſeruation of the Peace and good correſpondence, and daily attentiue to endeauour the ſtrengthning of the Peace and Amitie with our Port, and reſolued to accompliſh the ſame; and not to faile in any part of louing correſpondence. With which your friendly aduice, with moſt ſincere words expreſſed, are to vs moſt gratefull; That you in a bleſſed houre, and a happy time, haue poſſeſſed, and begun to reigne in the Kingdomes of your Father; the ſecret of our pureſt heart was greatly reioyced, and did conceiue abundance of contentment, and our Imperial Maieſty alſo hath therfore obtained, and together expreſſed all manner of gladneſſe and loue toward your Majeſty, in diuining you all happineſſe.

You haue alſo aduiſed vs, That your aboue named Embaſſador, yet abiding in our bleſſed Port, hauing formerly treated with thoſe of Tunes and Algier, and contracted concerning your Merchants, and their free traffique and commerce in thoſe partss, and conformably with them agreed, concluded and confirmed the Peace; the which being very profitable and commodious to both our Kingdomes, that you haue alſo ratified, and in the whole condiſcended thereunto; deſiring, That on our behalfe alſo the ſame ſhould be obſerued: and to the end that for euer hereafter there may be no deuiation from the ſame Accord, and that to the Merchants, according to the antient Cuſtome, going and comming to thoſe parts to traffique and negotiate, contrary to the Imperiall Capitulation, no iniury may be by them done; That we ſhould ſend to our Vice-Kings our expreſſe commands. Therefore you ſhall know, That we haue already ſent to our ſaid Vice-Royes, with expreſſe order, our moſt efficacious and Imperiall Commandements, and ſtrictly charged them, Neuer to tranſgreſſe the ſame contracted Agreement; and that they take heed, Not to do any wrong or violence to any of your Merchants (contrary to our Imperiall Capitulations) trading and vſing thoſe parts.

And furthermore hauing ſignified vnto vs, That certaine Magiſtrates and Cuſtomers of ſome Scales of our well defended Empire, contrary to the Articles and Couenants written in the Imperiall Capitulations, do make diuers demands of grieuances and impoſitions of your Merchants, and vnder the name of Meſteria,* and ſuch like, do pretend and exact money from them: and hauing alſo aduiſed vs, That conformable to the Imperiall Capitulation, your Merchants hauing paid their due cuſtome, and tranſporting their goods to other Scales; That they alſo demand of them a new Cuſtome: Therefore it being in no wiſe our Imperiall will that in our proſperous days, and iuſt and peacefull reigne, according to our Imperiall Capitulation, That wrong ſhould be done to any man; We haue giuen vpon this particular, our requiſite and ſufficient Imperial Command, and ſtreitly commanded and ordained, That they ſhall neuer tranſgreſſe our Imperiall Capitulation; and that the Nation of your Merchants, in what place or Scale ſoeuer they ſhall go, the Magiſtrates and Cuſtomers do all diligence, that the ſaid Merchants may liue quietly, contentedly, and ſecurely; and hauing payd in one Scale the cuſtome of any merchandiſe, which being not ſold, and that they ſhall tranſport it to any other Scale, that they take great heed, not to demand nor take of them any new Cuſtome, nor euer, contrary to the Canon, to exact of them any new impoſition or other grieuance.

* Church duties.

You haue alſo further aduiſed vs, That the late Huſſreph Baſſa, while he remained in the charge of Vice-King of Algier, did vniuſtly take your Conſul, reſident in Algier, with the Merchants which liued with him, and hauing impriſoned them contrary to the Law, Iuſtice, and the friendſhip betweene vs, did take from them certaine thouſands of Dollars, and had done to them other great wrong and damage: therefore, ſeeing it is more cleere than the Sunne-ſhine day, that it is not in any ſort by our conſent, that ſuch injuſtice and inſolent actions ſhould be committed, and there being then preſent in our happy Port ſome of the principall perſons of the garriſon of that place of Algier, who did know the whole proceeding, and we hauing commanded they ſhould bee examined of that buſineſſe, they were preſently brought to Iuſtice, and being all of them variouſly reprehended and affrighted, they did anſwer, confeſſing G and obliging themſelues, That all the money taken they would repay from the reuenue of the cuſtome, and Fiſts collected; and as ſoon as they ſhould arriue in Algier, they would take order that the Conſul and all the Merchants ſhould be ſet free. In conformity whereof, we alſo haue written our moſt effectuall and noble Command, reprehenſiue and threatning, directed to the Vize-Re of Algier, and commanded him, That in this buſines he vſe no negligence, but that without further delay he ſet at liberty the ſaid Conſul and Merchants, and reſtore vnto them entirely all their goods taken from them, and that he know, that hereafter no ſuch action ſhall be pardoned; and that your Conſul ſent into thoſe parts, according to antient cuſtome, ſhall be entertained and honoured, and that hee doe punctually obſerue and execute the due tearmes of friendſhip.

And in the Concluſion, concerning all the included particulars of your Letter; in due forme, and H befitting our Majeſtie the Fountaine of Iuſtice, and conformable to the Tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations, there haue been written diuers our noble Commandements, and conſigned to the hands of your ſaid Embaſſadour; and for the time to come, in all things which ſhall lead to the increaſe of our friendſhip, and thoſe offices, commodious and profitable to the Merchants of both our Dominions, our Imperiall ſtudy and attention ſhall not bee ſpared: and be you aſſured, that the termes of our Amitie and good correſpondence which to this day hath been continued, ſhall bee of vs with excellent endeauor maintained.

But being informed from our honorable Gouernor, wiſe Councellor, and Viſier, Haydar Baſſa (whoſe ſplendor God preſerue) whom wee haue aſſigned and ſent to the cuſtodie of the boundleſſe Ayman, that there is come a petition, with a repreſentation and atteſtation of the principall of that Kingdome, to our I happy Port, declaring, That in times paſt, in the gouernment of our Fezeli Baſſa, Vizier, now dead, being that certaine men of war appertaining to your Kingdomes, had contrary to the Capitulations, aſſailed the Merchants which with their goods returned from India, and fought and taken their ſhips, and it being made knowne to the ſaid Fezeli Baſſa, that our Merchants had been damaged to the value of ſix hundred thouſand Dollars: which action being it was contrary to Law, Iuſtice, and our Imperiall Capitulation, and that it was requiſite that the ſpoylers ſhould be condemned, the ſaid Fezeli Baſſa did collect from the Maſters of the ſaid men of warre, for the ſaid goods taken from our Merchants, an hundred thouſand Dollars, and did conſigne it to the true owners: and whereas there was yet remaining to them fiue hundred thouſand Dollars, the which to this day is not ſatisfied, the ſaid men of warre not containing themſelues in due forme, haue armed a new ſeuen ſhips from your Countrey, and haue come and aſſailed K fourteen ſhips of our Merchants, which from India were ſailing to the Scale of Ayman, and hauing taken the Maſters priſoners, haue made ſpoyle and depredation of all their facultie; and that now the Dutch Nation and your men of warre ride at anchor in the Port of Mecha, and do pretend the return of the hundred thouſand Dollars taken by Fezeli Baſſa. Which brute and ſcandolous wickedneſſe, in affront of our Imperiall power, to dare to perſeuer, and to ſpoyle and ranſacke thoſe parts, being ſignified to the feet of our Imperiall Throne, the Ocean of Iuſtice, and that thoſe robbed Merchants are ſubjects of our well defended Dominion. Being in no manner our Imperiall will, that there ſhould be loſt one of the ſaid Veſſels, nor any the leaſt part of their goods detained; and being that ſuch an action is very ingratefull, and oppugnant to the Peace and friendſhip between vs contracted, to the end that all the ſaid Merchants may bee ſet free, and that their goods and faculties taken, may bee entirely reſtored to the true L owners; which your Majeſtie cauſing to be done, you ſhall accompliſh the requiſite termes of true Amitie, and ſhall fulfill the offices of our ſincere Correſpondence, and ſhall ſtrengthen the foundation of our good and mutuall fidelitie and League, wee haue written you this our preſent Letter, full of all effectuall Loue.

At the arriuall whereof it is conuenient, that in conformitie of the great perfect and ſpotleſſe Amitie between your Anceſtors and our happy Port, and the Imperiall houſe of eternall glory, and the antient good Concord, Vnion and Correſpondence, that alſo your Maieſtie ſhould be firme and ſtable in all waies, with iuſt proceedings to preſerue and maintaine the meanes and Orders of friendſhip deſcended from your Fathers and Anceſtors. And if your Maieſtie deſire and will, That the termes of Amitie, and our good correſpondence ſhall be carefully obſerued and kept, you will then beſtow your good diligence and M care, that the aboue mentioned happened action, ſo diſcrepant from our Imperiall minde and will, that is, as is aboue written, That the fourteene ſhips of our Merchants which came from India to our well defenced Dominion, and Scale of Ayman, and were taken and ſurpriſed by the Engliſh Men of war, and the Merchants which were found in them all made ſlaues, and all their goods and faculties made prize; that they may be all ſet free, and all the goods taken from the ſaid Merchants may be entirely reſtored to the true owners; and ſo your Maieſtie ſhall haue conſerued our moſt happy mind and affection, and protected our moſt honorable and noble deſires: the performing of which your friendly office, vndoubtedly will produce to your Kingdomes many beneficiall and profitable effects; and certainly you ſhall finde, that it will redound to the great honour and fame of your Maieſty. And by the Grace of God, after that this our happy and moſt louing Letter ſhall arriue by ſome honourable perſon, and to you faithfull; be you pleaſed to ſend aduice to our excelſe Port, of the manner of your vſed diligence and affection in this buſineſſe, and of the effect of the libertie of our ſhips and Merchants, and of the full reſtitution of all the goods taken, to their right owners; and with what readines you haue expreſſed your ſinceritie and affection to our Imperiall Maieſty. Which buſineſſe we haue alſo earneſtly recommended to your aboue named Embaſſadour, that when he ſhall more largely haue enformed you, that you be pleaſed to giue him credit, and that in the time to come you will attend to apprehend all thoſe means worthy the conſeruance of our Friendſhip, Peace, and Correſpondence.

Written in the fifteenth of the Moon Gemaziel evell, in the yeare of the departure of the Prophet, vpon whom be eternall bleſſing: 1036.

Giuen in our well-defenced City of Conſtantinople.

Which is the 20 of Ianuary, 1626.

Vpon the opportunitie of the foreſaid troubles within the Turkiſh Empire, and either to giue reputation to the Armes of the Houſe of Auſtria in Germany, or to affright Gabor, and diſſolue the correſpondence which he had practiſed with ſome Allyes, or perhaps hoping really to obtaine a peace, and by the eaſe both of expence, and vſe of ſo many ſouldiers on the the frontier of ſo great an enemie as the grand Signior, to effect with more expedition their vniuerſall ends; there was in the month of Iune, in the yeare 1625, a Gentleman diſpatched from the Vice-Re of Naples, in a frigot of the Spaniſh King, accompanied with ſix or ſeuen ſeruants, with Commiſſion to goe to Conſtantinople, and being there arriued, to deliuer certaine Letters of ouerture of a peace between the grand Signior and the King of Spaine. To aſſiſt him in his Negotiation, there was ſent by ſeuerall waies a Benedict Frier called Padre Beril, and a Greek brought vp in the colledge at Rome, called Cannachi Roſſi, both practiſed in the waies of that court, and formerly imploied in other ſeruices of intelligence and exploration. Their Inſtructions were forked; theſe to practiſe on the Greek Church to ſupplant the Patriark; and if both the treaty & their machinations ſhould fail, to attempt to raiſe the Coſſacks, by promiſe of a ſum of mony, to trouble the grand Signior, and to diuert his forces and reſolution from aſſiſting the Prince of Tranſylvania in Hungary, as ſhall bee at large mentioned in a ſubſequent diſcourſe. The gentleman was born a Bologneſe, and had ſerued Gaſparo Gratiani, late Prince of Walachia, and by that means had ſome experience and acquaintance at the Port. On the way he gaue himſelf out for an Embaſſador: which raiſed more rumor, and gaue warning to thoſe who were diſaffected to the ſucces of his vndertakings. But before we relate how he proceeded, it will giue ſome light to later negotiations, to look a little higher, vpon what ground and occaſions this enterpriſe was aduanced.

The State of Spain hauing often (eſpecially when it was preſſed with any neceſſitie) practiſed to make a peace with the Turkiſh Empire; particularly by the mediation of a Iew, taking the name of Gabriel de Buona Ventura, who was ſent with Letters and inſtructions from Chriſtophoro de Mora and Catagneo the Secretary in the time of Rodulphus the ſecond, who had then war with Sultan Morat; whoſe enterpriſe being diſcouered at Vienna, was by the Emperor interrupted. In the year 1619, the Baron Molart being then Embaſſador for the Emperor Ferdinand, he diſpatched firſt a Captaine called Franciſco, and after him Padre Antonio Berill, with inſtructions of one tenor vnto the Duke of Oſſuna, then Vice King of Naples. The ſubſtance was, That he found the opportunitie faire, and the Turkes inclined to make a generall peace with the Houſe of Auſtria: that therfore this ſeaſon ſhould not be omitted, but that the duke ſhould preſently diſpeed to him ſome man of qualitie and wit to aſsiſt, and fit to manage ſo great a buſineſſe: That this man ſo choſen, ſhould not take on him as directly ſent G from Spaine, becauſe it would then be expected that hee ſhould appeare as an Embaſſadour; which would require great expence in preſents and traine, and waſte much time in ceremony. Thus the Negotiation would be moſt properly and expeditely perfected by him and the embaſſador of Cæſar, becauſe in the Capitulation of 1606, betweene the Emperor and the Grand Signior, it was expreſly cautioned, That it might be lawful for the King of Spain to enter into that Treaty, & to be compriſed, if it pleaſed him. To theſe were added diuers reaſons inſtructions, examples, and accuſations againſt the Venetians and Hollanders: but the cardinall argument was, That by obtaining this peace, the King of Spain might with ſecuritie ſubdue his Rebels, and finiſh his conqueſts, and defend his Indies from fear of inuaſion, threatned after expiration of the Truce in Holland. Some other ouertures were made in theſe inſtructions, H and reaſons to inforce them, which the modeſtie of Hiſtorie and reuerence to Princes ought to omit. But this negotiation being involved in that of the Emperour, which ſucceeded not according to their expectation, fell before it was ripe. Yet the reaſon continuing, to ſhut that backe port, when their Armies were buſied with other deſignes, the ſaid practiſe was renued by the mediation of another Portugal Iew called Cormaro; who went into Spaine in the year of our Lord 1624, and was thence returned to Naples, and from him and his offers occaſion was taken to ſend this Bologneſe to the Port. Who beeing now arriued at Conſtantinople, tooke firſt ſanctuarie at the houſe of the Agent of the Emperour: where meeting with Beril and Roßi, and conſulting which way to lay or begin their buſineſſe, they at laſt reſolued to I work by the Agent to whom they were adreſſed, and not to diſcouer themſelues vntill they ſaw how the generall propoſition was taſted. Their Inſtructions were framed of fiue articles. 1. To mooue a perpetual peace between the King of Spain and the Ottoman Empire. 2. To induce the acceptance wherof, to offer to ſet free all the Turkiſh ſlaues, to the number of four hundred, which were then in the Spaniſh captiuitie. 3. To vndertake and promiſe to ſecure the ſubiects of the grand Signior from all loſſe and ſpoil in the Mediteranian ſea, and to keep the coaſts and ſhores from all inuaſion. 4. To vndertake by the Red ſea to ſerue all the empire with the riches and commodities of Eaſt India, at better rates than they did buy of the Engliſh and Hollander, and in them to aduance the Cuſtoms eighty thouſand Dollars yearly. 5. Laſtly, That the King of Spaine ſhould oblige himſelfe to procure the King of Poland K to reſtraine the Coſſacks from their vſuall excurſions in the Euxine ſea. Theſe were amplified with many reaſons, arguments, and accuſations; but in the concluſion reſtrained, That if they ſaw no probabilitie to obtain and aſſure the Peace, that then Berill ſhould proceed to prouoke the Coſſackes; and this Gentleman ſhould not appeare in the Negotiation, but reſide in the houſe of the Emperours Agent, vnder the name of his Secretarie, vntill further direction.

When theſe propoſitions were firſt moued, the ſpecious ſhew made them acceptable; but when the particulars were weighed, eſpecially that offer, To keep the ſea and the coaſts of the Mediterran free from any ſpoyl or inuaſion; the Vizier moued a queſtion, Whether the king of Spain were ſoueraign Lord of the Duke of Florence and the grand Maſter of Malta? and L if not, how he could command and reſtraine the Knights of Saint Stephano and Malta, who were Religious Orders, and ſworn enemies to the Port? To this obiection receiuing no clear and ſatisfactorie anſwer, the Vizier began to miſtruſt, and to demurre. But delayes (which are vſuall in that Court) not ſuting with the account which this Bologneſe was bound to render vnto the Duke of Oſſuna, of his ſucceſſe, Either to aſſure the peace, or not to loſe the opportunitie of a diuerſion by the Coſſackes; cauſed him to attempt both at once, and to imploy Padre Berill to execute his part. Who beeing taken in Siliſtra vpon ſuſpition, by the Baſſa Diac Mehemet, and his Letters opened, the Spaniſh friendſhip was diſcouered; and the Bologneſe ſtole himſelfe out of the Countrey, and as it was reported, was at his returne impriſoned, for the vanitie of intituling himſelfe as a publique Miniſter, and venting his maſters M name vpon ſo great a Theatre. And the Agent of Cæſar aſſiſted to accuſe him, as not able to containe him within the limits of his Commiſſion, but that hee would wilfully break out, and diſpute, That hee ought perſonally in the name of the Vice Re to treat with the Vizier: threatning, To cauſe his Penſion from Spain to be retrenched, as cold in the ſeruice

A of that Crown,the ciuile ſtriſe proceeded from heat to blowes: and it was beleeued, that the Agent vnder hand both haſtned his flight,and procured his puniſhment.

The ill and diſgracefull ſucceſſe of this attempt, and the diſſention between miniſters ſo ſtrictly obliged by common ends, made many beleeue, that the wiſe State of Spaine would not again raſhly and ſuddenly ingage their reputation to a ſecond ſcorn. But fear and neceſſitie, that obey no rules, inforced as it ſeemes the Vice-king of Naples (for all theſe practiſes were maſqued vnder his name) to do a ſeruice that would be moſt acceptable when it was done. For the rumor, That the Prince of Tranſylvania did prepare an army,and that the grand Signior had giuen order to the frontier Baſſa's to aſſiſt him, and that the Count of Mansfelt and Duke Weymar were expected with their troups to ioyn with him; this collegation appeared B terrible,and to threaten Vienna it ſelfe; and therfore it was iudged the beſt counſel,openly to offer a Peace, to amuſe or ſeparate the force of the Turk,or vnder the ſhadow of a treaty, to ſteal away the firſt opportunitie of action. So that contrary to all expectation, ſuddenly in Aprill of this year, it was ſuddenly aduiſed from Raguſa,That there was there arriued in a Galliot of Naples, another Mercury, a Spaniſh Gentleman,that openly avowed himſelf to be 1626. really ſent from the Vice-Re, to offer a peace to the grand Signior, and to prepare the acceptance of Embaſſadors or Commiſſioners fit to treat it. He was well attended, and furniſhed with exchange,and earneſtly commended by the Vice-King to the Senat of that City. At his firſt landing he made grauitie,and expected ſome ceremonies and reception:but thoſe ſmall States,who are like a grain between two mill-ſtones, thinking their greateſt ſafety conſiſted C in taking no notice,and in being on both ſides diſ-intereſſed, would not vnderſtand him,and he finding himſelfe deceiued,was caried in a cloſe chaire to the Monaſterie of the Friar Minors, and kept himſelfe priuat; only ſending another Letter(which was written to a Vizier at the Port) to thoſe Magiſtrats,deſiring them to diſpeed it by Poſts to Conſtantinople, and to prouide him Guides for his journey thither. Both which were done, and two Turks appointed to conduct him. Before his departure, hee diſpatched another Curri or to Belgrade to a Correſpondent there. It was likewiſe aduiſed from Raguſa,That he was laden with preſents, and had order to ſpend freely: which was dangerous in a Court where all things were vendible; and thoſe that fauoured the Deſigne triumphed, and accounted the prize already won; nothing being more diſcourſed,than the Peace between Spaine and Turkey. As a fore-runner D of this negotiation, to ſmooth the waies, there was ſpred ſome weekes before this newes, a Letter printed in Spaine, Cum Licentia,as written from the grand Signior to the Catholike King; offering Peace, and promiſing to ſeparate from all his Enemies, and to leaue them to iuſt puniſhment, and neuer to aſſiſt or ſupport them: with a Catalogue ioyned, of an infinite preſent that ſhould bee ſent by the Turke to procure the acceptance of this amitie. At the firſt ſight this Letter was deſpiſed as a fiction: only ſome contemplatiue men did make conſtruction, That it was ſpread to encourage the people of Hungarie,and to remooue the feares of the Turke; or to raiſe a jelouſie in Gabor and his friends: eſpecially being ſeconded with a concurrent rumor,That a Miniſter really was ſent to treat peace, and an Embaſſador expected to follow him, that at leaſt he ſhould be receiued to gaine time. But theſe were poore E ſhifts for ſo great and wiſe a State; yet whatſoeuer the purpoſe was,whether it was a counterfeit, or directed to ſome end,it was taken vp and vſed as an inſtrument to reject the embaſſage and to prohibit the bearer to approch the court. For whether it fel into the hand of a Moore-Franke expelled Spaine, or were made vſe of by any Embaſſadour that deſired to croſſe the concluſion of ſuch a peace,in ſuch a conjunction, ſo dangerous to many princes and ſtates, it was ſhewed the great Viſier and Mufti, commented vpon, and vrged as a great affront to the grand Signior. At which they took ſo high and ſudden diſdain,that they gaue inſtant Commands, and ſent horſmen to beat the waies,with commiſſion to all the Beghs and Caddees to aſſiſt them,That whereſoeuer they did meet or find this gentleman, they ſhould carry him directly back to the ſea ſide,and ſee him ſhipt;with admonition, not to preſume to land on penaltie F of death. And other letters to check the Senat of Raguſa,for receiuing any miniſter of their enemy,without asking leaue or conſulting the State.

The Gentleman was by this time aduanced four daies journey toward the Port,where hee fel and brake his leg, and was caried back in miſerable pain to Raguſa,and returned to his old lodging.

the duke ſhould preſently diſpeed to him ſome man of qualitie and wit to aſſiſt,and fit to manage ſo great a buſineſſe: That this man ſo choſen, ſhould not take on him as directly ſent from Spaine,becauſe it would then be expected that hee ſhould appeare as an Embaſſadour; which would require great expence in preſents and traine, and waſte much time in ceremony. But delayes (which are vſuall in that Court) not ſuting with the account which this Bologneſe was bound to render vnto the Duke of Oſſuna,of his ſucceſſe, Either to aſſure the peace,or not to loſe the opportunitie of a diuerſion by the Coſſackes; cauſed him to attempt both at once, and to imploy Padre Berill to execute his part. Who beeing taken in Siliſtra vpon ſuſpition, by the Baſſa Diac Mehemet, and his Letters opened,the Spaniſh friendſhip was diſcouered; and the Bologneſe ſtole himſelfe out of the Countrey, and as it was reported, was at his returne impriſoned, for the vanitie of intituling himſelfe as a publique Miniſter, and venting his maſters name vpon ſo great a Theatre. And the Agent of Cæſar aſſiſted to accuſe him, as not able to containe him within the limits of his Commiſſion, but that hee would wilfully break out, and diſpute, That hee ought perſonally in the name of the Vice Re to treat with the Vizier: threatning, To cauſe his Penſion from Spain to be retrenched, as cold in the ſeruice of that Crown, the ciuile ſtrife proceeded from heat to blowes: and it was beleeued, that the Agent vnder hand both haſtned his flight, and procured his puniſhment.

The ill and diſgracefull ſucceſſe of this attempt, and the diſſention between miniſters ſo ſtrictly obliged by common ends, made many beleeue, that the wiſe State of Spaine would not again raſhly and ſuddenly ingage their reputation to a ſecond ſcorn. But fear and neceſſitie, that obey no rules, inforced as it ſeemes the Vice-king of Naples (for all theſe practiſes were maſqued vnder his name) to do a ſeruice that would be moſt acceptable when it was done. For the rumor, That the Prince of Tranſylvania did prepare an army, and that the grand Signior had giuen order to the frontier Baſſa's to aſſiſt him, and that the Count of Manſfelt and Duke Weymar were expected with their troups to ioyn with him; this collegation appeared terrible, and to threaten Vienna it ſelfe; and therfore it was iudged the beſt counſel, openly to offer a Peace, to amuſe or ſeparate the force of the Turk, or vnder the ſhadow of a treaty, to ſteal away the firſt opportunitie of action. So that contrary to all expectation, ſuddenly in Aprill of this year, it was ſuddenly aduiſed from Raguſa, That there was there arriued in a Galliot of Naples, another Mercury, a Spaniſh Gentleman, that openly avowed himſelf to be really ſent from the Vice-Re, to offer a peace to the grand Signior, and to prepare the acceptance of Embaſſadors or Commiſſioners fit to treat it. He was well attended, and furniſhed with exchange, and earneſtly commended by the Vice-King to the Senat of that City. At his firſt landing he made grauitie, and expected ſome ceremonies and reception: but thoſe ſmall States, who are like a grain between two mill-ſtones, thinking their greateſt ſafety conſiſted in taking no notice, and in being on both ſides diſ-intereſſed, would not vnderſtand him; and he finding himſelfe deceiued, was caried in a cloſe chaire to the Monaſterie of the Friar Minors, and kept himſelfe priuat; only ſending another Letter (which was written to a Vizier at the Port) to thoſe Magiſtrats, deſiring them to diſpeed it by Poſts to Conſtantinople, and to prouide him Guides for his journey thither. Both which were done, and two Turks appointed to conduct him. Before his departure, hee diſpatched another Currior to Belgrade to a Correſpondent there. It was likewiſe aduiſed from Raguſa, That he was laden with preſents, and had order to ſpend freely: which was dangerous in a Court where all things were vendible; and thoſe that fauoured the Deſigne triumphed, and accounted the prize already won; nothing being more diſcourſed, than the Peace between Spaine and Turkey. As a fore-runner of this negotiation, to ſmooth the waies, there was ſpred ſome weekes before this newes, a Letter printed in Spaine, Cum Licentia, as written from the grand Signior to the Catholike King; offering Peace, and promiſing to ſeparate from all his Enemies, and to leaue them to iuſt puniſhment, and neuer to aſſiſt or ſupport them: with a Catalogue ioyned, of an infinite preſent that ſhould bee ſent by the Turke to procure the acceptance of this amitie. At the firſt ſight this Letter was deſpiſed as a fiction: only ſome contemplatiue men did make conſtruction, That it was ſpread to encourage the people of Hungarie, and to remooue the feares of the Turke; or to raiſe a jelouſie in Gabor and his friends: eſpecially being ſeconded with a concurrent rumor, That a Miniſter really was ſent to treat peace, and an Embaſſador expected to follow him, that at leaſt he ſhould be receiued to gaine time. But theſe were poore ſhifts for ſo great and wiſe a State; yet whatſoeuer the purpoſe was, whether it was a counterfeit, or directed to ſome end, it was taken vp and vſed as an inſtrument to reject the embaſſage and to prohibit the bearer to approch the court. For whether it fel into the hand of a Moore-Franke expelled Spaine, or were made vſe of by any Embaſſadour that deſired to croſſe the concluſion of ſuch a peace, in ſuch a conjunction, ſo dangerous to many princes and ſtates, it was ſhewed the great Viſier and Mufti, commented vpon, and vrged as a great affront to the grand Signior. At which they took ſo high and ſudden diſdain, that they gaue inſtant Commands, and ſent horſmen to beat the waies, with commiſſion to all the Beghs and Caddees to aſſiſt them, That whereſoeuer they did meet or find this gentleman, they ſhould carry him directly back to the ſea ſide, and ſee him ſhipt; with admonition, not to preſume to land on penaltie of death. And other letters to check the Senat of Raguſa, for receiuing any miniſter of their enemy, without asking leaue or conſulting the State.

The Gentleman was by this time aduanced four daies journey toward the Port, where hee fel and brake his leg, and was caried back in miſerable pain to Raguſa, and returned to his old lodging. Where the horſemen found him, and deliuering their letters to the Senat, demaunded to haue him giuen vp into their hands. But they refuſed to break their ſanctuary, and only promiſed to obey the effect of the grand Signiors command, ciuilly to ſhip him & to ſend him back to Naples: which was don in the preſence of thoſe Turks, and letters written by the Senat, both to the Vice-King and the Vizier, to excuſe themſelues, That they durſt diſpleaſe neither party, but deſired to liue in the grace of both princes.

The grand Signiors Command to all the Sanzacks and Caddees of Greece, to return the Spaniſh Gentleman ſent from the Vice Re of Naples.

VPon the ſight of this our Imperial Signature, you ſhall take notice, That the Spaniards (being alwaies antient enemies of our happy Port, the Fountaine of felicity) haue of late ſought to aduantage themſelues of ſome princes which keep good friendſhip & correſpondence with vs: To which end the Viceroy of Naples did ſend the laſt yeare a Meſſenger to our Jmperial Port, intimating, That the King of Spaine was deſirous to haue a peace with vs. But in regard they haue bin euer our enemies, and that the peace which they did then offer was fraudulent, and only to ſerue their own ends; we did not vouchſafe to giue him audience, but rather reiected both himſelfe and his meſſage. And now again we haue notice giuen vs, That there are others come to Raguſa from the ſaid King of Spain, about the ſame buſineſſe, with intent to come forward to our happy Port; Therefore wee haue ſent Muſtapha our Capigi with our Imperial Command, That if any ſuch perſons ſhal come within any of your ſeueral juriſdictions, that you ſtay them, and without one houre or moment of delay deliuer them to him, to be caried forth of our dominions, and made return into their own country. This is a buſines of very great importance, and therfore we command you to be very wary and circumſpect in ſearching out for ſuch perſons; and that you vſe no negligence or delay therein, but ſpeedily obey and put in execution this our Imperial Command, not ſuffering any one whatſoeuer, comming either from the Vice-King of Naples, or the King of Spain, to proceed forward toward our happy Port. And you ſhall certifie vs in writing by the ſaid Capigi, how and in what maner you haue executed our Command. And if any ſuch perſons comming from the Vice-King of Naples or King of Spain, haue any letters or writings, you ſhal take them from them, and ſend them to our happy Port. And after you ſhal haue ſeen and vnderſtood this our Commaund, you ſhall giue faith and credit to it, and reſtore it again to our ſlaue Muſtapha Capigi.

Another of the ſame Tenor was ſent by the ſame Meſſenger, vnto the Commonwealth of Raguſa.

About the ſixth of September the Prince of Tranſylvania ſent a meſſenger in great haſte to the Port, with Letters and Inſtructions to his Agent there; the ſubſtance whereof was reduced to two heads: Firſt, to declare to the grand Signior, That his Eſtates in their Dyet, by

A by his conſent, had elected his Lady to the ſucceſſion of that Principality: and to require the confirmation, according to the antient Rites and Capitulations betweene them. For his ſudden reſolution, without conſulting the Grand Signior, and in excuſe of the ſex, he propoſed many reaſons, all directed to one ſcope: That the encreaſe of the Houſe of Auſtria was ſo dangerous to all Germany, that it was requiſite to prouide for Tranſyluania, to preuent the corruption of an Inter Regnum, wherein the Imperials might worke diſtemper and diuiſion: and therefore it was neceſſary that a Succeſſor ſhould be declared, and in poſſeſſion; and one well allyed and ſtrengthened by the Princes oppoſite to the Auſtrians; which conditions meeting in his wife, made her without all exception. That this election was paſſed with the conſent, and in contemplation of his Allyes and friends of the Port, and vnder their aſſurance B of protection. And that therefore he ſhould vrge the Grand Signior to concurre and approue his care, emploied onely to preuent and humble the Common Enemy. Secondly, That whereas then ſix yeares paſt, when hee liued in peace, without offence of the Emperour, he had beene commanded by the Grand Signior to moue his Armes, and to prouoke an enemy, now become irreconcileable: Which Councell had beene continued vntill that time, by the moſt experienced Miniſters of the Turkiſh Empire; and Letters ſent him the yeare before of the ſame tenour; and that he had lately required a plaine approbation of his proſecution of thoſe deſignes, which being formerly indifferent, were now become neceſſary; He ſhould now perſuade them, not to loſe this opportunity of confining the Emperor for euer within Germany, and ſetling an aſſured peace and ſafety to the Turkiſh frontier; that was by C his conqueſt of Hungary. That if he found any difficulty in either of theſe, That the ſucceſſion were refuſed to his Lady, or ſuccours to him to proſecute the warre; that he ſhould vnmaske, and plainely proteſt, That he had been engaged firſt by the Grand Signior, and made confederation with many friends, with his conſent and approbation, too late to be reuoked, and his owne honour ſo far thereby expoſed, that he could not retire, but would prouide for his owne ſafety. Therefore as he would pay his tribute, and continue his faith; ſo, if they would leaue him to himſelf, they muſt not diſdaine the like meaſure in their occaſions, from him and his friends.

His Letters and meſſages were roundly deliuered to the Miniſters of the Grand Signior; and a generall anſwer giuen, That for the ſucceſſion they would conſult and reſolue to his fit D ſatisfaction; and that a Letter ſhould be preſently written to approue the antient Councels. The Agent not content with that coldneſſe, nor well diſcerning the times, preſſed the Vizier to a more direct and particular anſwer.

But in the inſtant there arriued newes from Babylon, That the campe was riſen and fled, by the fauour of the night, forced to burne their Tents and Prouiſions, and to breake their great Artillery, and caſt it into the Euphrates; That the miſeries in the Army had been ſuch as men in the field neuer ſuffered (conſumed by famin, and ſuffocated by heat: by this, twelue thouſand died in one day; the other might be judged by the price of a buſhell of Barly, ſold for thirty eight checquines of gold.) That the Great Vizier had beheaded three of the moſt valiant Baſſaes, hoping thereby to caſt the enuy of his ſhame vpon them: and, That retyring E to * Moſul, the Perſian vſed his victory, and following a flying Army, did continuall execution for ten daies vpon the Reare. So great a blow the Turkiſh Empire neuer receiued; the newes whereof was taken with ſo much ſadneſſe, that it was no ſeaſon to treat of making new warres. The Emperors Agent made vſe of this dejection, and oppoſed all the Tranſyluanian negotiations diametrally, and promiſed the preſent comming of a great Embaſſadour to ratifie the Peace betweene the Grand Signior and his Maſter. And the Turke knew not whom to beleeue, weakened in ſpirit by their ſucceſſe and the preſent conſtitution; Futuri ambiguus, & magis quid vitaret quàm cui fideret certus; doubtfull of the future, and rather certaine what to auoid, than whom to truſt. Wherefore the Prince of Tranſyluania's Agent, reſolued, not to prouoke by an importune preſſure, a diſpairefull anſwer; but to giue them F time to recollect and gather heart, and to accept of their generall Letters, with a promiſe from the Chimacham annexed, That as ſoone as a few daies of conſultation and prouiſion for their affaires in Aſia were paſt, that he would enter into a particular conſideration of his Maſter, and giue him ample content in them; and that in the meane time he might proceed cheerefully.

The Duke of Weymar and Count Manſfelt arriue in Sileſia with an Army

The Baſſa of Buda in the meane time ſent a Poſt to the Port, with certaine newes of the G arriuall of the Duke Iohn of Weymar and Count Mansfelt in Sileſia; and that the Prince of Tranſyluania was riſen to joyn with them, hauing mutually exchanged and ſent ſome troups one to the other; and that himſelfe was marched neere Vatz, to conferre with the Prince in his paſſage, to reſolue together of the proſecution of their deſignes. Whereupon the Emperors Agent at the Port made violent exclamations; proteſted the breach of Peace, and vſed ſome ſcandalous arguments againſt the Friends of the Prince; begged, threatened, and enforced all his powers to diuert or affright the Chimacham; who knew no more than was infuſed into him and for the moſt part beleeued the laſt man, or as his feares guided him. This cauſed ſome ſtop of the diſpatch of the inueſtiture of the Princeſſe of Tranſyluania obtained by Sr Thomas Rowe, and other negotiations of the Prince: And the Agent had procured a letter H from the Grand Signior to his Maſter the Emperor, of excuſe; yet referring all concluſion, if they ſought Peace, to a treaty with the Prince of Tranſyluania and Morteſa Baſſa of Buda. Other Letters were diſpatched to the Baſſa, to beware of impertinent actions, to occaſion an vnſeaſonable rupture: yet ſo mingled and qualified, as that they intimated, any thing would be accepted that was throughly done: Againſt the inueſtiture the Emperors Agent ſhewed all his wit and ſtrength; objecting, That ſhe was a woman, a ſtranger, and a German. By this only he hoped to begin a diſcontent betweene the Grand Signior and the Prince of Tranſyluania; knowing, that the election once paſſed, would not be recalled, and that if it were not confirmed at the Port, the Prince and Eſtates of Tranſyluania would finde themſelues wronged, and their liberty encroached vpon and perhaps ſeeke other refuge: for the Emperor I would willingly haue accepted any returne or aſpect towards him. But the art, to ſow a diſſention, or to entice the Prince to depend vpon the Emperor, and to take of him that which he could not obtaine at the Port, being at large opened to the great Miniſters of the Grand Signior, it was againe reſolued to diſpatch the Grant, and to ſend the Embaſſador with vſuall ceremonies: who was to depart within ſix daies.

The Prince of Tranſyluania being vnited with Morteſa Baſſa of Buda, diſpatched from his Campe at Zetzen aboue Nouegrade, a Currier to the Grand Signior; aduiſing, That Walſtein, and Iſterhas Palatine of Hungary, were drawne vp with their Army to oppoſe his proceedings, and to keepe him from joyning with Count Mansfelt: Who ſent to him a Gentleman to know the cauſe of his entring the Imperiall Dominions; and profeſſing they came K as friends, and offering many conditions, deſired that order might be giuen to both their Armies to retyre a daies journy, and betweene them a place aſſigned for Commiſſioners to meet and conſider of ſome accommodation. To whom the Prince anſwered, he had no purpoſe to vſurpe any thing in Hungary, but only to deliuer them from the tyranny of the Germans, and to relieue his Allies oppreſſed, whom he could not betray; nor had he any power to treat with them. The Armies being neere, and parties abroad, did occaſion ſome blowes, and great skirmiſhes for two daies; wherein on both ſides ſome bloud was ſpilt, the Prince taking himſelfe to haue the better, hauing gotten twenty ſix German Launciers priſoners, and ſome light Hungarian horſemen; and that Walſtein the third day retyred fiue Dutch miles, and fortified himſelfe at Wiuar. This faction was begun vpon the fifth of October. L Vpon the Enemies remoue, Meſſengers did mutually paſſe betweene the Prince and Count Mansfelt, and appointment made for their ſecure meeting the third day after: Vpon which, Gabor promiſed to follow the Imperials, and to attempt them. Morteſa Baſſa made an offer to ſet downe before Nouegrade; but was withdrawne by the Prince, not to ſpend time before a Towne, and loth to giue it to the Turks. He wrote, That Count Mansfelt had made agreement with the cities of Sileſia, all ports being open to him; and that he paſſed without any offence, and had brought with him ſome Deputies from Breſlaw and the Nobility of that Prouince. That all the ſtrong places of Hungary had ſent to him, That they would not aid the Emperor againſt him, if he committed no ſpoile; and were ready to receiue and obey him, if he were Maſter of the field, and able to protect them: And therefore hee now deſired M a Command from the Grand Signior, to the Baſſa of Buda, that hee might not retyre (according to the Turks vſe) but Winter with him; leſt his Allyes thereby diſcouraged, the opportunity of his part ſhould be loſt, and a faire entrance opened to the Emperor to follow a reuenge. The Grand Signior, who formerly was ſo wary and backeward to conſent

A to any breach, being now vnawares engaged, Lupum auribus tenens, holding the Wolfe by the eares, without ſcruple granted his deſire, and the Orders were ſent away; That what was done being paſt recall, Morteſa ſhould Winter with the Prince of Tranſyluania, and not retire without his conſent, but in all things follow his direction: yet limited according to their neceſſities and the nature of feare, full of caution, not to aduenture vpon vncertaine grounds; with power and inſinuation to make a Peace, if profitable and ſafe Conditions ſhould be propounded.

At length Count Mansfelt joyned with the Prince of Tranſyluania and Morteſa Baſſa, hauing vnder his command ſouldiers, but miſerably worne out with a long march (and diuided with the Duke of Weymar, who ſtaied in Sileſia) without any munition or fit armes: which B diſcouraged Gabor, who expected ſuccors, but found (as he pretended) a charge: yet as they were they reſolued to ſet vpon the Army of Walſtein neere the riuer Gran the ſixteenth of October; which retiring continually, vpon the paſſage of the water, they fell on, and made a great diſorder, and tooke many priſoners, whoſe heads they afterwards cut off. Walſtein being not able to ſuſteine their fury, after this loſſe plainely fled. Whereupon the Vantgard of the Prince of Tranſyluania followed him, and had ſlaughter of his Reare all the way betweene Gran and Vaghe; which riuer the Enemy paſſing vpon two bridges of boats, there was a new fight begun, and many of the Imperials cut off. The Princes troups entering the bridges peſle meſle with them, got the paſſage, and hauing ſlaine a great many, put all the Army into greater feare: ſo that now they were reſolued to follow them euen to the gates of Preſburg C and Vienna as they wrote to the Port.

The army of the Imperialists defeated by the Prince of Tranſyluania's troups Notwithſtanding this good ſucceſſe of the Prince againſt the Imperialiſts, he in the beginning of Ianuary (by reaſon of the hardneſſe of the Winter, and that he receiued not ſuch ſupplies of contribution from his Allies as he expected, and the Turks very deſirous of a Peace with the Emperor, by reaſon of their wars in Aſia againſt the Perſian) ſent a meſſenger to the Emperor, excuſing his taking vp of Armes, vpon the vnperformance of ſome Articles in his late Treaty, and the not ſending an Embaſſador to the Port; aſſuming the neceſſity of obedience, and offering to make a Truce for three moneths, and to diſpatch Commiſſioners to the Emperor, to mediate the concluſion of Peace with the Grand Signior. To which he receiued anſwer, That if firſt he did not diſmiſſe the Turks, and ſeparate himſelſe from Count D Mansfelt and his Troups (with whom he would admit no parle, nor make any accommodation) he would giue no audience to any that came from him. Vpon which anſwer the Prince returned to Caſſouia, and Morteſa Baſſa to Peſth.

Count Mansfelt alſo returning toward the State of Venice, in his way thither died at Boſna-Seray neere Spalato in Dalmatia: the newes whereof comming to Duke Iohn Erneſtus, already weakened with a Feuer foureteene daies, he alſo fell into an Apoplexy, and died at Turocz in the North part of Hungary, where hee was quartered for the Winter. His body was opened, and not one drop of bloud found, but his heart withered to the ſmalneſſe of a Nut.

The death of Count Mansfelt and Duke Erneſt

The Agent of the prince of Tranſyluania, in excuſe of his maſter for this ſudden defection, E had order to declare vnto the Embaſſadors of his Friends and Allies at the Port, That the Truce with the Emperor was not made by his Maſter alone, but by a conſultation, where were preſent a Commiſſioner of the King of Denmarke, Duke Iohn Erneſt, Count Mansfelt, and diuers Deputies of the Prouinces of Morauia and Sileſia; and the generall conſent of the Councell of War, induced thereunto for theſe reaſons: Firſt, Becauſe the Baſſa of Buda was expreſſely commanded to retyre; who muſt obey, vntill he could better informe the Grand Signior, and if poſſible, incline him to the war. Secondly, Being to enter into conſideration, if the Turks by no meanes could be induced to continue their Aids, that it might be gained to acquaint the Confederates with their eſtate, and to conſult with them, of meanes to proſecute the Enemy with their owne Forces: and to that purpoſe, that Count Mansfelt had taken F his voyage toward Venice. Laſtly, the neceſſity of drawing to garriſon, being a Truce in effect, they thought it no prejudice to aduantage themſelues by one in words. That vpon the eighth day of December the Embaſſador of the King of Denmarke returned to his country, fully ſatisfied and enformed of all their proceedings and Counſels; in which it was concluded to re-inforce their Troups in the Spring, by the aſſiſtance of the Barons of Morauia and

The Prince of Tranſyluania's excuſe for making a Truce with the Emperor.

Sileſia,

Sileſia,whoſe Deputies were ſent purpoſely to enter into the Confederacy,promiſing to join their forces: and that in Iune following the Prince would draw into the field, and march directly into Auſtria, to make that Prouince the ſeat of the war; where it was promiſed that the King of Denmarke ſhould meet him,and vnite their Armies,by which meanes only they hoped to finiſh the miſeries of Chriſtendome.

The miniſters of the Grand Signior hauing made a great complaint vnto his Majeſties Embaſſador reſident at the Port, That ſome of his majeſties ſubjects had robbed ſome of the Grand Signiors at the Red Sea, for which they required reſtitution, according to the Capitulations of Peace. Whereupon his Majeſties Embaſſador writ this Letter to them as followeth:

To all Admirals, Captaines, and other Commauders of Engliſh Ships, Subjects of his moſt ſacred Majeſty, trading or nauigating in the Red-Seas.

After my hearty commendations and greetings; theſe are to let you know, That Haydar Baſſa of Ayman hath giuen information to the Grand Signior, That ſome Engliſh ſhips in company with Hollanders, haue ſurpriſed diuers Indian Ships, wherein (as they pretend) were many Merchants and Subjects of the Grand Signior; and haue taken their goods, contrary to the Peace and Amity betweene his Majeſty and the Grand Signior. Which Information (we being aſſured of your diſcretion, and well knowing you haue no ſuch authority from his Majeſty, nor any other deriued from his Royall power) although we hope it is falſe, and that you no way haue exceeded your commiſſions and inſtructions; yet the lament of thoſe parts being vehement and many (wherein the Grand Signior hath complained by his Letters to his Majeſty purpoſely written; demanding Iuſtice of ſuch action) and to preuent the proſecution of ſuch courſes, contrary to the Peace, and being thereunto ſolicited by the Chimacham, as a meanes to auoid all occaſion of breach betweene both Nations, I haue thought fit to ſend you theſe our Letters of Aduice, to put you in minde, exhort, and require you, That you be very heedfull, not to giue juſt occaſion of offence and ſcandall, nor that you take or make priſe of any ſhips or goods belonging to any ſubject of the Grand Signior, contrary to the Peace, Amity, and Capitulations of his Majeſty for free commerce. Wherein you are wiſely to conſider the conſequences of this buſineſſe, and of our trade in the Grand Signiors Dominion; and that his Majeſty will do juſtice vpon all ſuch as interrupt the publique Peace. We further deſire you to examine the truth of ſuch accuſation, and to make certificate to me, of all the late proceedings of our Ships in thoſe parts, that I may be able to giue a reaſon, and to anſwer for you, according to my duty; that all our trouble here (which may be a great conſequence) may be auoided: And for the future, exhorting you to do no action or violence to any of the Subjects of the Grand Signior, contrary to the Peace, for that ſuch is his Majeſties will and pleaſure. And ſo I bid you heartily farewell.

Giuen in Conſtantinople the nineteenth day of Ianuary, 1626.

Although the Prince of Tranſyluania kept his Army in their Hybernation, and that the Grand Signior had giuen order (at the inſtance of ſome of his Miniſters, fauorers of peace) to recall Morteſa Baſſa of Buda from his gouernment, yet it was moſt cleere, euident, and vndiſputable, that the Prince did with all ſincerity endeauor to continue the war, notwithſtanding his Treaty, made for neceſſity, and referred for ratification to the Grand Signior. His priuate negotiation with the Capi-Aga and Caſlar Aga, not communicated to any, and the good effect it wrought, was ſufficient teſtimony of his conſtancy and inward purpoſes: and vpon the death of Duke Iohn Erneſtus, that Army being in want and almoſt in mutiny, he relieued them, and gaue them two moneths pay, one in meale, butter, hony, cheeſe, barley, and other victuals, and the other in mony; aſſuring them that they ſhould not want, vntill both meanes and orders came from the Princes, to whom the Count of Manſfelt was diſpatched. This the Prince writ to the Port, as a greater argument (becauſe chargeable) of his deſire to confirme the Grand Signior; which if he meant peace, had beene caſt away. But after the death of the old Chimacham (protector of him and all his actions) the Emperours friends wrought vpon the pretended patriots, and conuerted their feare into a ſeeming ſincerity and care of auoiding an engagement in a double war: who finding the State entangled in the troubles of Aſia, made that the foundation, not only to diſpute againſt any other, but to threaten the contradictors of their opinion. Theſe for the moſt part were men popular, but vtterly ignorant of the preſent condition and affaires of Hungary; yet they ſo preuailed (quod in ſeditionibus accedit, vbi plures erant omnes fuere, which hapneth in tumults where many are, all men run) that the Vizier, to ſatisfie them, was enforced to command the retreit of Morteſa. Theſe things hapning in the inſtant when they concluded to diſpatch a new Vizier, and to raiſe the ſoldiery to follow him, there was no time to ſpeake of another enemy, and thoſe wiſe men could do but one thing at once. But the zeale of this Councell laſting no longer than while it was blowne by Cæſars Miniſters, and that the ſupply of Aſia was reſolued, and the Grand Signior being fully informed by Gabors laſt Letters, which threatened as much on the other ſide, That if that opportunity was loſt, and that the houſe of Auſtria ſhould poſſeſſe Germany; or at the beſt, the Princes colleagued take the example and make peace, he muſt expect a ſharpe inuaſion and reuenge, then when he ſhould haue no friends, and their Army buſied in Aſia: vrging the neere alliance of the Emperor with the King of Poland, the inſtigation of the Pope, and whatſoeuer might beget a feare that they ſhould be incloſed with enemies. This admonition taught them the wiſedome to be content to keepe their oppoſites exerciſed at anothers charge; and though as yet they durſt not, or would not ſo openly declare, as to pull the war vpon themſelues, yet they found it neceſſary to be continued, and therefore they reſolued to temporiſe, and to auoid a preſent extremity, by the colour of the Truce. In the meane time to leaue Bethlem Gabor at his liberty, and to obſerue how the Princes proceeded to maintaine and ſupply their Troups; meaning to ſtep in when they ſhould ſee their Army in the field. To this purpoſe Morteſa Baſſa was re-eſtabliſhed in his gouernment, and the buſineſſe ſo carried with him, that he ſhould make no ſhew of mouing, vntill the time fit to take horſe; and that then hee ſhould haue leaue and command to correſpond with Gabor according to the occaſion.

The Emperor hauing had notice of theſe counſels and deſignes, diſpatched a Dutch Gentleman toward the Port, with Letters and Inſtructions to his Agents and Friends there; and commanded him to make his journey by the way of Raguſa, giuing it out that hee was a French man, leſt hee ſhould be diſcouered in the ſhorter way by Buda, and ſtopped, and his Papers and Inſtructions ſearched. Notwithſtanding all this diſguiſe, notice came to the Port beforehand of the comming of this Meſſenger; and the Miniſters of the Grand Signior cauſed him at his arriuall to be confined, not ſuffering him to open a packet, and the Vizier forcing him to decipher his Letter to the Emperours Agent in his preſence, not truſting him with his owne ſecret. The ſubſtance whereof was vehement complaint againſt the Prince of Tranſyluania; accuſing him to be the author of all the troubles and diſcontents of the frontier. That ſince his aduancement it was not poſſible to maintaine the Peace, nor that Amity which was contracted betweene their kingdomes; intimating a deſire to haue him depoſed, as a perturber of the World. Expoſtulating the mouing of thoſe new Armes and the preparations of the Baſſa of Buda. He had Letters likewiſe to the Grand Signior, but was not ſuffered to deliuer them: but they reſolued to ſend him backe to Buda, there to diſcouer his meſſage, and if it ſhould ſeeme fit to Bethlem Gabor and the Baſſa to treat peace, that then an Embaſſador from the Emperor ſhould be accepted, but no inferiour perſon, nor querelous Letters. Thus it was plotted to be referred to the aduice of Gabor; who gaue this counſell; that he might in all occaſion both know the ſecret, and direct the anſwer, and by making himſelfe ſeeme neceſſary to the Turks, he guided all their reſolutions to his owne ends. On the other ſide, Morteſa Baſſa hauing had notice, that a meſſenger was ſtollen by, and arriued and heard at the Port, ſent a Poſt with Letters, complaining, That he ſhould haue any entertainment there, or was admitted any audience: That if the Grand Signior had with confidence really referred the concluſion of the peace or warre to Bethlem Gabor and himſelfe, all other Treaty was impertinent and hurtfull, and might produce vncertaine or contrariety in the reſolution; deſiring that he might be diſmiſſed inſtantly and ſent to him, becauſe one of the Imperiall Commiſſioners being arriued at Comara, had aduertiſed, That they could not enter enter into conference vntill the returne of this Meſſenger. Whereupon the Vizier diſpeeded G him without any anſwer to the Emperor, or treaty, or other reſolution than that which was formerly mentioned; rather taking from him, than receiuing his Letters; only a Fede for his diſcharge was giuen him, that he had brought and preſented them, but comming from the country of an Enemy, they could not be accepted. Thus he was ſent to Morteſa by a Chiaus, and with him an anſwer to the Baſſa, That his negotiation was wholly referred to him and the Prince of Tranſyluania; with this caution, That hee ſhould protract, and beware to be raſhly ingaged in an open war.

About the one and twentieth of Aprill news came to the Port from Cairo, ſignifying the reuolt of Gemen in Arabia, vnder a pretending Prince whom they call an Ayman or Prieſt: That he had ouerrun the country, and beſieged the Baſſa in the principall city. To whoſe H reliefe the Baſſa of Cairo had ſent by Suachin in the Red-Sea three thouſand ſouldiers; but it was aduiſed, that if more ſuccors were not ſupplied, that the Holy Country would be loſt.
This cauſed frequent Counſels, and did much trouble the State; eſpecially the feare of Mecha, Medina, and the deuotion to their Prophet. The great Vizier arriued at Aleppo, but complained for men, munition, and mony: to raiſe the firſt, the Viziers of the Bench were ſent abroad; one to Greece, another to Natolia, a third to Tartary, others to other places; inſomuch as the City was left deſolate. Munition was aduentured by Sea to Scanderone; and mony was extorted from the poorer (per fas & nefas) or drawne from rich ſubjects (precario) to concur to aſſiſt in the publique want.

A dead ſilence now poſſeſſed all things; and there was little newes from the Prince of I Tranſyluania, how he proceeded, nor what he purpoſed: only the tripartite Commiſſioners were met at Comara, where they treated; and the generall inclination of the Miniſters at the Port being wholly bent to peace, they aduiſed Morteſa ſecretly, and excuſed themſelues to Gabor vpon the Mufti; whoſe feares the Imperials had made the ground of their hopes, and that Councell. But it ſeemes it was reſolued at leaſt, not to breake; the Emperours Commiſſioners preſſing a reſolution on the one ſide, and Gabor on the other raiſing new difficulties, and endeauouring to diſſolue the Treaty, and to leaue the occaſion of the warre open to time and opportunity. The Turks being driuen vp in a ſtreight how to pleaſe both, fell at laſt vpon the Prince, accuſing him, That he had in December before treated apart, and made his owne peace with the Emperour, vpon conditions to his owne aduantage, without conſulting K the Port: which was true; for vpon the retreat of his Army, and the deſpaire of the forces of Count Mansfelt, (which he found weakened by a long march) and the diſunion of the Generals, he had treated and ſigned Articles; but as he pretended, they were concluded in a Councell, with the conſent of his friends or their miniſters: which as he could not directly deny, ſo he did not abſolutely confeſſe; tempering what he had done, with diuers conditions; of the declaration of the conſent of his Allies, and the ratification of the Grand Signior. This Treaty was noiſed and bruted from Vienna, and the copy ſent to Conſtantinople purpoſely to diſcredit him: ſo that it was no more a ſecret; and thereupon the Prince diſpatched a Poſt to his Embaſſador, to ſatisfie thoſe who might except againſt him: profeſſing not only what he had done apart by neceſſity, and for want of ſupplies, but that he would proceed in the generall L Treaty: becauſe there was no other way to vnblinde the Miniſters of the Grand Signior; who ſo much affected the aſſurance of the Border, that they would not beleeue any arguments, as fauouring of other intereſts, but that he would at the conuention raiſe ſo many rockes and impoſſibilities, as that the breach of the conference ſhould be the beginning of the war, and a bond of neceſſity in the Turks to partake in it. The Emperor remaining ſtill jealous of delaies, ſent another meſſenger to the Port, with a ſecond plaint againſt Bethlem Gabor, and Morteſa Baſſa, as the diſturbers of the antient Truce; and an expreſſion of his feruent deſire to maintaine a good peace with the Ottoman Empire, which he ſaid could neuer be ſecured, vnleſſe the Grand Signior ſhould place ſuch Miniſters in the frontier gouernments, as were louers of the publique quiet. For the eſtabliſhing whereof he had ſent his Deputies M to meet thoſe of the Port, who hauing agreed (as he pretended) vpon Articles, and reconciled all differences, that he was ready to ſend a great Embaſſador thither, to confirme whatſoeuer ſhould there be concluded. This was done only to get an acceptance of ſome perſon of Quality to be preſent at the Port; which Gabor and Morteſa Baſſa hindred, to keepe that State without

A without any light but ſuch as they pleaſed to giue them. But it being objected to the Meſſenger by the Vizier, That the Emperour had made a peace apart with the Prince, and that therefore he had obtained his ends without the communication of the Grand Signior, which gaue much ſuſpition of ſiniſter purpoſes: the Emperours Meſſenger did not deny but that there was ſome ſuch thing done; but that his Maſter did not truſt in it, nor could euer reſt ſecure in the word of that Prince, vnleſſe the authority of the Port did ſtrengthen it. In con-cluſion, feare on the one part to loſe an opportunity of peace; the death of Mansfelt, ſome diſaſters of the Friends of the Prince in Germany, and the failing of aids expected, all con-curring on the other part, made both parts ſoften and decline, and reſolue to take care only of their owne affaires, and to leaue the World at liberty.

B The Captaine Baſſa was ſent vp to the Euxine ſea with a gallant fleet for flags and ſtrea-mers, reſolute to attempt the ſhutting in of the Coſſacks by building two Forts on the outlets of the Boriſthenes: who prepared to reſiſt him, and were intrenched neere his expected deſcent. The Poles made ſome braues, That they would aſſiſt them, and maintaine their frontier, as Lords of that ground: but it was not beleeued they would hazard their peace with the Grand Signior, by fighting with his Generall, but rather conniue till he ſhould be returned, and then to raze and ouerthrow what was raiſed, and excuſe it vpon their out-lawes.
This enterpriſe was like to coſt ſome knockes; but as matters then ſtood, the Poles were not in ſtate to make any great progreſſe, the King of Sueden hauing diuerted them to their owne defence in Pruſſia: yet howſoeuer they reſolued in this particular, they muſt keepe an Army C on foot, leſt they tempted the enemy to vſe the occaſion.

The Captaine Baſſa diſpatched with an Armado into the Blacke Sea.

While all the Sea forces were imploied in this deſigne, the Arches were left vngarded, and ſix gallies of the great Duke of Tuſcany came to the mouth of the Helleſpont, and took one Gallion, and many leſſer ſhips of the Cairo fleet; the booty whereof by report amounted to ſome millions of Dollars. This ſudden alarme cauſed the Grand Signior to ſend into the Blacke Sea to recall ſome forces, and inſtantly from the Armado twelue gallies were ſpared, and diſpatched to ſeeke the Chriſtians, who were departed with their riches.

There arriued at the ſame time a Perſian Embaſſador at Aleppo with ouertures of peace: vpon whom the great Vizier put gards, neither accepting nor refuſing his meſſage; and ſent to the Port to declare, that the State muſt either furniſh him with a million and half of gold, D and ſtore of munition, or elſe grant him a Commiſſion to entertaine that opportunity and motion of Treaty; for with leſſe ſupplies hee could not proceed. The firſt was impoſſible, and the later much againſt the ſtomach; but a freſh aduice bringing the report of a great Embaſſador following the former with rich Preſents, and faire offers, made many beleeue or hope a happy concluſion; though men of beſt judgements eſteemed it very difficult, vnleſſe Babylon ſhould be ſurrendred. All men made this concluſion, That if peace could be ſettled on that ſide, the Turks had yet ſpleene enough to reuenge the braues they had endured from the Imperials; who though they ſought a Truce, proſecuted it inſolently, threatening fire and ſword if they obteined not their deſires. And thus the Treaty at Comara had ebbs and flouds, heats and colds, as the feare or hope of the affaires of Aſia did temper it.

An Embaſſador from Perſia arriueth at Aleppo.

E This expected Perſian Embaſſador not long after arriued at the Port, with little hope to buy peace at a cheaper rate than the ſurrender of Babylon. And the gallies of the Grand Sig-nior ſent in purſuit of the Florentines, by great diligence ouertooke them in a Port of Morea, and recouered all the prizes, [So their great wealth was like a dreame, when they awaked it vaniſhed:] And vpon the ſixteenth of Iune they returned and entered in triumph, towing in all the repriſed booty. It ſeemes they were become too rich to fight, and the Turks, though ſuperiour in ſtrength and number, were content with the gaine, and glad not to force men already ſpoiled, into diſpaire.

The Perſian Embaſſador arriueth at the Port.

About the firſt of Iuly the Baſſa of Buda ſent poſt to the Port, with aduice, that the Emperors Commiſſioners at Comaran had preſented certaine Articles, containing accounts and F reſtitutions; which being ſent to him, he had receiued, but could not allow them; anſwering, That the Grand Signior did not treat with Merchants; Which had like to haue bred con-fuſion: but that they were ſince entered into new conference, and had concluded in the generall, a reſolution to peace; with conſent that both parties ſhould haue time to ſend to their Maſters for freſh inſtructions in particulars. Whereupon he had diſpatched that Meſſenger to the Port, to vnderſtand the ſence, and to receiue abſolute directions from thence. By him G Bethlem Gabor did write a ſharpe Letter; confeſſing plainly (ſeeing he could not longer conceale it) that he had made peace for himſelfe; but accuſed the negligence of thoſe Miniſters as the cauſe thereof: Firſt, That they would neuer conſtantly truſt his aduiſes of the opportunity of the war, but their Mufti and Book men, who were fitter to enterpret their Law, than to judge of the World and matters of State. That he would be true to the Grand Signior, but yet not neglect himſelfe, when he ſaw how little care of him was had, how little authority and credit was giuen to him. That the Letters written to him from the Vizier were ambiguous and irreſolute, but diuers others priuately had threatened him not to be the occaſion of a war. And therefore to proue himſelfe faithfull and true to his owne firſt counſels, he offered, That if the Grand Signior would breake off the Treaty, and reſolue to vſe the time, H that he was ready to march in ſix daies warning. He amplified the proſperity of the remains of Mansfelt Army in Sileſia, the occaſion, and all other fit arguments to moue them to a change of thoſe degenerate counſels of peace. But this was an art to caſt the fault on others, for the concluſion of that which he had ſuffered to proceed, and was beyond his power to remedy.

Yet it much perplexed the Vizier, who excuſed himſelfe, and returned all the blame vpon the Lawyers, as men ignorant, by whom he had been ouerborne; and that he neuer conſented to Peace or Treaty in his owne judgement, but had promiſed ſincerely according to his engagement, as far as he durſt, and, that ſo much his continuall Letters witneſſed for him; promiſing, that he would cauſe a Conſultation to anſwer theſe aduices, and that he would not agree to any concluſion without the ſatisfaction of the Prince, and all others that were I friends to the Port, and the reſtitution of the oppreſſed liberty. Which ſolemnly handled in a full Counſell, Orders were diſpatched away as the finall reſolution of that State; to leaue the power of making Peace, or breaking the Treaty, to the judgement of Gabor and the Baſſa of Buda, wholly and without reſtriction.

What effects this would worke was ſomewhat vncertaine; but ſuch appeared the inclination of thoſe into whoſe hands the Treaty was now referred, that there was a ſtrong opinion, the Emperour of Germany ſhould faile of the ſecurity expected: Eſpecially becauſe the ouertures of peace which the Perſian made by his Embaſſador arriued at the Port, together with their neceſſity, had raiſed ſome ſhew of inclination to hearken to accomodation in thoſe parts. But it came aduiſed from the Treaty, That the Commiſſioners being met the ſecond K time, the Imperials inſiſted vpon high termes, demanding a ratification of the old Peace of Zitwa, then expired, without any addition or diminution; and by vertue thereof, reſtitution of Vatz, ſtollen during that time: declaring they had no authority to proceed to any new negotiation.
To which the Turks replied, That ſo much ceremony needed not, to appoint a ſolemne meeting to confirme that which two Letters onely from their Princes might haue done: That that Truce being run out, was no longer in vigor nor in being. If they would treat a new Peace, that they were ready; but to expect any reſtitution, or reuiuing of the old, it was in vaine, and their meeting fruitleſſe. And the Germanes as ſtiffely preſſing their own propoſitions, the Conference was for a while interrupted, and a current rumour ſpread, The Conuention was diſſolued. But Morteſa Baſſa diſcouering by diſcourſe, That the Imperials L ſtood vpon ſo peremptory points, as ſuppoſing that all the forces were drawne into Aſia, and that the Grand Signior could not ſhew an Army on that ſide; ſuddenly gaue order to all the troups that were ready about Buda, and in the frontier to march to Peſth, and to ſhew themſelues in the field. Whereupon the Germans began to mollifie, and were content to renew the Treaty. At a third ſeſſion they reſolued to employ the force of gold, and to win Morteſa by corruption; to whom they preſented from the Emperour ſix thouſand Dollars, with promiſe of a greater reward. This Caſt changed all the Game; and he vndertooke both to diſcouer the deſignes of Bethlem Gabor, and to croſſe him in his Maſters Court.

The Miniſters of the Grand Signior hauing exhibited a ſecond complaint to his Majeſties Embaſſador, for ſome wrongs done vnto his ſubjects in the Gulph of Perſia, he ſent vnto them M this enſuing Command, to obſerue the antient Capitulations.

To

To all Gouernors, Admirals, Commanders of Ships,

Or other his Maieſties Subiects trading in the Kingdome or Gulfe of Perſia.

After our louing commendations:

WHereas Aly Baſſa of Balſara, hath ſent his Letters to this high Port by the hands of two of his ſeruants inhabiting in thoſe parts, by them informing the Grand Signior, That the Engliſh Nation trading in the Perſian Gulfe, in Ormus, Iaſques, Mumbrun, and other parts of the Kingdome of Perſia, do make prize and take the Veſſels and Frigots of the Subiects of the Grand Signior dwelling in Balſara, Laſha, and the Coaſts of Arabia, trading to Meſchit, India, Goa, and Calicut; and that they make Slaues of all the paſſengers, Merchants or other, that they finde vpon the ſaid Veſſels, being Subiects of this Empire. Further, That they do vnite themſelues with the Perſian (now in warre with the Grand Signior) aſsiſting him not onely with munition, but Veſſels and Frigots; and that they help and teach the Perſians (enemies of this Port) to build Gallies, Galliots, and other Veſſels of warre to arme in thoſe ſeas; prouiding them of Shipwrights and all other neceſſaries for the fitting of an Armado, thereby to inuade or beſiege the Port of Balſara, or Laſha, or to make incurſions vpon the territories of this Empire. Which actions being alleadged to be contrarie to the Capitulations of his moſt ſacred Majeſty, and to the publique Peace and Commerce betweene theſe Kingdoms; I haue been called before the Chimacham, Deputie to the great Vizier, to make anſwer to theſe Obiections, and to prouide ſome timely remedie, before thoſe proceedings ſhould giue further occaſion of diſcontent. To which accuſations, I being able, concerning the fact, to ſay nothing; but that knowing ſuch actions to be vniuſt and vnlawfull, and contrary to the will of his ſacred Maieſtie, and your Commiſsions and Inſtructions from the Companie and your Principals, for whom you ſerue: I do hope that herein you haue not offended, nor giuen any iuſt occaſion of lament, vnleſſe you haue been thereunto by like acts of hoſtilitie prouoked. Notwithſtanding being vrged by the great Miniſters of this Port; and that it will require ſo much time to informe his Maieſtie, and to ſeeke redreſſe by ſo long a courſe, (to whom neuertheleſſe the Grand Signior will write his Letters of complaint, to require Iuſtice in ſuch caſe) and for the preuention of future euils of very great importance to the Subiects of his Maieſtie (which you may eaſily conceiue) and for the declaration of his Maieſties ſincere and conſtant purpoſe to maintaine a good and iuſt Peace with the Grand Signior and all his Dominions, which I know to be his Maieſties royall will: and that I make no doubt of your obedience to all his Orders and purpoſes, like good Subiects that muſt anſwer your actions at the Tribunall of his High Iuſtice; I haue thought fit and very requiſite to ſend you this our Declaration, and in the name of his Maieſtie to admoniſh and require you, That you preſume not to take or make prize of any of the Veſſels or Subiects of the Grand Signior, trading in the Sea whereſoeuer; nor to make any ſpoyle of their goods, or hurt or detaine their perſons: nor that you intermeddle in any inuaſion or attempt of the King of Perſia, to aſsiſt him or his Armies againſt the Subiects or Dominions of the Grand Signior, neither by Sea nor Land, nor by prouiding them of munition, Shipwrights, or other Artiſmen, to teach them the vſe of gallies, thereby to inuade the Territories or Subiects of this Empire; but that therein you carry your ſelues neutrally and indifferently, betweene two Princes both in Peace and Amitie with his Maieſtie. Wiſhing you well to conſider, the inconuenience which may ariſe to others, and the damage in time to your ſelues, by teaching a powerfull Nation to vſe their ſtrength in Sea cauſes, of which they are now vtterly ignorant, and of which practiſe wee haue a lamentable example in theſe Seas. And no way doubting, That like good Subiects, you will conforme your actions and proceedings in thoſe Seas to the rules of his Maieſtie (for that ſuch is his will and pleaſure, In declaration whereof I haue affixed his Royall Seale) yet I am inforced to proteſt, That the contrarie will giue occaſion of much trouble and danger vnto your ſelues, and in the end loſſe and damage to your Principals.

Giuen in Conſtantinople the third of September, in the yeare of Grace, 1627.

The Perſian beſiegeth Achiska

Halil Baſſa made great Vizier vpon the rout of the army mentioned at Babylon, was ſent to G the war in the end of the laſt yeare, being arriued at Dierbecher, reſolued to enter Perſia (not-withſtanding that the King had an Embaſſador at the Port treating of peace) and gaue order to certain Beglerbeghs to make another inuaſion by Van; and did endeauour to draw Abaſſa Baſſa, with his forces ioyned with the Georgians, to do the like on his frontier, who gaue good words, and hopes of due obedience. Whileſt theſe deſignes were in preparation, the Perſian by his General beſieged Achiska, a city of great importance neer Arzirum: Whereupon Halil ſent Diſlenk Baſſa of Natolia, with ſix other Baſſaes, to Abaſſa, to perſuade him preſently to performe his word, and to riſe and vnite his ſtrength with them. With theſe hee ſent three thouſand Ianizaries vnder twelue Captaines, with his owne Letters; who being arriued neere the City, he appointed them to incamp, and ſent them prouiſion for a day or two, till he could H put his affaires for his departure in order. Theſe reſting ſecure, in the night he ſet vpon them, and cut them in pieces, ſome few eſcaping to the Port. Diſlenk and another, Muchmet Baſſa, were ſlaine; the Captaines that he tooke aliue, or came to him to treat, he ſent to the Perſian: whereby Achiska being in great diſtreſſe, and vnſuccoured, was preſently ſurrendred to the Enemy. This newes being brought to the great Vizier, the next morning hee roſe with all his whole army, laying aſide all deſigne againſt Perſia, and marched right to Arzirum; vowing to puniſh the Rebell, or there to end his life: who was ſtrong, fortified, victualled, prouided, and reſolute.

Bethlem Gabor certifieth the Port, of peace betweene him and the Emperor.

Notwithſtanding all the colours, proteſtations, and perturbations of the Prince of Tranſyluania, That hee would finde occaſion and quarrell to diſſolue the treaty of Comaran, or I that he would ſeparate himſelfe from the Turks; yet at laſt hee ſent his Embaſſadour Francis Microferentz to the Grand Signior, about the later end of October, to acquaint him that the peace was concluded. And within a few dayes after, the Internuntio of the Emperor arriued with a branch of Oliues at the Port: And this Embaſſador and two Agents of Gabor went to the Chimacham with a Letter from their Maſter, vnder the Seale, of great ſecrecie; of freſh aduice, That the King of Denmarke was vtterly broken and fled into certaine Iſlands, all his Countrey, and Germany proſtrate at the mercy of the Emperour (which newes the Imperials had formerly ſpread) counſelling the Chimacham to make an end of their peace with the Emperor, and to diſpatch and to accept of any conditions, and to ſend the Internuntio away with ſpeed and content; leſt the Auſtrians puffed vp with thoſe victories, ſhould take the ad- K uantage of their delay, and preſent them worſe termes, or refuſe it abſolutely. Whereupon the Miniſters of the Port reſolued eaſily to peace; changing their former Ænigmaticall letters, and hudled vp a haſty concluſion. They added further, That the Princes of Germany treated a Pacification, which was like alſo to take effect; and either way, that the Emperor would be at liberty to make war vpon him. Whether they feigned the firſt part, to accelerate the ra-tification; or feared the later, and that their Maſter ſhould therein deſeruedly be left out, was hard to iudge: but they only by this office (which the Turke did beleeue was ſincere) merited of the Emperor the conſummation of what was done; and thereupon they Both made their atonement with the Emperor according to their ſeuerall Capitulations.

What was the ſecret cauſe and reaſon of this ſudden alteration, (Gabor hauing made all de- L monſtration, that he would continue the war; hauing proceeded euen to threats and proteſts againſt the Miniſters of the Port; and being irritated anew after the concluſion of his owne Treaty, by the complaints and practiſes of the Emperors Agents, to bring him into diſgrace or ruine; ſo that hee could repoſe no truſt in an enemy newly reconciled, and ſo often prouoked) did breed much inquiſition, and many doubted ſome great myſterie, either of his reuolt wholly to the Imperiall part, or that he had ſome other high deſigne in Poland. But thoſe who were leſſe ſpeculatiue and curious, and looked only vpon euident matter, concluded, That the King of Denmarke being indeed diſtreſſed by Walſtein, who vpon the priuat accord of Gabor, was let looſe, and was become triumphant in Germany; and finding himſelf betrayed and for-ſaken by Morteſa Baſſa, and that he could no longer diſguiſe his owne ends, which were, To ob- M lige the Emperour to him for the Peace if it were made; and to blinde the Turks, to conuert their force and authoritie to better his conditions in the Peace; and that hee foreſaw ſo much renitencie and inconſtancie in them to proſecute the warre, the vigor whereof depended vpon contingencies and the ſucceſſe of the Viſier in Aſia; that he reſolued to

A preuent being preuented, and diſcouered. For certainly if he had not ſoundly ſhut vp the occaſion, by being the firſt that ſeemed to merit of both parts, by reconciling the difficultie hee himſelfe had raiſed, he had bin ſtript naked, and left in the ſtate of the Conſtable Count of S. Pol, between Lewis the 11 of France, and the Duke of Burgondie. This only was obſerued by all, That whatſoeuer the ends of Gabor and Morteſa were while they were vnited in counſel, they did ſuffer the grand Signior to know no more, than conduced to their own ends; & that they had practiſed power to change the reſolutions of the Port, with euery wind of rumor they pleaſed to obtrude: And that if Gabor had bin countenanced and nouriſhed in his hopes, to wear the crown of Hungarie (which was the ſcope of all his intentions) that he had credit and wit enough to haue moulded the Turks (who ſaw the affairs of Chriſtendom only thorow B the glaſſe of his relations) to his own deſignes; and that hee would continue the War at his pleaſure, and they at whoſe coſts it had bin made, ſhould haue bin the leaſt and laſt, to know the internal motiue. For ſo it often happens, That great Princes and States haue bin involued in troubles, and ſhut vp with peaces, vnder the ſpecious name of the publique good, by the paſſions, deſignes, or ambitions of their Allyes or Miniſters, the cauſes and pretexts being ſeldom rightly diſtinguiſhed.

It hath bin formerly intimated, That Gabor had ſecretly treated apart; and now the general peace being concluded, the Articles themſelues will moſt cleerly diſcouer, either to what ſtreits the Prince was driuen, or what were his intentions: the order of time giuing place to that of Story, we haue choſen this period to publiſh them.

C

Articles of Peace concluded between the Emperor of Germany, Ferdinand, and Bethlem Gabor Prince of Tranſylvania, in the moneth of December, 1626.

THe Prince of Tranſylvania doth promiſe by the faith of a Chriſtian, neuer to moue arms, or vſe any hoſtility againſt the Maieſty of the Emperour, or the Houſe of Auſtria, or their Succeſſors; much leſſe to enter into their dominions with an army: Not to aid his Enemies, nor to keep correſpondence with them: Not to plot any innovation in the kingdom of Hungary, or other Chriſtian Countries; neither to ſtirre vp and prouoke the Turkes or Tartars, or others to inuade them: Not to entertain nor aſſiſt in any euill Counſell againſt his Maieſty, nor to giue ear to the requeſts and deſires of his Enemies; but rather to reueale all E their conſpiracies and wickedneſſes which ſhall be made known vnto him, and by all means to demonſtrate and ſhew a ſincere minde, truly deſirous of Peace, and ſolicitous of the Common good.

That the Prince ſhall inſtantly depart with his whole army out of the territories & cities of the Emperor; and that he ſhall reſtore as well all goods belonging to the Imperiall Treaſure, as thoſe of his faithfull ſubiects.

That he ſhall remoue from him the Rebel Mansfelt, and all other his followers and Adherents deſirous to inuade the dominions of the Emperor. And that he ſhall not aid any ſtranger whatſoeuer, who at his inſtance hath entred into the territories of his Maieſty with Count
F Mansfelt; to whom letters of publique ſafety ſhall be giuen, that they may returne by twenty or thirty in a troup; with condition, That in no place of their retreit they ſhall ioyne with the enemies of the Emperor.

IV. That ſeeing it is fit for the eſtabliſhing of the Peace, that the Inhabitants of countries and cities belonging to the Prince, by the conſent of the Emperor ſhould remain during his life, in obedience and fidelitie to him; and that thoſe inhabitants ſhould do homage to the Emperour (ſauing their corporall oath to the Prince) to keep inviolate theſe articles: That they ſhould haue leaue by Letters of full authority and power granted them by the Prince, in their firſt aſſemblies and conuentions to make ſuch oath of Homage.

V. That at the ſame time of the performing of the Homage and Oath, beſides the Oath before the laſt War, they ſhall take a new oath, according to the agreement betweene the Prince and the Commiſſioners of the Emperor.

VI. The Prince ſhall procure, That all places vpon the confines which were taken by the Turkes in the laſt war, ſhall be reſtored, and that all Captiues on both ſides ſhall be ſet at liberty: and that the Prince ſhall procure the freedom of all ſuch the Emperours ſubiects as ſhall bee in the Turkiſh captiuitie.

VII. That all the ſubiects of the Emperour, lately incited and drawn to the ſeruice of the Prince, ſhall be free from their oath; and if the Prince haue any of their letters of obligation in his hands, that he ſhall reſtore them: And that theſe conditions confirmed, all other things formerly treated, ſhall remain in their former ſtate and vigor.

VIII. That if any other difficulties ariſe, they ſhall be accommodated with fidelitie and quietneſſe, by Commiſſioners on both parts. And that all thoſe who in the laſt commotion haue ſerued the Prince, ſhall be abſolued, according to the treaty and agreement at Vienna.

IX. That all the inhabitants of counties and cities which haue ſerued the Prince, ſhall be abſolued; only thoſe excepted who haue voluntarily taken vp arms againſt the Emperor, for whom he ſhall only intercide: excuſing alwaies priuat men which haue done priuat wrongs, for they ſhall according to law and cuſtom, ſeek their reſtitution by Ciuile Action.

X. That all other Articles of peace concluded at Nichilsburg and Vienna, ſhall remain in their former vigor and force; except vpon the behalfe of the Emperor, the paiment of thirty thouſand Dollars to the Prince, and the care of the confines granted vnto him. And that all goods of the Emperors Clergy poſſeſſed by the Prince, ſhall be reſtored, from the year 1619, till this preſent day. Except the Abbies of Replana, belonging to the Seminarie of Strigonium; for which the Prince ſhall pay to the Emperor yearly fiue hundred florens.

At the arriuall of the Meſſenger ſent from the commiſſioners of the Emperor, to the Port, with the news of the concluſion of the Treaty, and the ratification on the part of Cæſar, he preſented this letter.

The Emperors Letter to the grand Signior, a little before the ratification of the Peace.

Articles of peace agreed vpon between Ferdinand Emperor of Germany, and the grand Signior Sultan Morat, in Comaran, in the moneth of September, 1627.

I Sultan Morat, King of Kings, &c. To thee Ferdinand, honored King of the Romans, D Almaines, Bohemians, Hungars, Croats, Auſtrians, Emperor of Germany, and moſt glorious Prince amongſt Chriſtians: whoſe laſt daies be euer happy.

B*Y vertue of our Imperiall Commiſsion granted to* Morteſa Baſſa our magnificent Vizier, vpon the frontiers of Buda; to the Beglerbegh of Agria, Mehemet; to the Mufti of Buda, Iſſa; to the Sanzack of Strigonium, Achmet; to the Bey of Sonluc, Muharem; to the Aga of Aſſapi, Ghian; and to Michael Todolaghi Embaſſador of Bethlem Gabor, on our behalfe: And the illuſtrous Palatine of Hungary, and the Chancellour Stephano and E others, on the part of the Emperor. Which Commiſsioners being met in the field of Sona, and hauing found the peaces which had formerly bin concluded at Zitwa, Vienna, Comar, and Chiarman, to be diſturbed by diuers inſolencies and outrages don vpon the ſubiects of both parties. Wherupon the ſaid Commiſsioners in the aforeſaid place did treat and conclude a good peace for the ſpace of twenty fiue years, in the current year of our great Prophet Mahomet Muſtapha the Meſſenger of God, 1037, and of the Venerable Chriſt 1627, as appeareth by a ſealed Capitulation containing eleuen Articles. And you alſo deſiring and accepting the good peace for ſo long time, hauing ſent the ſacred Capitulation to our happy Port, by your eſteemed and honored amongſt Chriſtians, Stephano Baloco, Captaine of Tata; deſiring in your Letter, F that it may be obſerued word for word. And although we haue declared heretofore vpon our Imperial part, That we would haue made other Capitulations; yet ſince it hath euer bin our regal cuſtome, affectionatly to correſpond with the intentions of thoſe great princes that profeſſe amitie, amity, deuotion, and friendſhip to our high Port (by the immenſe fauour of God, the ſtay and G refuge of great Lords and Princes;) We declare and demonſtrate our ſingular greatneſſe and magnificence, and approue ſufficiently, and hold lawfully the confirmation of the Peace for the ſpace of twenty fiue yeares, according to the ſaid Letter, beginning from the yeare 1627. Wherupon our high Order is giuen out in writing, for ratifying and confirming of theſe our new Imperiall Capitulations.

Thus much is the Preface, according to the ſtile of that Court: That which followeth is the Capitulation, as it was accepted H and ſent by the grand Signior; tranſlated out of the Turkiſh word for word, without any alteration.

That ſeeing the Peace eſtabliſhed formerly at Zitwa, Vienna, Comar, and Chiarman, hath remained in the ſame ſtate, and in the ſame articles, without any alteration, it ſhal not be violated by any new occaſion of contention.

That the difference of Vatz, whereof is made mention at the preſent, ſhall reſt in the ſame ſtate that the Commiſsioners on both ſides ſhall agree.

That the new Forts built vpon the confines of Croatia, contrary to the Peace, ſhall be de- I moliſhed. To which purpoſe our ſaid Deputy Mehemet, and our Viſier Morteſa Baſſa, ſhall meet vpon the frontiers of Buda with your Deputies, at the time appointed by the Treaty, and there vpon the places on both ſides ſhall cauſe to be demoliſhed the Forts built contrary to the Peace: wherin if they find any impediment, they ſhall chuſe able and valiant men to performe and execute the ſaid ſeruice.

That after the approbation of this happy Peace, your great Embaſſadour ſhall come to Comar; and ours ſhall repaire with our Imperiall Letters to Strigonium: and there one of them aduiſing the other, yours ſhall ſet forward to our happy Port, and ours ſhall aduance to you. K For ſo it is agreed by our Imperiall Order, both carrying with them the new Imperiall Capitulations.

That all complaints of Villages ſubiect to both parts, ſhall bee layd aſide, and no violences, taxes, or contribution, contrary to our former Conuention, ſhall be exacted. And all Forts built in the common confines ſhall be raſed. And reciprocally it ſhall be made knowne, according to the antient Treaty, what great men doe dwell amongſt our Tributaries. And for the execution of the ſixteenth and ſeuenteenth Articles of the Peace of Zitwa, the tenth of Vienna, and the fourth of Comar and Chiarman (for ſuch was then the agreement) two Capigi Baſ- L ſa's of our high Port ſhall be deputed and diſpeeded, the one to this ſide, and the other to that ſide of the Danuby. And vpon your part you ſhall ſend two ſuch qualified perſons to the ſame places: who being met together with the deputies of Morteſa Baſſa and the Palatine of Hungary ſhall rectifie all diſorders, and ſee that good iuſtice be done on both parties: for ſo it is our moſt high pleaſure.

That the Slaues which haue been taken during this our Treaty, ſhall be freed and ſet at libertie without any ranſome: and thoſe who were taken before the ſaid Treaty ſhall be exchanged and redeemed, according to their qualities and eſtates; by the interpoſition of Morteſa M Baſſa and the Palatine of Hungary deputed for that purpoſe.

For the good of poor people on both ſides, the Commiſsioners haue thought it fit to conclude this renued peace for 25 years, from 1627. Wherunto we haue giuen our Imperial aſſent.

That

A VIII. That all Merchants, and other our ſubiects on both parts, ſhall haue ſafe paſſage and conduct through both our Dominions: and we haue giuen command to our Baſſa's, Beglerbegs, Generalls, Beghes, and Captaines, vpon our confines, to apprehend, bring into iuſtice, and puniſh all ſuch as ſhall any way diſturbe or moleſt them contrary to the peace. As likewiſe the Palatine of Hungary and other your Miniſters ſhall doe on your part, if they finde any ſuch offendors.

IX. That our Beglerbeghs, Sanzacks, Captains, and Gouernors; and your Generals, Commaunders, and Captaines, ſhall vpon occaſion employ all ſuch perſons as are louers of the peace and common good.

B X. That there ſhall be no damage or hurt done to any of our ſubiects in any of your Kingdomes or Dominions, neither by ſea nor land: as there ſhall none be done to yours in our Dominions.

XI. That all by-paſt wrongs, enmities, and vnkindeneſſes on both parts ſhall be forgotten and layed aſleepe: and that this happy Peace ſhal be ſincerely and firmely continued and kept inviolate.

Vpon condition that the Emperor performe and obſerue all the aforeſaid Articles, and that C there follow no action from any Miniſters, contrary to the ſaid Peace; We promiſe and ſwear by God our Creator, who made the whole world of nothing; and by the honor which we bear to our moſt high Prophet Mahomet Muſtapha, That there ſhall not bee done during the whole term of the ſaid Peace, the leaſt hurt or damage to the Subiects, Countries, Kingdomes, Caſtles, or Forts of the ſaid Emperor, by any of our Miniſters or Armies, nor to any Chriſtian ſlaues ſubiect to our happy Port.

I haue choſen the Capitulations as they were ſigned by the grand Signior, which though D the Articles are very generall, and matters of greateſt moment either referred, or not fully eſtabliſhed; yet being therfore aduantagious for the Turk, who would not deſcend into particular definition, becauſe by the vertue of former treaties, all places ſurpriſed ought to bee reſtored, and depredations ſatisfied, he would neither break, nor yet oblige himſelf to reparation: and indeed the difficulties were inſuperable in reſpect of the Turkiſh Law; for no place can be ſurrendred to the Chriſtian, where a Moſche hath been erected; which was the caſe of Vatz: And the Emperor could not conſent to abandon his claime with charitie and honour, grounded on the articles of Zitwa. So that both ſides were contented to bee appeaſed, rather than righted for the time, and both did thinke that they had the aduantage: The Emperor, In preſuming his title; the Turke, In not declaring. So the one part accepting the ſignature of E the other, without diſpute, the bodies of the Treaties were very different, if not contrary: yet ſo deſirous they were of peace, that they did wittingly ouerſee one the arts of the other; and in effect there was no firm peace eſtabliſhed, but that either ſide might finde iuſt matter, and ground it on the Capitulation it ſelfe, when occaſion ſhall inuite them to breake. Therfore I obſerue, That it is not the letter but the minde that makes a true peace: and I am perſuaded, That the minds of theſe Princes, howſoeuer neceſſitie hath reſtrained them, are ſo diſcrepant, that the firſt opportunitie wil diſcouer them in their own colours and nature. And this ſort of concluſion was moſt fit for Gabor (not to haue matters ſoundly examined and healed) who was principally ſafe by an il intelligence, and maintaining of jealouſie and ſubiect of new diſcord between thoſe Empires.

F Halil Baſſa General of the Army in Aſia, whom we left furiouſly marching to be reuenged of the Rebel, was forced to riſe from the ſiege of Arzirum; and retyring, Abaſſa followed him 7 days, and cut off all his rear, and took his treaſure, cannon, and baggage, to the great diſcouragement of the Turkiſh ſtate. The army afterward fel into mutiny, and ſought to ſtone their General. Whereupon he wrot to the grand Signior, That there was no hope of obedience, G vnleſſe the reuerence of his perſon did reuiue it. Yet he reſted at Tocat, and the ſoldiers diſbanded, and returned naked to the Port,as from an ouerthrow:and it was threatned, that thoſe which did ſtay with the Vizier,would bring him to Conſtantinople perforce; ſo that in the next Spring,much trouble, if not a great deſolation was preſaged. Yet it was reſolued to proſecute the Warre: for though the renitencie of the ſoldier,and many other impediments perſuaded againſt it,yet not to haue moued at all, was thought too plain a diſcouery of their owne infirmitie, and would too much encourage the Enemy, eſpecially Abaſſa Baſſa, who had practiſed both the Tartars,Poles,and Coſſackes. Whereupon Huſſeruph Baſſa a Vizier, and late Aga of the Ianizaries, was choſen Conductor of the Militia, and ſent ouer the water to Aſia ſide with all prouiſion. Much new Ordnance was caſt, which the grand Signior H went in perſon to ſee in the Founders office. And from thence to the Arſenall, to giue order for the gallies. And it was concluded,That the new Generall ſhould march directly to Diarbecher, to oppoſe the Perſian, and there remaine as Baſſa of the prouince, with one diuiſion of the Army. But ſecretly he was made great Vizier, and the Seale appointed to bee giuen him when he ſhould be vpon the way. This was done partly to ſaue charges,becauſe to that great degree appertained great expence in ſetting out; and partly for reſpect of Halil Baſſa in Tocat,that he might not ſeeme to be diſplaced in diſgrace,but that he ſhould ſurrender to the other, and retyre to the Port,ſalvo Honore. And when Huſſeruph ſhould be declared prime Vizier, he had order alſo to change his wayes, but whither, was not divulged. Howſoeuer it was iudged they could not attempt much that year,but only make ſhew to keep the field,and the I reputation of an army.

1628. About the fiſt of April Huſſruph Baſſa was declared Vizier;who intended to march directly towards Babylon,for of Abaſſa they had enough the laſt year; who had writ a letter to the grand Signior, That he was his ſeruant and ſlaue,& would hold the prouince for him: but if he ſought to force more, plainly that he would deliuer the poſſeſſion to the Perſian,againſt whom as the great Enemy,if they would proſecute the war,that he would doe all ſeruice hee could with his ſafety. And this was accepted as a full ſubmiſſion.

Whilſt the grand Signior was thus buſied to ſettle the affaires of Aſia,and to reduce Abaſſa K Baſſa to obedience; the Tartar Han was openly declared a Rebel,and Enemy to the Turkiſh Empire: and his brother Shachin Gheray hauing exacted a tribute of the Princes of Bugdania and Wallachia, had receiued an ouerthrow of Cante.Emir a Tartar, his Æmulous, but obedient to the grand Signior. Whereupon it was ſuddenly reſolued to take Ghian Gheray (formerly depoſed) out of the Rhodes, and to ſend the Captaine Baſſa with the whole Armado to eſtabliſh him Prince, and to diſplace the other. So that for that year the Mediterran was like to be free,and the Turkiſh Empire ingaged in ſo many troubles, that euerie thing ſeemed to worke toward their ſubuerſion. But great bodies haue ſtrong luctations,and die not with one fit,or by one blow; and ſuch was the miſerie and iniquitie of the times,that while Chriſtian princes contended for ambitious and enuious, rather than iuſt quarels; that L none of them had leiſure to help to puſh down that enemy, who tottered by his own weight; nor to vindicate the Chriſtian Honour; nor the Holy Land, oppreſſed and poſſeſſed by a Tyrant, that onely ſubſiſted by their diſſentions: and I feare, the loſſe of the opportunitie hath loſt the Grace that gaue it; and that a common repentance will requite a common ſinne and folly.

Hauing drawn our Hiſtorie for matters concerning the Temporal eſtate, and the revolutions therin, vnto a period,of our own knowledge or practiſe, it will not be impertinent nor vnprofitable, to make ſome relation of the Greek Church,and the affaires therof, which ſuffered many perturbations and aſſaults during theſe times; as if one influence had diſpoſed all things to vniuerſall trouble: but the cauſes were far differing. There are yet remaining vnder M the Patriark of Conſtantinople 111 Metropolitans and Biſhops, who liue with freedome of conſcience and Religion vnder the grand Signior, and gouerne the Chriſtian Flocke vnder their ſeuerall Iuriſdictions. Who haue their antient Churches, with ſome competent reuenue

A reuenue in their owne poſſeſſion, teaching, preaching, and adminiſtring of the holy Sacraments according to their owne Rites, without any moleſtation for matters of Religion. The preſent Patriarch is called Cyrillus, formerly gouerning the See of Alexandria, a reuerend and learned man, who hath deſired to reforme many errors, and to enlighten much of the blindeneſſe of his Church; inſenſibly preuailing, for want of Lectures, Schooles, and Books, and by the mixture of Barbariſme. His reuenue, (though very good) and that of his Biſhops, not ariſing wholly out of viſible lands and rents, but by ſecret contribution, and other duties; and the ſimplicity of their life and habit, without ſhew or pompe, giuing no occaſion formerly to the Turks, to expect any profit by vexing them, as is vſually practiſed vpon other lay Chriſtians, they liued in great peace and tranquility; vntill of late yeares the Church of Rome, hoB ping either by the pouerty of the one, and the greatneſſe of the other, to force the Greeks to a ſubmiſſion, or perhaps, enuious of their quiet, to weary them by trouble, or to ſubuert them. To this end a Greeke Colledge was by the laſt Gregory erected in Rome, to breed vp the Youth of that Nation, where they had liberty of all their owne Rites, only acknowledging the ſupremacy of the Pope, which they muſt do, or not be admitted: and that ground being layd, for point of doctrine it matters not; there is enough gained to make him that had ſworne obedience, to accept of all the reſt. By this foundation the Pope hoped to breed Proſelites enow in time to poſſeſſe all the Biſhoprickes, and to ſubdue the whole Church. For theſe Students returned admired men for their education and knowledge, and wanted not meanes to promoue their preferment; which was a great aduantage ouer the ignorant C breeding and diſcipline of the meere Greeke. But by the foreſight and wiſedome of Cyrillus this plot taking little effect, as it did irritate the Pope and Cardinals againſt his perſon, ſo it did incite them to ſeeke other more powerfull meanes of corruption, or to ruine him. And both were put in practiſe. To this end a Congregation was erected to take care of the Eaſterne Church, and to direct the practiſes vpon it; whereof a principall Cardinall was made Protector; and many Conſiſtories were held, by which way to reduce the Greeke Church to obedience, or to root out all thoſe that oppoſed it. It was reſolued to make titular Biſhops of almoſt all the Sees (eſpecially in the Iſlands) where any Greeke Biſhop had reſidence; ſo that there were many Paſtors without a flocke. But theſe Emiſſaries being diſcouered to be ſupplanters and diſturbers of the poor Church, were alſo reſiſted, and ſome caſt D into priſon; and ſome aſhamed of their empty honour, voluntarily returned. But all theſe deuiſes failing, they fell at laſt vpon the round and moſt aſſured way of force, to worke their ends by the Embaſſadors of Chriſtian princes of the Romiſh Religion reſiding at Conſtantinople; and the moſt potent, of bribery and corruption: making vſe of the impotency of the Turkiſh Miniſters, who they knew would ſell Mahomet himſelfe for gold: Flectere ſi nequeo ſuperos Acheronta mouebo. From this reſolution did all the danger and miſchiefe ſpring: and certainely the zeale of the Romiſh Church is cloathed with ſo much honour and ſolicitouſnes, that in that only it prouoketh enuy. But whether they haue in this purſuit and cauſe proceeded with the rules of Chriſtian charity, in that place, among Falſe-Beleeuers, where euery ſcandall did concern the honour of Chriſt himſelf, or not; I leaue to the judgement of E euery ingenious man. And becauſe this Part, of the quarrels betweene the Roman and Greeke Church, though acted in ſeuerell yeres, hath beene related entirely by a ſincere Pen, in a Letter directed to a noble Senator of Venice, whereby the paſſages will be more cleere and continuous, than if they had beene mingled and interrupted with other affaires; I haue rather choſen mine owne eaſe and the Readers profit, by tranſlating that Letter, to ſerue it in all at once, than by peeces and fragments. The occaſion whereof ariſing (as I am informed) from the variety of reports and Printed pamphlets, of the laſt Act concerning the baniſhment of the Ieſuits, and a rumor ſpread, that they were reſtored: the truth whereof it ſeemes that Senator did deſire to know, and therefore prouoked ſome Friends to ſatisfie him. And ſo without other prejudice, I referre the Reader to the Text it ſelfe following.

The Copy of a Letter written to a Senator of Venice; concerning the contentions betweene the Roman and Greeke Churches in Conſtantinople.

My Lord,

Your Letter hath laied vpon me a charge, that (if I were able to performe) is ſo full of enuy, and ſubject to diuers cenſures, according to the preparations of the hearers of a matter of that nature, that I would haue choſen to haue obeyed you in any other way, rather than in that of a Relator. For I perceiue by you, ſome prejudice is already gone out, and hath taken poſſeſſion of a part of the World, harder to remoue than to teach a new hereſie. But hoping that you ſeeke the ſatisfaction of your owne curioſity, and that you purpoſe not to controuert, I will not refuſe, againſt my owne reaſon, and little leiſure, to returne you aſſurance, how far you haue power ouer them and me.

IT is now ten moneths ſince this conflict between the Greeke Church, and the Ieſuits here fell out, but not the firſt time they haue been in trouble, impriſonment and oblegation, They were ſettled in Galata by the Grand Signiors Licenſe, vnder the French protection, about twenty fiue yeares ſince; in which time they had gotten a good Seat, builded much, gathered together a faire Library, and won greatly vpon the weaker Sect, and age, women and children. I ſpeake of the Greeks; for with the Romaniſts they had leaſt credit, who adhered to their antient Orders of S. Francis and Dominicke; and were affraid that this new Society would be too buſie, and caſt them into danger of their old priuiledges: for the Turks are plaine, and yet raſh, and eaſily apprehend euery innouation.

The pretence of this Colledge was, To teach children for nothing, or charity, Grammer, the Arts and Tongues. And there being no open Schoole in thoſe parts, and few bookes for want of Printing, the Greekes (who loue learning beſt, when it is beſt cheape) were content their children ſhould gleane tares in any field, to ſaue their purſes: and their wiues were won by eloquence and affability, to open their ſins to them, who had more witty penances than Greekiſh ſhrift and faſting, which did decay their beauty, and deject their countenances. But the wiſer ſort, eſpecially the Patriarch Cyrillus, and his Biſhops, diſcouered Anguem in herba; and did foreſee, That by this ſeeming benefit, the Youth of their Nation might be corrupted (Seruabit odorem teſta diu) and their owne boſomes tempted by the Daughters of Eue: And they likewiſe did feare, That vpon this foundation might be nouriſhed Proſelites to Rome, that in time would vndermine the whole Church. And therefore did as modeſtly as they could (to preuent an open diſſention) ſeeke to withdraw both, from this bait of ſeducement. Hinc illæ lachrimæ: For when the Ieſuits did diſcouer they were diſcouered, they began to practiſe that by force, which they had long deſigned in the darke. The firſt open warre brake out in February 1622; when theſe Fathers (protected by the French Embaſſador) attempted to depoſe the Patriarch, and to place another Greeke in his Chayre, who had ſecretly ſubmitted to the Pope, and promiſed to render new obedience to the See of Rome.

Whereupon Cyrillus conſulted his friends, how to auoyd their enuy. He reſolued to proceed with mildeneſſe and charity; and firſt to deale with the ſeduced Biſhop, as one of his owne Flocke: and the Sunday following hee preached and publiſhed the Counſels held againſt him, and the danger of his Church; not naming the Ieſuits, otherwiſe than by admonition, to beware of certaine fiery Organs and Inſtruments, againſt whom he ſhould be enforced to proceed with more ſeuerity, if they deſiſted not. And then being aſſiſted with foure Archbiſhops, and the Clergy preſent, he excommunicated that Greeke joyned with his enemies: hoping by this gentle Exhortation to the one, and Example on the other, to obtaine the bleſſing of Peace, recommended by Chriſt to his Church. The pretence of this quarrell

A from Rome and preſent diſdaine, was publiſhed by the French Party, to haue root, becauſe that the Patriarch kept company with Lutherans and Heretiques, and therefore muſt needs ſauour of the ſame Leauen. This modeſt courſe of the Patriarch did but exaſperate; for the Ieſuits hauing a Viſier fit for them, in Aprill following, by ſubornation of others, did accuſe Cyrillus of a practiſe to betray an Iſland in the * Arches, to the Florentines; and by the promiſe of twenty thouſand Dollers for the eſtabliſhment of the excommunicated Biſhop, they preuailed to haue the Patriarch apprehended, depoſed, and ſent priſoner to Rhodes, where he ſuffered many miſeries and outrages, and their Friend to be placed in his Seat. But the Greeke Church, though they durſt not oppoſe the preſent fury, yet they would neither acknowledge Paſtorem qui non intrauit per Portam, nor reſort to the Cathedrall, nor contribute B any mony to pay the fine due to the Grand Signior vpon remoue, vpon which the French relyed, for though they had promiſe from Rome of aid, yet was it not leuied. Whereby finding themſelues in a ſtreight, they made meanes to a ſilly Archbiſhop of Adrianople, who was rich, to take the charge; the other willingly reſigning vnto him: who accepted the offer, aduanced part of the Symony, and leuied the reſt by force of Turkiſh Commands vpon the poore Greeks; and ſo he was in appearance fully, if not Canonically ſeated. Their purpoſe was not long to ſuffer this man to continue, but only to hold the See full, vntill ſupply came from the Pope, and then to depoſe him, and place one fitted for their deſignes. By this mutation they hoped to recouer all the Greekes to the Catholique Cauſe, and Spaine. And in theſe changes the Patriarchat was robbed of moſt of the antient Manuſcripts, and other Or- C naments of the Church.

* Mare Ægeum.

In September following, Cyrillus by helpe of friends, and force of money, was reſtored to liberty, and returned to Conſtantinople. Where being arriued, all the Greekes flocked to him: Which the Archbiſhop of Adrianople obſeruing, and knowing himſelfe an Intruder, (the true Patriarch neither reſigning, nor being Canonically depriued) ſecretly and voluntarily came and ſubmitted, and offered to ſurrender the charge to him. But Cyrillus not daring to accept it, vntill meanes were made to the State, or that he were recalled by a Synod, was content the Church ſhould be vacant, to ſee what would of it ſelfe emerge. The French Embaſſador hearing of this ſudden defection from him, by the counſell of his Ieſuits, fetched their Archbiſhop into his houſe, and encouraged him to reſume his place; promiſing him D protection from the Pope, from the King his Maſter, and to ſpend forty thouſand Dollars for his ſuſtentation. And thus, partly by faire words abuſing the impotency, and partly by force compelling him, they won the weake man to yeeld: and then the French Embaſſador ſent his Interpreters and Ianizaries to re-ſeat him in the Cathedrall, and in Galata proclaimed him Patriarch, and threatened all thoſe that would not obey and acknowledge him. An inſolence full of proportion to the deſigne, to maintain an ill cauſe by worſe meanes.

But the Clergy and people knowing the vnlawfulneſſe of this intruſion, and the vndue conſecration, and foreſeeing the ruine to come, if ſo pernitious example ſhould preuaile, did ſtill adhere to their old Paſtor. Which the new better weighing in his owne retiredneſſe, than in the French Houſe, where his ambion was fomented; and fearing that if Cyrillus ſhould reco- E uer his juſt right by the ſame way he had done his liberty, ſome greater diſgrace or puniſhment might fall vpon him; without further conſulting his high Protector, in the night quitted the See, and came to his Patriarch and caſt himſelfe into his mercy, asking abſolution; and vtterly renouncing French, Spaniſh, or Romane Factions, freely reſigned. Herewith Cyrillus encouraged, by the ſtrength of money and friends was againe with the Letters of the Grand Signior reſtored, in deſpight of the Enemy, who now found himſelfe ouermatched. But this ſtrife did coſt the Greeks threeſcore thouſand Dollars, taken at Intereſt, almoſt to the deſtruction of the Church, eſpecially to haue diſcouered to the Turks a way to extort great ſums by changes, from them, who formerly were eſteemed poore Monks: which will neuer be forgotten, and will finally ruine the See. This was the effect of pretended zeale to F Religion, and a Romiſh charity.

Now all men hoped for Peace; but there brake out another ſtorme. In Ianuary following, a Coloyre was ſent from Rome, called Archemadrita, and was receiued by the French into his houſe; who brought a promiſe from the Congregation de propaganda Fide, That notwithſtanding the firſt faile for want of money, that now twenty thouſand Dollars ſhould be ready and returned thither, if they could make ſure the depoſition of Cyrillus, and place an obedient Sonne in his roome. To this end it was promiſed, that ten thouſand Dollars giuen by a widow in France to charitable vſes, ſhould by the Popes authority be conuerted. And thus new practiſes and new accuſations were aduanced; but being timely diſcouered, they were preuented: yet againe it coſt the poore Church a round ſumme of mony.

The next yeare the perſecution was calmed in outward appearance, but more ſubtile and cloſe machinations ſupplied it: for it was then reſolued in Rome, to corrupt Cyrillus, and ſo to winne him: then to diſcredit him with his friends, and to lay him open and vndo him. To this purpoſe were ſent from Rome about February 1624, two ſeuerall Agents, one called Padre Berillus, to ingage the Patriarch in a practiſe with the Coſſackes, which was treaſon: and a Ieſuited Greeke bred in the Colledge at Rome, named Cannachi Roſsi. To whom were giuen inſtructions vnder the hand and ſeale of Cardinall Bandini, to make ouerture to Cyrillus of reconciliation, with great conditionall promiſes of ſupplies and this following Commiſſion. But Sir, becauſe you will beſt judge of the ſcope of this negotiation, by the copy it ſelfe, the originall vnder the ſeale, remaining with the Engliſh Embaſſador, and from whence this hatred tooke root; I, that haue onely taken vpon me the part of a Relator, haue made it here a Parentheſis, and leaue your judgement to collect your owne ſence.

1 Hauing neither brought me Letters from the Patriarch, nor from any other Prelate, we cannot giue an anſwer other than by word of mouth, conforming to the relation you haue deliuered.

2 The Church of Rome hath alwaies deſired an vnion and peace with all other Churches, but eſpecially with thoſe of the Eaſt, (who haue heretofore ſo well merited of the Catholique Church) and not onely in antient times, but euen lately in the life of the Patriarch Hieremy, ſhe hath done what ſhe could poſſible, to aſſiſt and vnite the Greeke Church vnto her: not ſparing therein either coſt or labour: yea, to effect the ſame, ſhe hath founded, and doth yet maintaine a Colledge of young Greekes with her owne reuenue, to the end that, that noble and ingenious Nation ſhould flouriſh in godlineſſe and learning, as in former ages it hath done.

3 Concerning the propoſition of the preſent Patriarch, our Lord and Maſter the Pope (a Fauourer and Father of the Greeke Nation, as particularly your ſelfe haue knowne and ſeene) would diburſe a round ſum of mony to re-unite ſo noble a Member to the Church of Rome, and aſſiſt in particular that See, vpon which the reſt of the Eaſterne Churches doe depend. But conſidering the reports which haue been ſpread, and continually do come from Conſtantinople, of the Patriarch, we do not ſee in what manner it can poſſibly be effected.

4 *Concerning him, we are aduiſed, That he denieth the Innocation of Saints, the worſhip and veneration of Images and reliques of the Saints, the Reall preſence of Chriſt in the Euchariſt, Free-wll, the authoritie of Sacred Councels, and Traditions, the authoritie of Holy Fathers, the neceſsitie of Auricular Confeſsion, and in it, the reuealing of ſecret ſinnes: In ſtead of which he hath introduced a publike Confeſsion made to God in generall words. That he ſends young men to ſtudy in the Engliſh and Germane Academies, where this Doctrine is taught and profeſſed: that by their means he may ſpread it in the Leuant. And to this end, that he hath cauſed to be printed, and that he himſelfe hath diſperſed and giuen to ſome Biſhops, certaine Catechiſmes full of this and other like erronious Doctrine, condemned long ago, not only by the Apoſtilique See, and the Councell of Trent, but euen of his owne Predeceſſors, as he himſelfe hath teſtified in that Confeſsion of Faith which he left many yeres ſince in the hands of the Archbiſhop of Leopoli, acknowledging this and the like Doctrine for hereſie; and therefore concluding, That it was impoſſible that the Greeke Church ſhould euer vnite it ſelfe with the Proteſtants. And that in contemplation of the Hugonot Embaſſadours (with whom he doth freely conuerſe) he hath taken away the * Sinodicon, and hath laid aſide the reuerence due to the moſt holy Euchariſt.*

* It ſignifieth an Aſſembly: I take it to bee the power of Excommunication. But enquire how it is vſed by the Romiſh Church.

5 His Holineſſe doth deſire, That all theſe reports were falſe; and that he being the head of ſo noble a Nation, ſhould be ſuch a one as the preſent condition, both in matters ſpirituall and temporall of the flock vnder his Iuriſdiction doth require; that he might with a cheerfull countenance and ſafe conſcience extend his liberalitie and aid vnto him.

6 If theſe ſhal proue calumnies, and that the Patriarch doth think he can make his innocence appeare before his Holineſſe, let him iuſtifie himſelfe to the French or the Emperors Embaſſador: to whoſe relation (being perſons of great vertue and authoritie) credit and faith will be giuen: and by their meanes let him ſend to his Sanctitie the Confeſsion of his Faith, in which he doth accept the Councell of Florence, and condemne the errors of Caluin and Luther, condemned alreadie by his Predeceſſors. And the Apoſtolique See will not be wanting in all fauour and aſsiſtance, to raiſe vp the Church of Conſtantinople, and all others on it depending.

7 That his Holineſſe will not require either of him or the other Prelates of Greece, any conditions but ſuch as were concluded and eſtabliſhed in the ſacred Florentine Councell; ſo that (according as the Grecian Church hath alway done) hee condemne and anathematiſe the blaſphemie of the Septentrionall Heretiques; to ſay, of Caluiniſts, Lutherans, and ſuch like.

Rome, the xxj. of February, 1625.

Cardinall Bandini.

The place of his Seale.

This Channachi Roſsi arriuing with his Commiſsion at Conſtantinople, became an vndertaker of his owne accord, to merit of the Church of Rome, to conuert the Patriarch: who was amaſed at the boldneſſe, and feared both waies; either to anſwer, and ſo to be ingaged in a penwarre; or to be ſilent, and condemned as ſtanding mute. But at laſt hee reſolued, that ſeeing the Cardinall vouchſafed not to write directly to him, to take no notice; but to ſee how patience would deliuer him out of this ſnare. But the Ieſuits content with no temper, but preſent ſubſcription, ſtirred vp ſome Biſhops now made of their faction, anew to depoſe him; and there was offered twenty thouſand Dollars to eſtabliſh one of them. This tempeſt forced Cyrillus to retyre and hide, vntill his Friends had reuealed to the State the myſterie of this forked practiſe, and opened the treacherie of both of theſe Miniſters, imploied only to introduce a change aduantagious to the Pope, and dangerous to the Grand Signior. Yet ſuch is the cuſtome of this Court, that his peace was againe bought at the expence of ten thouſand Dollars.

Once more the Patriarch expected peace and ſecuritie; but the Congregation at Rome fell vpon a new counſell: Firſt, better to fortifie themſelues before they attempted their enemies. And to this end, vpon diuers pretences, it was reſolued to ſend to Conſtantinople, an

Anti-

A Anti-Patriarch from the Pope, qualified with abſolute authority, but vnder the title of Suf- fraganeo Apoſtolico, and with him a Treaſurer for the Church (for Saint Peter durſt not truſt the French Embaſſador with money) yet with theſe to ioyne him, for his zeale and countenance, and the Ieſuits for their Counſell. To this Triumuirate was giuen all power to plant, diſplant, to ſow, and root out, and finally to do all things that might aduance the Romane cauſe. For their better ſtrength & abetting, it was alſo decreed to create new Romiſh Biſhops in Smyrna, Naxia, and many Iſlands (a ſhift learned at Trent) to oppoſe the Greeks, and by aduantage of learning to ſupplant them. Of this miſſion there was great expectation.

About December, 1626, the Suffraganeo arriued at Naxia, whither the French embaſſador ſent the Romane Biſhop of that place his Chaplein, and two Ieſuits to receiue him: who con-B ducted him as far as Scio, where he was acccepted with great Ceremonie. But beginning his office too roughly and too ſoon (for he ſhould not haue declared himſelfe vntill he had crept to Conſtantinople vnder the French wings, and had bin ſetled by degrees) many took offence at this noueltie. The Lay-men feared ſome prejudice in their right of Patronage ouer the Churches: the wiſeſt foreſaw the danger of Chriſtian libertie, and that their practiſes in this innouation would inuolue all others into a ſuſpition of ſome conſpiracie: and if any ſcandall ſhould from hence ariſe, the Turks would not diſtinguiſh betweene the guilty and the innocent, beeing in one Liuerie by the name of Frankes. Yea, the Friers could not endure a power ſo neere aboue them, but refuſed him lodging in their Conuents. The Greeke Clergy began euidently to diſcouer the ſubuerſion of their authority, and antient Faith. Only the Ieſu-C its triumphed, and thought the prize now their owne. But deſperation forced ſome, and charity others to defend their poſſeſſions. Thus encouraged by ſtrong friends to oppoſe this fatall blow, all the plot was opened to the Vizier, and their deſign quietly and without ſcandal fruſtrated. The Suffraganeo retired without noiſe; their new Biſhops made by ſubreptitious Licences were impriſoned, their Letters of Priuiledge taken from them, to the extreme anguiſh and diſgrace of their Protector. This laſt repulſe made them furious; but Infeſtis animis deerat occaſio.

In Iune, 1627, here arriued vpon an Engliſh ſhip one Nicodemo Mataxa, a Coloyre borne in Cephalonia: he brought with him the Greek ſtamp made at his expence, and diuers bookes printed in London, as he pretended, for the benefit of his Nation, drowned almoſt in inuinci-D ble ignorance, eſpecially for want of means to learn and ſtudy. As ſoon as he came aſhore, and had ſpoken with the Patriarch, and made knowne his zeale to that Church, hee was from him by the Archbiſhop of Corinth recommended to the Engliſh Embaſſador, to aſſiſt this pious intention, to paſſe theſe heauy commodities through the Cuſtome-houſe without ſuſpition.
In which though he foreſaw ſome trouble, yet he willingly vndertook the protection. But firſt conſulting with Cyrillus of Conſtantinople, and Gelaſius Patriarch of Alexandria, (then for his priuate affairs at the Port) and with the Reſident of the vnited Prouinces, he was of opinion, That in a matter of that nature, which was in it ſelfe honeſt and iuſtifiable, it was requiſite to proceed openly, and with leaue: which hauing obtained of the Vizier, tooke vp, and brought both ſtampe and Bookes to his houſe. Now ſuppoſing all the difficultie had been ouercome, E and neuer ſuſpecting any ſcandall from Chriſtians, for that which hee thought did not, nor ought not to offend them, hee gaue countenance and helpe to Mataxa to put his induſtry in order.

The Patriarch deſired the Stamp might worke in the Engliſh Houſe; but the Embaſſador for priuate reſpects would not conſent, but offered to take a Houſe, and to giue both it and them his protection. Which he did, not far from his owne, and neerer to the French Embaſſadors: who pretending the vnion of the two Churches, there appeared no feare of him, that he ſhould enuy a Chriſtian worke, or do any act that might ſeparate them for euer. As ſoone as Mataxa was ſetled, and his print in order, the French and the Ieſuits tooke offence at it, as ſet vp to publiſh Bookes againſt the Church of Rome, or at leaſt to take away their trade of tea-F ching, and ſeducing children by his printing of catechiſms, Magna eſt Diana Epheſiorum. Firſt, they attempted to draw him into their gouernment, inuiting him to their Monaſterie; intimating, That adhering to them would take off ſome ill ſuſpition raiſed on him for hauing ſtudied in England. When he could not be woon by flatteries, they reported him to be an Heretique and a Lutheran, becauſe he took ſanctuarie from the Engliſh. Againſt the ſtamp they excepted

excepted, at the Armes of the King of Great Britain, which they ſaid was ſcandalous, and being in the Frontiſpeece of euery Booke, was malum augurium; and did foreſhew, that within they muſt ſauor of hereſie: for, What could be expected from an hereticall Fountain, or from the Man that conuerſed with Heretiques. G

These obloquies little moued the Engliſh Embaſſador, who knew their malice proceeded Meleſius, Pat. Alex. from the matter of one Author that wrote againſt the Supremacie. But the rage extended ſo far, that it was reuealed to Mataxa, That he ſhould be murthered in his bed, or in the ſtreet, as he paſſed in the night from the Engliſh to his owne houſe. Whereupon at his great inſtance the Embaſſador was content for his perſon to giue him lodging. So in the day he continued his worke, and at euening retyred vnder protection.

As yet they found no occaſion to worke their purpoſe: but the Patriarch ſent a little Treatiſe to the Preſſe, made by himſelf (being an expoſition of the Faith, and Tenets of the Greek church, without any mention of controuerſie, or cenſuring the opinions of others; principally to ſatiſfie the world in thoſe calumnies ſpred, That he had introduced new Doctrines, to the ſcandall of his own Flocke) which he had reſolued to dedicate to the King of England; but now hauing opportunitie to print at home, prepared an Epiſtle fit for it. This prouoked the Ieſuites, who not able to endure any application of the Eaſt Church to that Monarch, could no longer containe themſelues, but conſpired with their Embaſſadors to ouerthrow both the Author, Worke, and Workman: and hauing gotten another Booke written by the Patriarch, printed in England, and brought by Mataxa againſt the Iews, they found ſome paſſages which did modeſtly condemne the opinions of the Turks. When they had this ſuppoſed aduantage, they practiſed with a Buffone, but a crafty knaue, who had credit with the Vizier, and had bin Vayuod of Galata, to inform him, That this Mataxa was a Captain ſent hither to raiſe ſedition, and that vnder the colour of printing Bookes for children, hee diſperſed others againſt the Alcaron; That they were brought from England ſecretly, and that the Engliſh Embaſſador protected him and his deſignes: That theſe Bookes were written by the Patriarch, to ſtir the Greeks, and to draw them into defection; and many of them ſent to the Coſſacks, to prouoke them to vnite vpon the occaſion of the Grand Signiors expedition into Aſia, that was then rumored. H I

Theſe accuſations were capitall, as they concerned Cyrillus and Mataxa; and ſufficient to impaire the credit of the Engliſh Embaſſador, if not to ruine him in the affairs for which he did reſide. K

The Vizier without further conſideration reſolued to aſſault the houſe of Mataxa, and ſurpriſe him in the act of Sin, of printing againſt their Law; and gaue order to a Captaine and companie of Ianizaries to execute it. Which was out of courſe, to ſet at liberty vnruly ſoldiers, that ſeldome containe themſelues within their Order, or can be appeaſed without booty. The exploit ſhould haue bin done on Friday the fourth of Ianuarie: but the French Embaſſador hearing the Engliſh had inuited the Patriarch, & Venetian Baylo, to ſome entertainment on the day of Epiphanie, he ſtayd it two daies, as he ſaid, to make ſauce to their Feaſt. On that day at high noone, a hundred and fifty Ianizaries armed beſet Mataxa's houſe, and guarded all the paſſages to the Engliſh: all was full of fears and rumor, and no man knew the cauſe. In this tumult, the Engliſh Embaſſadors Secretarie and Mataxa returning from Church at Galata, paſſed by; and ſome of the Coloyres ſeruants that were apprehended, ſhewed their Maſter, to free themſelues: but he being in a hat, and the Secretarie anſwering he was one of his Lords Followers, he eſcaped ſafely, and got into the Engliſh houſe. The Captaine miſſing him the Principall, bound all his ſeruants, brake open his cheſts, and carried all away, ſtamp, books, papers, plate, mony, cloths, and whatſoeuer was portable, as the goods of a traitor, to the value of  Interpreter.* ſeuen thouſand Dollars. And returning thus full, a French * Drogaman told them, That the Offendor was fled to the Engliſh Embaſſador: but the Turk, that had more charity, anſwered, he had no order to follow him thither. L

Now the Engliſh Embaſſador thought himſelfe intereſſed; yet that day not to ſeeme to bee moued, made as merry as ſuch rumours would beare; That hee had practiſed againſt the State; others, That the Stampe was to counterfeit the Grand Signiors Letters; others, To make falſe money; and other ſuch as Ignorance and Accuſation beget among the Multitude. M

The

A The next day the books were examined by two Greek Renegado's, and the Folio by the Ieſuits noted where the blaſphemy ſhould be: the place was interpreted before the Vizier and ſome * Mulla's, but there was nothing found that by law could touch the life of the author or printer; yet the Patriark was conuented, and many crimes obiected to him without proof or probabilitie.

* Churchmen and Lawyers.

There yet reſted ſome diffidence in the Vizier, at the report, That Mataxa was a man of war, and held correſpondence with the Coſſacks, and that he ſhould liue vnder the Engliſh protection; which was nouriſhed by ſhewing the Armes of England on the frontiſ-piece of that book. But when the Mufti had giuen ſentence, That euery doctrine againſt their opinions was not blaſphemy, nor criminal; and that the grand Signior giuing leaue to Chriſtians to B teach their own law, and to preach matters contrary to Mahometiſm, it could not be thought but it was daily don in their Churches, for which they were not puniſhable; ſo they could not be culpable of treaſon for writing the ſame, ſo long as they did not ſcandal their Law, but only oppoſe it. The main obiection being thus fallen, it was more eaſie to refell the acceſſaries grounded vpon it.

The third day the Engliſh Embaſſadour ſhewed himſelfe openly, and went to the Vizier, and profeſſed, That he had receiued that Mataxa into his houſe, to keepe him from the fury; but that he ſhould be ready to maintain his innocencie. He put him in mind, That this buſineſſe and man accuſed he himſelfe knew, that hee was a Gentleman of Coloyre, a ſubiect of the Senat, and preſented vnto him by the Venice Baylo; and that he had giuen leaue to land C and vſe the ſtamp, and that nothing was done without his communication and conſent: That therefore he much admired that he would be ſo raſh to ſuſpect his friends, and ſo ſcandalouſly to aſſault their houſes, to ſpoile their goods at the inſtigation of thoſe whom hee had cauſe to know for enemies; and to be ſo far tranſported at the winde of an occaſion, without acquainting him, to ſend ſouldiors that might haue done miſchiefe to bee too late repented.

When the Viſier had called to minde the man, and all circumſtances, and remembred whom the matter concerned (the Engliſh Embaſſador, with whom he had confidence) hee was aſhamed of his precipitation, and proteſted he had no doubt of him, nor purpoſe to affront him: That hee wondered at the impudence of thoſe that had ſo groſſely abuſed him; and D concluded with this profeſſion (as the Engliſh Embaſſador for his credit did publiſh) That if againſt his will he had done him wrong, when he ſhould ſee all the goods of Mataxa reſtored, their honour repaired, and thoſe that had procured this ſcandall, fallen into the ſnare they had made for others, and exemplarily puniſhed, then hee deſired to be acquitted of iniuſtice, and to be eſteemed ſtill his true friend. By this office the Patriarch was wholly cleared, and reſtored to the good opinion of the Vizier, and afterward of the Mufti; to whom the Engliſh went immediatly, to inſtruct him of the malice of the one part, and innocencie of the other.

Within few daies, the Vizier ſent home to the Embaſſadors houſe all the ſtamp and print, (except ſome few letters loſt in the tumult) and all the books and papers that were ſeiſed, in E publique ſatisfaction, attended with Officers and ſouldiers: in which he ſhewed ſo much reſpect and care to recouer euery particular, that there was not much miſſing of any value. Amongſt rhoſe books, there was printed Biſhop Iewels Apologie tranſlated into Greeke, a Catechiſme and Confeſſion of the Patriarch, and ſome new Treatiſes at the Preſſe; but one, and one only Iewel was miſſed, and can neuer be recouered: There was preſented to the Engliſh Embaſſador a Manuſcript that had with great veneration and care bin preſerued in the library of a Biſhop, and was averred and beleeued the only copy in the world, of the Lectures and controuerſies againſt the Biſhop and Church of Rome; read cathedrally by the moſt famous and learned Photius Patriarch of Conſtantinople. This booke the Embaſſador highly eſteeming as the raritie of the Eaſt, had deliuered to Mataxa, to be tranſcribed by his Deacons F that attended the correction of the print; that hauing double copies, ſo great a riches might not periſh in one bottom. But this too much care to ſaue it, loſt it: for beeing halfe finiſhed, and in the aſſault of the Ianizaries amongſt other ſurpriſed, neither the original nor any leafe could euer be recouered. Such was the diligence of the ſetters and ouerſeers of this conſpiracie. The Embaſſador mooued the Viſier, who vſed all his power: the Patriarch publiſhed G an Excommunication for many moneths, if perchance any Greek had bought it of the ſouldiers, to return it: but all in vain. Wherby it was reaſonably concluded, That this book was a principal envy of the Ieſuits, who feared the publication; and that their miniſters beeing Spies and in part Actors of the aſſault, had ſo eſpeciall an eye vpon it, that it fel into their vnredeemable power, and ſo by them either ſent to Purgatorie or the Vatican.

The next day after the fury, Cannachi Roßi the Agent of Cardinall Bandini, went to the Patriarch to braue him in aduerſitie: who mildly asking him, How long they would tempt his patience by wicked conſpiracies? and, What had driuen them to this extremitie to ſeek his life? he replied, That they were ſcandaliſed at him for two things; for fauouring Mataxa, and ſuffering him to preach, being an heretike, and liuing in the houſe of an heretique. Secondly, H That he had begun to print a book ful of hereſies, dedicated to the King of England the head of Heretiques. But if he would retract the one and renounce the other, the French Embaſſador ſhould procure his accommodation.

With the next Poſt after this trouble, there came from Rome a copy of a Conſiſtory held in the houſe of Cardinal Bandini, entituled for Conſtantinople; wherin this practiſe againſt the Patriark was debated and reſolued: the cauſe grounded vpon his conuerſation with Calviniſts, and ſending of ſtudents to be brought vp in their Schooles; that therfore he ſhould be accuſed of contriuing an inſurrection againſt the Ottoman empire. And the execution of this plot commended to the Embaſſadors of the Potentates reſiding in this Court, fauorers of the Catholique cauſe. Which Councel being compared with the laſt practiſe, it did euidently I appear, that one was dependant on the other. Which the Patriarch wel conſidering, and finding that he had no more ſafety in patience, reſolued to vſe his friends, to ſend them away that would not let him liue in peace. And the Engliſh Embaſſador taking deep offence at the inſolence of Cannachi Roßi, vſed to the name of his king; it is thought that they, together with the help of a good friend no leſſe powerful than either of them, vnited to baniſh the Ieſuites; and to ſhew their Protector, that they had no leſſe power to offend, becauſe they had leſſe malice and deſire to do it.

For the way they wrought (to omit other obſeruable circumſtances) it is true, the Engliſh Embaſſador was angry, and declared, and had good credit, and was ſeen often abroad: but hee was not alone, for the Patriark (that is a wiſe man) knew he ſtriued not now for victory, but for K life. The Ieſuits guilty of deſeruing a iuſt reuenge, retyred all to the French Embaſſador his houſe, where they lay hid about fourteen daies: but in that time hearing no noiſe, and hoping that all was ſecure, and that the Patriark and Engliſh Embaſſador trauelled onely in their defence, and to recouer their loſſes, they returned to their houſe triumphant; when ſuddenly we heard that a meſſenger came to them, to let them know that ſome Greeke women were come to make confeſſion, and ſtayed for them in their garden. To whom two of them came downe, and were preſently areſted by the Viziers officers, who then entred their lodgings and apprehended another. This was done without any noiſe or ſcandall, and the actors had ſuch care, That their Church was ſealed, all their altars and plate ſaued, and whatſoeuer appertained to them, inviolated: only their perſons and Library, per Legem Talionis, were caried to the Viſiers L houſe, where they were kept in irons about a moneth, and their bookes likewiſe viſited; in which were found much more aduantage to haue drawne them within compaſſe of the Turkiſh law, than their diſcouerie on the Patriark. And the ſame inſtant Cannachi Roßi was alſo taken and his papers in his lodging, and caried to bear them ſad company. The French Embaſſador deſired audience, but could not obtain it: he viſited euery great mans port, eſpecially the Mufti, where he had no other acceptance, than admonition to carry himſelf with more temper, and to meddle with the buſines for which he was imploied. Hee vſed all meanes, but could no where preuail for relief: he threatned a breach of amitie, and to ſurrender the Capitulations, and interdicted the Traffique; but the Turkes were prouided with anſwers, That they would inform his maſter the French King, and giue him ſatisfaction. In concluſion, the M Ieſuites weary, and in feare of death (for there was crime enough) the Engliſh Embaſſador, whom they ſuppoſed their Enemy, to auoid ſcandall and the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, interpoſed for them, and obtained their liues; and after many Conſultations, it was agreed to baniſh

A baniſh their Order out of all the grand Signiors dominions, to deliuer back their books; and this grace at the interceſſion of him, of whom they had not merited that courteſie. That it might clearly appear there was no purpoſe of robbery, nor to take the goods that were innocent, and in the French Kings protection. In proſecution of which Councel there were commands ſent to Scio, Smyrna, Aleppo, and Cyprus, to diſcharge thoſe places from the practiſe of this fraternitie; who had a deſign to get the Sepulchre at Ieruſalem into their hands, and to ſupplant the Franciſcans (which controuerſie is wel known at Rome, and would make a long Section in this narration:) and finally they were put into a Barque, with good gard, in their irons, and ſent to Scio; with order to ſhip them and their fellowes vpon the next veſſell that went for Chriſtendome, and in the mean time to keep them priſoners. When they came to B the caſtles on the Helleſpont, the French Embaſſadour had procured, that the Caſtellane would not ſuffer them to paſſe, for want of the Captain Baſſa's Letter; and ſo they were returned to Conſtantinople, but ſtill kept in their Gaol: and ſuddenly it was rumored, they were revoked, and ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed. But when the Vizier heard his authoritie was contemned, and this trick put vpon him, he was ſo much inraged, that again their liues were in danger. But the preſent fury appeaſed euen by their ſuppoſed Enemie, they were returned, baniſhed firſt to Scio, and ſo ſhipt for Italy. I muſt confeſſe that I haue not obſerued any one ſorry but the French Embaſſador, ſcarce his houſhold; all other Catholiques, eſpecially the Orders of Friers, and the Franciſcans of Ieruſalem, were glad they were eaſed of their Dominion, and the fears of their deſignes. And I haue heard it reported, That themſelues did ingeniouſly confeſſe an obligation to the Engliſh Embaſſadour; and in their relations to Rome C laid all the fault vpon the precipitation of their Protector.

There was another command ſent to Smyrna, to apprehend a couple that had crept in vnder the French Conſuls protection: who at firſt hid themſelues; but being aduiſed to giue place, and a means opened to them to eſcape, fled ſecretly; there beeing no other purpoſe in their perſecutors, but to be rid of ſuch negotiating fathers.

And thus S^{r} you haue a true relation of what I haue obſerued, & for your ſatisfaction collected of thoſe that had better means to know particulars than I, who am buſie enough if I do myne own buſineſſe. There reſts only to tell you, That during the Engliſh Embaſſadors ſtay (which was about fiue months after) the French ſate down and ſtirred not. But conſidering D that his credit in France depended much from Rome, and from an opinion of his zeale to the Catholique cauſe, and his power to ſupport it; hauing made the Colledge of Cardinals beleeue that he would ſubdue the Greek Church (wherein wiſe men thought hee did diſſeruice both to the Cauſe and his Maſter: for the ready way to vndoe the Catholiques, was to innovate any thing in their antient maner of life, gouernment, and priuiledges, which they enjoyed with their conſciences freely) he thought himſelfe vtterly loſt, if he did not do ſomewhat to recouer his reputation there, by a ſeeming reſtitution of the Ieſuites. Vpon which deliberation, hauing yet two of them refuged to his houſe, and hid there a month after the departure of the Engliſh embaſſador; he petitioned the grand Signior, That his Chapleins might haue leaue to bury his Dead, and do other offices of their Function. Which being granted, it was E publiſhed, That he had reſtored the Ieſuites.

And becauſe you are ſo curious to know all, and in what eſtate that reſtitution now ſtands, I conclude with the true copy of the command obtained, and leaue it to your iudgment, whether the breach be made vp ſo whole as is ſuppoſed. For euery plaiſter is not a ſound cure.

The Grand Signiors Command, directed to Aſſan Baſſa Captaine of the Sea; and to the Caddee of Galata.

AT the ſight of this our high and Imperial Signature, you ſhal take notice, That the French Embaſſador by an * Arz giuen to our happy Port; hath made vs to vnderſtand, That (their Law and Religion being not like to that of other Chriſtians which liue in our wel gouerned Empire) they with our Imperiall Licence did procure to come from the kingdome of France certain Religious men called Ieſuites, who for the ſpace of twenty fiue years haue had their abode in the Church of Saint Benet appointed to them in Galata; and lately by ſiniſter information made againſt them, were ſent away to their owne countrey: from which time the ſaid Church being ſhut vp, and hauing no other Religious who could aſſiſt in the neceſſary Offices of men ready to die, or dead; haue therfore petitioned for our noble Command. To which end (excepting alway the aboue named * Religious, ſent away, and others of other Nations) that he may place in the ſaid Church ſuch perſons of Religious French, and French Religion, which are found at this preſent here, elect, and appointed by him, without moleſtation or injury to be done vnto them by any whomſoeuer. Therefore in conformitie to his requeſt, this my Command is obtained; and I doe command, That at the ſight of this my Imperiall Order it be obeyed and executed: That becauſe, as is before pretended, the French haue not thoſe * Religious who can performe the Functions neceſſary for the Dead (excepting alway thoſe Religious already baniſhed, and all others comming from the countries of our Enemies) that they may put into the ſaid Church ſuch perſons for Religious men, as are naturall Frenchmen, and of their owne Nation, which at preſent are found in Galata, and that ſhall by them bee appointed: and that ſo long as they commit no faults in their charge, and that they practiſe nothing contrary to our Imperiall will, that they be of no man moleſted.

* Petition.

* In the original it ſignifies an Order.

* or Orders.

Vpon the obtaining of this Command, the two Ieſuits in the French houſe were ſolemnly and with great oſtentation caried to S. Benetto's Church, and placed there as the Embaſſadors Chapleins; and an opinion ſpread, of an abſolute re-eſtabliſhment of their Order, and ſo it was divulged in Rome. But it was not ſuppoſed by the French, that this Copy ſhould bee ſeene by any but himſelfe; and then the Act would haue appeared as truth. But ſome Criticall and captious men haue made many Quare's vpon this matter: Firſt they haue aſked, What then is the French Religion, if it differ from all other Chriſtians in the Grand Signiors Dominions; when in Galata there were fiue Romiſh Churches and Monaſteries, with French Capuchins, Dominicans, Franciſcans, and others? Secondly they haue aſked, What Ceremonies are neceſſarie to a Frenchman, in danger of death, or after it, that none of theſe Orders can aſſiſt or performe? Again they aſke, Who are reſtored by this priuiledge, if the Religioſi ſupra nominati, and Strangers are excepted? What is meant by French Religion, and the ſame Religion? To which it is anſwered firſt, That this new French Religion is onely Ieſuitical, not approued by the moſt Chriſtian King, improoued by the Sorbons, and reproued by all the louers of the libertie of the Gallican Church. To the ſecond, That they dying muſt be abſolued only by a Ieſuite, or buried in his habit, or ſhut out of Paradice. Again they anſwer, They finde none reſtored but a new French Religion, and ſuch men as were perſonally then in Galata; that is, two Chapleins only to aſſiſt in caſe of death, but no Order of Ieſuits. And they finally conclude, That the French Embaſſador hath more diſhonoured his nation, to reſtraine their Religion to the Ieſuites; and the whole Clergy, to renounce all other Orders;

Orders, that he hath done benefit to the Ieſuites, except he had need of ſome colour in ſtead of truth.

Sir, I will not comment at all; to obey you I haue gon thus far extra provinciam meam*: And now I return home to my ſelfe, to aſſure you that I haue been, and will ſo die,*

Your true, &c.

Galata jx. Novembr. 1628.

This Trage-Comedie being ended, and a ſeeming peace returning with the Spring; whilſt the new Vizier marched towards Babylon, to ſettle the affaires of thoſe parts, Sir Thomas Rowe, then his Maieſties Embaſſador reſident at the Port, procured his leaue to return home, and was recalled. By whom the grand Signior writ this inſuing Letter to his Maieſtie of great Britain.

The grand Signiors Letter to his Maieſtie of Great Britaine.

To the moſt glorious amongſt the greateſt Maieſties of the Princes of Jeſus, moſt reverenced amongſt the people of the Meſſiah, ſole Director of the important affaires of the Nazaren Nation; Lord of the limits of Honour and Power; and Patron of Grace and Authoritie, CHARLES, King of Great Britain and Ireland: To whoſe laſt dayes we wiſh all compleat and true happineſſe.

Be it known vnto your Maieſty at the ſight of this Letter, That your Embaſſador Sir Thomas Rowe, reſpected and beloued amongſt Chriſtians, to whom we wiſh a happy end; (being heretofore ſent to reſide as your Embaſſador at our happy Port, to be watchfull ouer all offices of good correſpondence between vs, and that all requiſit terms of honor ſhould be fulfilled; and to renew the Mantle of our affection) hath from his firſt arriuall here, vntill this preſent, moſt perfectly attended vpon the charge impoſed vpon him, and in all his actions proceeded with extraordinary diligence and induſtry, for the high honour and great fame of your Maieſty his Soueraign. And now your Maieſty hauing ſent in his place one of the chieſe of your moſt eſteemed, Sir Peter Wyche, to reſide at our Imperiall Port, and that the ſaid Sir Thomas Rowe hath taken reſolution to return to your Maieſty with our Imperiall conſent: We ſend them vnto you with theſe our Imperiall Letters; hoping in the moſt high God, that when he is ſafely arriued with you, out of your abundant and innate clemencie, and your ſingular and ſincere goodneſſe, in reſpect of his good and faithfull ſeruice, that you will ſee him honored and rewarded. And to the end that the great affection and loue which we nouriſh to your Maieſtie, may be daily encreaſed, we deſire you readily to imploy your benigne care in the keeping and obſeruing of this our Imperiall Capitulations, with euery Article therein contained; as we on our part will likewiſe do in all things that are meet to bee done concerning their perfect obſeruation: wherof you ſhall find a good and clear teſtimony by the future effects.

Giuen at Conſtantinople, 1628.

Though impertinent to the Hiſtory of Turky, yet a conflict haping betweene the ſhip G which tranſported Sir Thomas Rowe to Italy (returning from Conſtantinople) & the gallies of Malta; I haue thought it would not be an vngrateful concluſion, to obſerue and record the mighty deliuerance of thoſe whom God is pleaſed to keep; by communicating the copy of a relation made of that fight.

On the eleuenth of Auguſt, about ten of the Clocke in the forenoone, the Sampſon beeing becalmed before Malta, the ſea as ſmooth as glaſſe, not a breath of winde, wee diſcouered foure Gallies to rowe from the Towne. They came vp all abreſt, right with the ſtarre-boord quarter of our ſhip; which warned vs to fit our ſailes and our ſelues to fight, not knowing their purpoſe. When they came neere, the Admirall Galley, without ſending boat, or ſpeaking with vs, made a ſhot, which fell ſhort; then rowing neerer, made another which did almoſt reach vs. H And comming ſtill on, the Vice-Admiral gaue a third, all demy-Cannon, that flew ouer vs between our maſts. Theſe we ſuppoſed they made to try the length of their ordnance, and to lie there for battery; for they ſtopped, and piked halfe their oares. Whereupon wee ſent them a Culverin ſhot, that grazed vnder the Admiralls ſtarre-boord bow; and ſo we began a ſharpe fight betweene twelue and one. The Gallies were full of Cavagliero's and ſouldiers as they could ſtand: They lay on that quarter about three houres, changing ſhot with vs, often hitting one the other. Then Captaine William Rainsborow (who behaued himſelfe with braue courage and temper) finding a breath of winde to giue the ſhip motion; conſidering that he was a great marke on the broad ſide, and the Gallies very narrow, keeping their prowes ſharpe toward him, and that he could beare little vpon them, trimmed his ſailes I before the winde, and brought them to a Sterne fight, where they continued their batterie two houres more; and the Sampſon could then beare vpon them two whole Culverin in her Sterne-Chaſe, and two tranſom Culverins in the Gunne-roome, and two Sakers in the great Cabbin; and by yawing of either ſide both her quarters, and ſome pieces forward on: This gauled them, and they found it hot. Their manner of fight was, when they were all laden, they rowed vp, and brought all the maſts of our Ship together, and then gaue all their guns; hauing fired, they fell aſterne; and this in order, Alternis vicibus: but yet we reached them. The Admirall of the Gallies gaue eight Pieces at once, ſo that ſhe appeared all fire: one demy-Cannon of twenty fiue pound bullet, two demy-Culverin, fiue Saker and Minion. All the reſt were alike armed, and they plyed their Ordnance very hard, and often dangerouſly. K Being aſterne at firſt, they ſhot at the maſts and yards of our ſhip, and maimed them almoſt all in a line; hoping to ſee ſome fall, and then they had layne by vs. But it was ſo calme that the maſts ſtrained not, though they were almoſt ſpoyled. The Gallies kept a man on the end of their after-moſt Oare, to obſerue where their ſhot fel; and ſent boats often off, of which one returned well waſhed. About fiue a clocke they pauſed, and the Admirall ſent to his fleet; whereupon they tooke a reſolution, either to boord, diſmay, or ſinke vs; and came vp on our larboord quarter all abreſt, within piſtoll ſhot, and their ſwords drawne, and Trumpets ſounding; bidding vs Amaine for Malta. The Captaine cauſed one from the poope to waſt them aboord, and anſwered a point of Warre. Then began an hot fight, and too hot for them; for the Sampſon forbare, and gaue them not a ſhot vntil they were very neer, L and almoſt vnder vs, and then poured in two Culverin, and two demy-Culverin, and one Saker with a round ſhot and a caſe, that raked them fore and aft: and they hauing giuen vs all their Gunnes together, began to fall againe aſterne. But wee tacked and ſent them a broad ſide at parting; and ſo they lay and renewed their Sterne batterie vntill Sunne-ſet. What blowes we receiued is in a note following: What harme the Enemie receiued we knew not; only this we ſaw, the Admirals foremaſt was ſhot by boord, his poop caried away into the ſea, one culverin round ſhot ond caſe that fel in the bow, and went out in the quarter thorow the banks of Rowers; and many other that raked them through. The Admiral lay athwart a good ſpace to men ſomwhat, & let men down her ſides in baskets; and neuer came more vp: for that ſhot that brake out her poup, made them all at once take in their flags; which being an vnuſuall thing, M we conjectured that their Generall was ſlaine. And ſo they left vs, and hoyſing their ſailes, and rowing, made all haſte into their port, in ſight whereof they fought. The laſt ſhot they made came into the gun roome of the Sampſon, the force being ſpent, yet hurt three men:

A men: and ſhe hauing a Culverin laden, ſent it to take leaue of them; which raked the Admirall. When they came vp with vs, they did not expect ſuch bullets, but hoped to batter vs to the water out of our ſhot. They left vs at halfe houre paſt ſix a clocke, ſo that the fight laſted ſeuen houres. The Gallies gaue the Sampſon 400 ſhot, and hit her in the hull, maſts, yards, or rigging, with more than a hundred and twenty; and we ſhot fifty ſix whole Culverin, & ſpent in all aboue ten barrels of pouder. Neuer Gallies had ſo much aduantage of a time, nor did ſo brauely, but they were at their own dores. By Gods grace we had but one man a paſſenger ſlain, four hurt, and ſome bruiſed; but our ſhip terribly battered, her maſts, yards, ſailes, and ropes all torn. That night continued with little winde, and the ſea ſmooth, and wee plugged vp our wounds the beſt we could. The next day we were inforced to ſtand out of the way to B Southward of the Iſland Lampadoſa, when we found our danger; and there we lay fiue daies without ſail, to fiſh our maſts and yards, and mend our ſailes, and to make firme our breaches by and vnder water. Which we could not haue don if it had not continued calme; for thoſe demy-cannon bullets of twenty fiue pounds made too great holes, and ſplit all plankes and timbers; and the Carpenter was forced to hang like a Tortoiſe vpon the water, and driue many nailes vnder the ſending of the ſea, waſhing him ouer continually; eight ſhot either with, or within three fingers of the water. So if that night or the next day there had bin any ſea, we had neuer made this Relation, for the pumpes of our ſhip were as well exerciſed as the men. But God helped vs.

A Note

A Note of the ſhot and dammage receiued by the Sampſon in fight.

In the Rigging:

Four main ſhrouds cut by ſeuerall ſhot.
Main Runner. Main Tye.
Main top-Maſt-ſtay. Main top-gallant Halliers.
Main top-gallant braces.
Three Main top-gallant ſhrouds.
Main tack. Main top-ſail Sheats.
Main Buntlines. Fore back ſtay.
One fore ſhroud.
The chain that ſlung the main yards cut all to pieces.
Three parrels of the main yard.

Shot in the Sailes.

Miſen top ſail two ſhot. Miſen one.
Main ſail in the Brailes fourteen. Main top ſail thirteen.
Fore ſail nine. Fore top ſail fiue.

In the Maſts and Yards, Demy-cannon of twenty fiue pound weight.

The main Maſt ſhot through half way between the deck and head.
The main Yard cloſe by the parrels.
The Fore Maſt half way between the deck and head.

Demy Culverin.

The Spritſail yard through by the ſlings, and ſpoiled.

Dangerous ſhot through the Hull; being all Demy-cannon of twenty fiue pound the bullet: beſides many Demy-Culverin, Saker, and Minion, that did not or not much damage vs.

Demy Cannon.

Three in the Stern cloſe by the water, through the bread room and bread, into ſacks of wooll.
One in the Stern and the gunne room, vnder the tranſome port, hurt three men.
One through the Cuddy.
Two through the great Cabbin killed a Parrat.
One grazed vpon the ſteeredge, and caried away the Bend.
Two by the maine Maſt: one through the Cabbins killed a Iew a paſſenger: the other brake the larboord ruſter, and three timber heads.
One through the forecaſtle into the furnace, hurt two men.

A One ouer the fore-caſtle killed two ſheep, and caried away a timber head.

On the ſtar-boord ſide nine; whereof one in the quarter, and three forward on by the edge of the water. Fiue between decks, among our men and ordnance.

On the Larboord ſide four all below the deck; wherof two between wind and water, the other two not much aboue: and one between Decks, that ſplit the bits.

One ſhot that crackt the ſheat anchor at the flouk.

One that ſtaued the Ladder in the chaines.

B These eight ſhot between wind & water were all dangerous, they ſtaued on our lower deck two barrels of beef, two of peaſe, a Butt of wine; ſome of the ſhot paſſing through nineteen inches of plank and timber, pierced into bales of Grograms, and caried one into another: two went thorow all the bread and two ſacks of ſtiued wools: They bare in whole planks, ſhooke and ſplit the timbers, and ſtarted the trunnels, and made vs very leaky.

When we arriued at Ligorn, we vnderſtood of eighteen knights of Malta killed in the fight; but after by an Engliſhman that came from thence it was knowne, That the Generall of the Gallies was ſlain, and thirty ſix Knights and Officers, and two hundred ſixty four ſlaues Rowers and Souldiers. Which was too great an exchange for one Iew. But C ſuch is the reward of arrogance, & ſhal be the protection euer of a good cauſe, and of them that truſt not in the broken reed of Fleſh, but in Almighty God.

A brieſe Diſcourſe of the greatneſſe of the Turkiſh Empire: As alſo wherein the greateſt ſtrength thereof conſiſteth: And of what power the bordering Princes, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, are in compariſon of it.

By RICHARD KNOLLES.

THe Hiſtory of the Turks (being indeed nothing elſe but the true Record of the woſull ruines of the greater part of the Chriſtian Commonweale) thus as before paſſed through, and at length brought to an end; and their Empire (of all others now vpon earth far the greateſt) as a proud Champion ſtill ſtanding vp as it were in defiance of the whole world: I thought it good for the concluſion of this my Labour, to propoſe vnto the view of the zealous Chriſtian, the greatneſſe thereof, and ſo neere as I could, to ſet down the bounds and limits within the which it is (by the goodneſſe of God) as yet contained, together with the ſtrength and power thereof, as alſo in what regard it hath the neighbor princes bordering or confining vpon it; with ſome other particularities tending to the ſame purpoſe. All or the moſt part therof, although it be by the Conſiderat wel to be gathered out of the whole courſe of the hiſtory before going, yet ſhal it more plainly here together in the ful therof appear, than by the long and particular conſideration of the riſing and increaſe therof be perceiued: not much vnlike the ouergrown tree, at the greatneſſe whereof euery man wondereth, no man in the meane time either perceiuing or marking, how by little and little in tract of time it grew vp to that bignes, as now to ouertop al the reſt of the wood. The Imperial ſeat of this ſo dreadful an empire, is the moſt famous city of Conſtantinople, ſometime the glory of the Greeke Empire, but now the place where Achmat the firſt of that name, and fourteenth of the Othoman Emperors, acknowledging no man like himſelfe, triumpheth ouer many nations; a city fatally founded to command, and by the great Conqueror Tamerlane, of all others thought to be the beſt ſeated for the Empire of the world. In which city (taken from the Turks by Mahomet the ſecond, by the Turks ſyrnamed the Great, and the Greeke Empire by him ſubuerted) as the Othoman Emperours haue euer ſince ſeated themſelues, ſo haue they wonderfully, euen to the aſtoniſhment of the World, out of the ruines of that ſo glorious a State, increaſed both their ſtrength and empire, almoſt altogether fixt euen in the ſelfe ſame kingdoms, countries, and regions, as was ſomtimes that; though not as yet (God be thanked) able to attain to the vttermoſt bounds that that empire ſometimes had, eſpecially in Europ, albeit that it hath oftentimes in pride therof moſt mightily ſwoln, and in ſome few places therof ſomwhat alſo exceeded the ſame. Among the reſt of the Othoman emperors, this great Monarch of whom we ſpeak (namely Achmat the firſt, which now reigneth in that moſt ſtately and Imperial city) hath at this preſent vnder his command and Empire, the chiefe and moſt fruitful parts of the three firſt known parts of the world: onely America remaining free from him, not more happy in the rich mines therof, than in that it is ſo far from out of his reach; for in Europ hee hath all the ſea coaſt, from the confines of Epidaurus (the vttermoſt bound of his Empire in Europe Weſtward) vnto the mouth of the riuer Tanais, now called Don, with whatſoeuer lieth betwixt Buda in Hungary, and the Imperial City of Conſtantinople: in which ſpace is comprehended the better part of all Hungary, all Boſna, Seruia, Bulgaria, with a great part of Dalmatia, Epirus, Macedonia, Grecia, Peloponeſus, Thracia, the Archipelago, with the rich Iſlands contained therin. In Africa he poſſeſſeth all the

the ſea coaſt from Velex (or as ſome call it Belis) De Gomera, or more truly to ſay, from the Riuer Muluia (the bounder of the Kingdome of Fez) euen vnto the Arabian Gulfe, or Red-Sea Eaſtward, except ſome few places vpon the riuage of the ſea, holden by the king of Spain; viz. Merſalcabir, Melilla, Oran, and Pennon: and from Alexandria Northward vnto the city of Aſna, called of old Seine, Southward: in which ſpace are contained the famous Kingdomes of Tremizen, Algiers, Tunes, and Ægypt, with diuers other great Cities and Prouinces. In Aſia all is his from the ſtreits of Helleſpontus Weſtward, vnto the great city of Tauris Eaſtward: and from Derbent neer vnto the Caſpian Sea Northward, vnto Adena vpon the Gulfe of Arabia Southward. The greatneſſe of this his Empire may the better be conceiued by the greatneſſe of ſome parts thereof: the Meere of Meotis, which is all at the Turkiſh Emperors command, being in compaſſe a thouſand miles; and the Euxine or Blacke Sea in circuit two thouſand and ſeuen hundred; and the Mediterranean coaſt which is ſubiect vnto him containing in compaſſe about eight thouſand miles. But to ſpeake of his whole territory together; he goeth in his owne dominion from Tauris to Buda, about three thouſand two hundred miles. The like diſtance is from Derbent vnto Adena. From Balſera vpon the Perſian Gulfe vnto Tremiſena in Barbarie, are accounted little leſſe than foure thouſand miles. Hee hath alſo in the Sea the moſt noble Iſlands of Cyprus, Eubœa, Rhodus, Samos, Chios, Lesbos, and others of the Archipelago. In this ſo large and ſpacious an Empire are contained many great and large countries, ſometime moſt famous Kingdomes, abounding with all manner of worldly bleſſings and natures ſtore: For what Kingdome or countrey is more fruitfull than Ægypt, Syria, and a great part of Aſia? What countrey more wealthfull or more plentifull of all good things, than was ſometime Hungarie, Grecia, and Thracia? In which countries he hath alſo many rich and famous Cities, but eſpecially foure, which bee of greateſt wealth and trade; namely Conſtantinople, Caire, Aleppo, and Tauris. Conſtantinople for multitude of people exceedeth all the Cities of Europe; wherein are deemed to be aboue ſeuen hundred thouſand men; which if it be ſo, is almoſt equall to two ſuch Cities as Paris in France. Aleppo is the greateſt City of Syria, and as it were the centre whereunto all the merchandiſe of Aſia repaire. Tauris, of late the Royall ſeat of the Perſian Kings, and one of the greateſt Cities of that Kingdome, from whom it was in this our age taken by Amurath the third, hath in it aboue two hundred thouſand men. Caire amongſt all the Cities of Africa is the chief, leauing all others farre behinde it (although that ſome make the City of Cano equall vnto it in greatneſſe) beeing as it were the ſtore-houſe not of Ægypt onely, and of a great part of Africa, but of India alſo; the riches whereof being brought by the Red Sea to Sues, and from thence vpon Camels to Caire, and ſo downe the riuer Nilus to Alexandria, are thence diſperſed into theſe Weſterne parts: albeit that this rich trade hath of late time been much impaired, and ſo like more to be; the Chriſtians (eſpecially the Portugals) traffiquing into the Eaſt-Indies, and by the vaſt Ocean tranſporting the rich commodities of thoſe Eaſterne Countries into the Weſt, to the great hinderance of the Grand Signior his cuſtomes in Caire.

The foure chief cities for trade in the Turks Empire.

The Othoman gouernment in this his ſo great an empire is altogether like the gouernment of the Maſter ouer his ſlaue, and indeed meere tyrannicall: for the great Sultan is ſo abſolute a Lord of all things within the compaſſe of his empire, that all his ſubiects and people, be they neuer ſo great, do call themſelues his ſlaues, and not his ſubiects: neither hath any man power ouer himſelfe, much leſſe is hee Lord of the houſe wherein hee dwelleth, or of the land which hee tilleth, except ſome few families in Conſtantinople, to whom ſome few ſuch things were by way of reward, and vpon eſpeciall fauor giuen by Mahomet the ſecond, at ſuch time as hee won the ſame. Neither is any man in that empire ſo great, or yet ſo far in fauor with the great Sultan, as that he can aſſure himſelfe of his life, much leſſe of his preſent fortune or ſtate, longer than it pleaſeth the Sultan. In which ſo abſolute a ſoueraignty (by any free borne people not to be endured) the tyrant preſerueth himſelfe by two moſt ſpeciall means: firſt, by taking off all armes from his naturall ſubiects; and then by putting the ſame and all things elſe concerning the ſtate and gouernment thereof into the hands of the Apoſtata or Renegate Chriſtians, whom for moſt part, euery third, fourth, or fift yeare (or oftner if his need ſo require) hee taketh in their childehood from their miſerable parents as his tenths or tribute children.

A Whereby he gaineth two great commodities: firſt, for that in ſo doing he ſpoyleth the Prouinces, hee moſt feareth, of the floure, ſinues, and ſtrength of the people, choice being ſtill made of the ſtrongeſt youths, and fitteſt for war: then, for that with theſe as with his owne creatures he armeth himſelfe, and by them aſſureth his ſtate; for they in their childhood taken from their parents laps, and deliuered in charge to one or other appointed for that purpoſe, quickly and before they be aware become Mahometans; and ſo no more acknowledging father or mother, depend wholly on the great Sultan; who to make vſe of them, both feeds them and foſters them, at whoſe hands onely they looke for all things, and whom alone they thanke for all. Of which fry ſo taken from their Chriſtian parents (the only ſeminarie of his wars) ſome become horſmen, ſome footmen, and ſo in time the greateſt Commanders of B his ſtate and Empire next vnto himſelfe; the naturall Turks in the meane time giuing themſelues wholly vnto the trade of merchandiſe, and other their mechanicall occupations; or elſe to the feeding of cattell, their moſt antient and naturall vocation, not intermedling at all with matters of gouernment or ſtate. So that if vnto theſe his ſouldiers, all of the Chriſtian race, you ioyne alſo his fleet and mony, you haue as it were the whole ſtrength of his Empire: for in theſe foure, his horſemen, his footmen, his fleet and money, eſpecially conſiſteth his great force and power: whereof to ſpeake more particularly, and firſt concerning his money: It is commonly thought, that his ordinary reuenue exceedeth not eight millions of gold: and albeit that it might ſeeme, that he might of ſo large an Empire receiue a far greater reuenue, yet doth hee not, for that both hee and his men of warre (in whoſe power all things are) haue C their greateſt and almoſt onely care vpon armes, fitter by nature to waſt and deſtroy countries, than to preſerue and enrich them: inſomuch that for the preſeruation of their armies, and furtherance of their expeditions (euery yeare to do) they moſt grieuouſly ſpoyle euen their own people and Prouinces whereby they paſſe, ſcarce leauing them neceſſaries wherewith to liue: ſo that the ſubiects deſpairing to enioy the fruits of the earth, much leſſe the riches which by their induſtrie and labour they might get vnto themſelues, do now no further endeauour themſelues either to husbandrie or traffique than they needs muſt, yea, than very neceſſity it ſelfe inforceth them. For to what end auaileth it to ſow that another man muſt reape? or to reape that which another man is ready to deuoure? Whereupon it commeth, that in the territories of the Othoman countrey, yea euen in the moſt fruitfull countries D of Macedonia and Greece are ſeen great forreſts, all euery where waſt, few cities well peopled, and the greateſt part of thoſe countries lying deſolate and deſart: ſo that husbandry (in all well ordered commonweales the Princes greateſt ſtore) decaying, the earth neither yeeldeth her increaſe vnto the paineſull husbandman, neither the matter vnto the artificer, neither the artificer wares to furniſh the Merchant with, all together with the plough running into ruine and decay. As for the trade of merchandiſe, it is almoſt all in the hands of the Iewes, or the Chriſtians of Europe, viz. the Raguſians, Venetians, Genowaies, French, or Engliſh; the naturall Turks hauing therein the leaſt to do, holding in that their ſo large an Empire no other famous Cities for trade, more than the foure aboue named, viz. Conſtantinople, Tauris, Aleppo and Caire: whereunto may be added Caffa and Theſſalonica in Europe; Damaſcus, E Tripolis, and Aden in Aſia; Alexandria and Algiers in Africke. In our countries here in this Weſt part of Europe, of the abundance of people oftentimes ariſeth dearth; but in many parts of the Turks dominions, for want of men to manure the ground: moſt part of the poore countrey people drawne from their owne dwellings, being inforced with victuals and other neceſſaries to follow their great armies in their long expeditions, of whom ſcarce one of ten euer returne home to their dwellings againe, there by the way periſhing, if not by the enemies ſword, yet by the wants, the intemperateneſſe of the aire, or immoderate paines taking.
But to come neerer to our purpoſe, although the great Turks ordinary reuenues bee no greater than is aforeſaid, yet are his extraordinarie eſcheats to be greatly accounted of, eſpecially his confiſcations, forfeitures, fines, amerciaments (which are right many) his tributes, cuſtoms F tythes and tenths of all preyes taken by ſea or land, with diuers other ſuch like, far exceeding his ſtanding and certaine reuenue: his Baſſaes and other his great Officers like rauening Harpies as it were ſucking out the bloud of his poore ſubiects, and heaping vp ineſtimable treaſures, which for the moſt part fall againe into the Grand Signior his coffers. Ibrahim Vizier Baſſa

The Turks ordinary reuenues

Baſſa (who liued not long ſince) is ſuppoſed to haue brought with him from Cair to the value G of ſix millions: and Mahomet another of the Viziers was thought to haue had a farre greater ſum. His preſents alſo amount vnto a great matter; for no Embaſſadour can come before him without great gifts; no man is to hope for any commodious office or preferment without mony, no man may with empty hands come to the preſence of him ſo great a Prince, either from the prouince he had the charge of, or from any great expedition hee was ſent vpon; neither vnto ſo great and mighty Prince are trifles preſented. The Vayuods of Moldavia, Valachia, and Tranſylvania, before their late reuolt, by gifts preſerued themſelues in their principalities, being almoſt daily changed, eſpecially in Valachia and Moldavia: for thoſe Honors were by the grand Signior ſtil giuen to them that would giue moſt; who to performe what they had offred, miſerably oppreſſed the people, and brought their prouinces into great H pouertie. In brief, an eaſie thing it is for the great Tyrant to find occaſion for him at his pleaſure to take away any mans life, together with his wealth, be it neuer ſo great: ſo that he canot well be ſaid to lack mony, ſo long as any of his ſubiects hath it. Neuertheleſſe the late Perſian war ſo emptied the late couetous Sultan Amurath his coffers, and exhauſted his treaſures, that all ouer his empire the value of his gold was beyond all credit inhanced, inſomuch that a Chequine was twice ſo much worth as before. Beſides that, the mettal whereof his gold and ſiluer was made, was ſo embaſed, that it gaue occaſion vnto the Ianizaries to ſet fire vpon the city of Conſtantinople, to the great terror not of the vulgar ſort only, but of the grand Signior himſelf alſo. And in the city of Aleppo only were in the name of the great Sultan 60000 chequines taken vp in preſt of the merchants there, which how wel they were repaid we leaue I for them to report.

Now albeit that the Turks reuenues be not ſo great as the largeneſſe of his Empire and the fruitfulneſſe of his countries might ſeem to afford, all the ſoile being his own; yet hath hee in his dominion a commoditie of far greater value and vſe than are the reuenues themſelues; which is the multitude of the Timariots or Penſioners, which are all horſemen, ſo called of Timaro, that is a ſtipend which they haue of the great Sultan, viz. the poſſeſſion of certaine villages and towns, which they hold during their life, and for which they ſtand bound, for euerie threeſcore ducats they haue of yearely reuenue, to maintaine one horſeman, either with bow and arrowes, or elſe with targuet and Launce, and that as well in time of peace as war: for the Othoman Emperors take vnto themſelues all ſuch lands as they by the ſword winne from K their enemies, as well Mahometanes as Chriſtians, all which they diuide into Timars, or as wee call them, Commendams, which they giue vnto their ſouldiers of good deſert for tearm of life, vpon condition that they ſhall (as is aforeſaid) according to the proportion thereof, keepe certaine men and horſes fit for ſeruice alwaies ready whenſoeuer they ſhall bee called The two chiefe pillars of the Othoman Empire. vpon. Wherein conſiſteth the greateſt policie of the Turke, and the ſureſt mean for the preſeruation of their Empire. For if by this meanes the care of mannuring the ground were not committed vnto the ſouldier, for the profit they hope thereof, but left in the hand of the plaine painfull husbandman, all would in that ſo warrelike an Empire lie waſte and deſolate; the Turkes themſelues commonly ſaying, That whereſoeuer the Grand Seigniours horſe ſetteth his foot, there the Graſſe wil grow no more; meaning the deſtruction that their great L Armies bring in all places where they come. The inſtitution of theſe Timariots, and the taking vp of the Azamoglans (for ſo they call thoſe children which are taken from their Chriſtian parents to be brought vp for Ianizaries) are the two chief pillars of the Turkes Empire, and the ſtrength of their wars; both which ſeem to be deuiſed vnto the imitation of the Romans, as are diuers things moe in the Turkiſh gouernment: for the Romane Emperours vſed their own ſubiects in the wars, and of them conſiſted the Prætorian army, which neuer departed from the Emperors ſide, but were ſtill to gard his perſon, as doe the Ianizaries the great Turk. And in the Roman empire lands were giuen vnto ſouldiers of good deſert, for them to take the profit of during their liues, in reward of their good ſeruice and valour, which were called Beneficia, and they which had them, Beneficiarij, or as we term them, Benefices, and beneficed M men. Alexander Severus granted ſuch ſoldiers, heirs that might inioy thoſe lands & commendams, conditionally that they themſelues ſhould ſerue as had their fathers, els not. Conſtantine the Great alſo gaue vnto his Captaines that had wel deſerued of him, certaine lands for

A for them to liue vpon during the terme of their life. The like fees in France, which they call Feuda, were of Temporaries made perpetuities by theſe their late Kings. Theſe Timariot horſemen in the Turkiſh Empire ſerue to two great and moſt notable purpoſes: wherof the firſt is, That by them the Grand Seigniour, as with a bridle, keepes the reſt of his ſubiects in euery part of his great Empire in awe, ſo that they cannot ſo ſoon mooue, but that they ſhall haue theſe his Timariots as falcons in their neckes; for to that purpoſe they are diſperſed all ouer his dominion and Empire. The other vſe of them (and no leſſe profitable than the former) is, that out of them he is alwaies able to draw into the field an hundred and fifty thouſand horſemen well armed, ready to goe whitherſoeuer hee ſhall command them: with all whom he is not at one farthing charge. Which ſo great a power of horſemen cannot continually B be maintained for leſſe than fourteene millions of duckats yearely. Wherefore it is to bee maruelled, that ſome comparing the Turkes reuenues with the Chriſtians, make no mention of this ſo great a part of the Othoman Emperors wealth and ſtrength, ſeruing him firſt for the ſuppreſſing of all ſuch tumults as might ariſe in his Empire, and then as a moſt principall ſtrength of his continuall Warres, alwayes ready to ſerue him in his greateſt expeditions.
The number of theſe Timariot horſemen is now grown very great, taking increaſe together with the Turks Empire. It is reported, That Amurath the third, grandfather vnto Achmat that now reigneth, in his late warres againſt the Perſian, ſubdued ſo much territorie as ſerued him to erect therein forty thouſand Timariots; and appointed at Tauris a new Receit, which was yearely worth vnto him a million of gold. Theſe Timariots are in al accounted C to bee ſeuen hundred and nineteene thouſand fighting men; of whom 257000 haue their dwelling in Europ, and 462000 in Aſia and Africk.

The number of the Timariots.

Beſides theſe Timariots, the grand Seigniour hath a great number of other horſemen vnto whom he giueth pay, which are his Spahi, Vlufagi, and Carapici of his Court, being indeed the nurſeries and ſeminaries of the great officers and gouernors of his Empire; for from among them are ordinarily choſen the Sanzacks, which afterwards through their good deſerts or the Sultans great fauour, become Viziers, Beglerbegs, and Baſſa's, the chiefe rulers of that ſo mighty a monarchy.

The Spahi, Vlufagi, and Carapici.

He hath alſo ſtil in his army a great multitude of other horſemen, called Acanzij, being indeed but rural clowns, yet for certain priuiledges which they haue, are bound to goe vnto the D wars, being euen of the Turks themſelues accounted of ſmall worth or value in compariſon of the Timariots. Hee receiueth great aid alſo from the Tartar in his wars, as alſo from the Valachians and Moldavians (vntil that by the example of the Tranſylvanians, they to the great benefit of the reſt of that ſide of Chriſtendom reuolted from him) all which are to bee accounted as the Romans Auxiliarij, that is to ſay, ſuch as come to aid and aſſiſt him. And thus much for his horſemen.

The Acanzij.

Another great part of his ſtrength conſiſteth in his footmen, and eſpecially in his Ianizaries: in whom two things are to be conſidered, their Nation, and dexteritie in Armes. Concerning their Nation, ſuch of the Azamoglans as are born in Aſia are not ordinarily inrolled in the number of the Ianizaries, but ſuch as are borne in Europ, for they of Aſia are accounted E more effeminat, as they haue been alwaies, more ready to fly than to fight. Wheras the people of Europ haue euen in the Eaſt been accounted for better and more valiant ſouldiers, hauing there to their immortal glory, ſet vp the notable trophies of their moſt glorious victories.
The ſouldiers of Aſia be called Turkes, after the name of their Nation, and not of their Countrey, (no countrey being indeed ſo properly called) and they of Europe, Rumi, that is to ſay, Romani, or Romans; as the Country, eſpecially about Conſtantinople, is called by the name of Rum-Ili, that is, the Roman Countrey, as it was in antient time, of the notable Roman Colonies therein, knowne by the name of Romania. Now as concerning their dexteritie, ſuch male children are culled out from the Chriſtians, as in whom appeareth the greateſt ſignes of ſtrength, actiuitie, and courage; for theſe three qualities are in a ſouldier eſpecially F required. This choice is made euery third yeare, except neceſſitie inforce it to bee made ſooner; as it happened in the late Perſian Warre, wherein not onely oftner choice was made, but they were glad to vſe the Azamoglans alſo, a thing neuer before by them done. For thoſe Youths (the Children of Chriſtian parents) beeing by them that haue taken them vp, brought to Conſtantinople, are taken view of by the Aga of the Ianizaries, who cauſeth to be regiſtred the name of the youth, with the name of his father and the countrey wherein hee was born. Which done, part of them are ſent into the leſſer Aſia (now called Natolia) and other prouinces; where learning the Turkiſh language and law, they are infected with the vices and manners of them with whom they liue, and ſo in ſhort time become true Mahometans. Another part of them, and thoſe of the moſt towardlieſt, is diuided into Cloiſters which the grand Seigniour hath at Conſtantinople and Pera, of whom the faireſt and moſt handſome are appointed for the Seraglio of the great Sultan himſelfe. All the time that theſe Youths thus ſent abroad liue in the leſſer Aſia, or other the Turkes prouinces, they are not appointed to any certain exerciſe, but ſtil kept buſied, ſome at husbandry, ſome in gardening, ſome in building, ſome in other domeſtical ſeruices, neuer ſuffred to be idle, but alwaies occupied in painful labor: where after certain years they haue bin thus inured to labour and pains taking, they are called into the Cloiſters of the Azamoglans (for ſo they are called all the time vntil they be inrolled into the number of the Ianizaries) and are there deliuered vnto certain ſpeciall gouernors appointed to take charge of them; who keep them ſtill exerciſed in painfull worke and labour, intreating them euill enough, as well in their dyet, as in their apparell and lodging: they ſleep together in large roomes, like vnto the religious Dormitories, wherein are Lampes ſtill burning, and Tutors attending, without whoſe leaue they may not ſtirre out of their places. There they learn to ſhoot both in the bow and piece, the vſe of the Scimiter, with many feats of actiuitie; and beeing well trained in thoſe exerciſes, are inrolled amongſt the Ianizaries and Spahi; of whom the Ianizaries receiue no leſſe than fiue aſpers, nor more than eight for their daily pay, and the Spahi ten. Beeing recorded amongſt the Ianizaries, they are either ſent away into the wars, or into ſome Garriſon, or elſe attend at the Court. Theſe laſt haue for their dwelling three great places like vnto three Monaſteries in the City of Conſtantinople. There they liue vnder their Gouernours to them deputed, the younger with great obedience and ſilence ſeruing the elder, in buying of things for them, in dreſſing their meat, and ſuch like ſeruices. They that be of one ſeat or calling liue together at one table, and ſleep in long walkes. If any of them vpon occaſion chance to lie all night abroad without leaue, the next euening he is notably beaten, with ſuch nurture and diſcipline, that after his beating he like an Ape kiſſeth the Gouernours hands that ſo corrected him. Theſe Ianizaries haue many large priuiledges, are honoured, although they bee moſt inſolent, and are feared of all men, yea euen of the grand Sultan himſelfe, who is ſtill glad to make faire weather with them. In their expeditions and trauels they rob the poore Chriſtians cottages and houſes, who muſt not ſay one word to the contrary. When they buy any thing, they giue for it but what they liſt themſelues: they can be iudged by none but their Aga, neither can they be executed without danger of an inſurrection; and therſore ſuch execution is very ſeldom done, and that very ſecretly. They haue a thouſand royalties: ſome of them are appointed to the keeping of Embaſſadours ſent from forreine princes: other ſome of them are aſſigned to accompany Strangers Trauellers, eſpecially them that be men of the better ſort, to the intent they may ſafely paſſe in the Turks dominions; for which ſeruice they are commonly wel rewarded. They haue made choice of their prince, namely Selymus the firſt, his father Bajazet yet liuing. Neither can any the Turks Sultans account themſelues fully inueſted in the Imperiall dignitie, or aſſured of their eſtate, vntill they be by them approoued and proclaimed. Euerie one of their Sultans at his firſt comming to the Empire doth giue them ſome great largeſſe; and ſometime the better to pleaſe them, increaſeth alſo their pay. In euery great expedition ſome of them goe forth with their Aga or his Lieutenant, and are the laſt of all that fight. There is no office among the Turks that moe enuy at, than at the office of the Aga of the Ianizaries, for the greatneſſe of his authoritie and command: onely he and the Beglerbeg of Grecia chuſe not their owne lieutenant, but haue them nominated vnto them by the grand Signior. Vnto this great man the Aga of the Ianizaries nothing can portend a more certain deſtruction than to be of them beloued; for then is he of the great Sultan ſtraitway feared or miſtruſted, and ſo occaſion ſought to take him out of the way. The number of the court Ianizaries is betwixt ten and 14000. This warrelike Order of ſouldiers is in theſe our daies much imbaſed; for now naturall Turks are taken in for Ianizaries, as are al-

The Ianizaries great priuiledges.

A ſo the people of Aſia; whereas in former times none were admitted into that Order but the Chriſtians of Europe only: beſide that, they marry wiues alſo, contrary to their ancient cuſtome, which is not now forbidden them. And becauſe of their long lying ſtill at Conſtantinople (a city abounding with all manner of pleaſure) they are become much more effeminate and ſloathfull, but withall moſt inſolent, or more truely to ſay, intollerable. It is commonly reported, the ſtrength of the Turkiſh Empire to conſiſt in this Order of the Ianizaries: which is not altogether ſo; for albeit that they be indeed the Turks beſt footmen, and ſureſt gard of the great Sultans perſon, yet vndoubtedly the greateſt ſtrength of his ſtate and empire reſteth nothing ſo much in them, as in the great multitude of his horſmen, eſpecially his Timariots. Beſide theſe Ianizaries, the Turkiſh Emperour hath a great number of baſe footmen, whom B the Turks call Aſapi, better acquainted with the ſpade than with the ſword, ſeruing rather to the wearying of their enemies with their multitude, than the vanquiſhing of them with their valour: with whoſe dead bodies the Ianizaries vſe to fill vp the ditches of towns beſieged, or to ſerue them for ladders to clime ouer the enemies walls vpon. But as the Romans had both their old Legionary, and other vntrained ſouldiers which they called Tirones; of whom the firſt were the chiefe ſtrength of their wars, and the other but as it were an ayd and ſupply: euen ſo the Turke accounteth his Timariot horſemen the ſtrength of his army, and the Acanzij (which is another ſort of baſe and common horſemen) but as an acceſſory: and ſo amongſt his footmen he eſteemeth of his Ianizaries, as did the Romans of the Prætorian legions, but of his Aſapi as of ſhadows. The Ianizaries are by none to be commanded, more C than by the great Sultan himſelfe, and their Aga: as for the Baſſaes, they much regard them not, but in their rage oftentimes foule entreat euen the greateſt of them. The Aſapi, as they are but baſe and common ſouldiers, ſo haue they alſo their ordinary captains and commanders, men of no great place or marke.

The great commanders of the Turkes Empire.

The whole ſtate of the great Empire of the Turks is commanded by the great Sultan, by the graue aduice and counſell of the Vizier Baſſaes, which were not wont to be in number aboue foure, ſo prouiding for the ſecrecy of his high deſignes or important reſolutions, hardly by a great multitude to be concealed: howbeit that the Sultans of later time haue had ſometimes moe, ſometimes fewer, as their pleaſure was. Theſe men are of all others in that Empire the greateſt, and for their high places moſt honoured: vnto them euen the greateſt D Princes that haue any thing to do in the Turks court, ſue and ſend their honourable preſents. By their aduice the great Sultan taketh his war in hand, neither without them concludeth he any peace. They giue audience vnto the Embaſſadours of forreine Princes, who from them receiue their diſpatch. The greateſt honors and preferments (which are many in that ſo great and large an Empire) are all by their means to be obtained: which maketh them of all others to be ſought vnto. Some one or other of them are ſtill Generals ouer the great armies of the Turks, eſpecially in theſe their late wars, their three laſt Emperors neuer themſelues going forth into the field (excepting once that Mahomet the third for the maintenance of his credit with his men of war, came downe into Hungary, and there won the city of Agria:) which leading of ſuch mighty armies is ſtill with great emulation and ambition of the Viſier Baſſaes E amongſt themſelues ſought after, as well for the great profit thereby vnto them ariſing, as for the honour thereof, which is of all other the greateſt. But leauing theſe great ones, the chiefe counſellors for his ſtate; the whole body of his ſo large and mighty an Empire (all in the hands of martall men) is gouerned by other great Baſſaes, whom they by a moſt proud barbarous name call Beglerbegs, that is to ſay, Lords of Lords, euery one of them hauing vnder him certaine Begs or Sanzacks, who are lords and rulers alſo ouer ſome particular Cities and Countries, with the Timariots therein; yet all ſtill at the command and becke of their Beglerbeg. In antient time there was wont to be but two of theſe proud Beglerbegs in all the Turks Empire: the one commanding ouer all the Prouinces the Turke had in Europe; and the other ouer all that he had in the leſſer Aſia, now of the Turks called Natolia. But F the Turkiſh Empire greatly augmented in Aſia by Selymus the firſt, and alſo afterward much enlarged both in Europe and Aſia by Solyman his ſon, the number of the Beglerbegs were by him encreaſed, and in ſome ſort alſo changed: who although that they be all Beglerbegs, and that one of them (eſpecially in the time of peace) in the managing of his ſoldiers, and affaires of his country is not ſubject to any other, but is onely at the command of the Great Turke; yet notwithſtanding in the time of war, where the Beglerbeg of Romania is, all are obedient vnto him, as the chiefeſt of the reſt; inſomuch that none of them but only he and the Baſſa of Natolia are called by the ſtately name of Beglerbegs, the others being then only called the Baſſaes of ſuch and ſuch places, as of Buda, Aleppo, and ſuch like; although indeed they are in nature Beglerbegs, and ſo written in their Records. For the more manifeſting of which their gouernment, as alſo that they which come hereafter may by comparing of that which is here written, with the ſtate that then ſhall be, ſee how much this great Empire in the meane time encreaſeth or diminiſheth, I haue thought good here briefely to ſet downe all the ſaid Beglerbegs, with their Sanzacks and Timariots, and as neere as I could (either by reading, or the credible relation of others well trauelled in thoſe countries) together, and as it were at one ſhew, ſet forth the whole ſtrength and power of this ſo mighty an Empire, as alſo in what Countries and Prouinces the ſame is eſpecially placed.

The Beglerbeghs or great Commanders of the Turks Empire in EVROPE.

1 The Beglerbeg of Romania chiefe of the Beglerbegs of the Turks Empire in Europe.

The firſt and chiefeſt of all the Beglerbegs in the Turkiſh Empire, is the Beglerbeg of Romania or Grecia, called of the Turks Rum-Ili (as we ſay the Roman country) the principal reſidence of whoſe Beglerbegſhip is at Sophia, a city of Bulgaria, ſo appointed for the commodious ſcituation thereof, for the better command of the reſt of the prouinces of Europe; howbeit that he for the moſt part, or rather altogether abideth at the court: which the other Beglerbegs cannot do, for they are bound not to depart from the gouernment of their Prouinces: in which charge they ordinarily continue but three yeares only, the great Sultan ſtill changing and altering them at his pleaſure. This Beglerbeg hath vnder his own enſigne and command forty thouſand Timariots alwaies ready at his call, vnder the conduct of theſe and twenty Sanzacks following; namely, the

The Beglerbegs of the Turkes empire in Aſia.

The Beglerbegh of

1 Anatolia, who hath his reſidence in Cutaie, the Metropoliticall city of the greater Phrygia (called in antient time Catyai) and hath vnder his enſigne and command thirty thouſand of the Timariot horſemen, with twelue Sanzackes.
2 Caramania, who hath his abode at Caiſaria (in antient time called Cæſaria) a City of Cilicia, and hath vnder him ſeuen Sanzackes, with twenty thouſand Timariots.
3 Siuas, who hath his abiding at Sebaſtia, a city of the leſſer Armenia, and hath vnder his gouernment ten thouſand Timariots.
4 Tocatun, who reſideth at Amaſia, the Metropolis of Capadocia, and hath vnder him fiue Sanzackes.
5 Dulgadir, ſometime part of the Kingdome of Aladeules, and commandeth ouer foure Sanzackes.
6 Halep, commonly called Aleppo, a City of Syria, and one of the moſt famous Marts of the Eaſt, who hath vnder his Regiment fiue and twenty thouſand Timariots.
7 Sham, otherwiſe called Damaſcó, a moſt famous city of Syria, who commandeth ouer forty thouſand Timariots.
8 Tarapolis, or Trapolis, commonly called Tripolis, another famous city of Syria.
9 Maras, a city vpon the great riuer Euphrates, betwixt Aleppo and Meſopotamia, who hath vnder his command ten thouſand Timariots.
10 Diarbekir, otherwiſe called Meſopotamia, who making his abode at the city of Amida, or as the Turks call it, Cara hemid, who commandeth ouer twelue Sanzackes, and thirty thouſand Timariots.
11 Bagdat, or new Babylon, where he reſideth, not far from the ruines of old Babylon, who hath vnder him forty thouſand Timariots.
12 Balſara, not far from Bagdat, vpon the Perſian gulfe, who hath vnder his rule or gouernment fifteene thouſand Timariots.
13 Laxa, towards Ormus, and neere vnto the Perſian, hath vnder his regiment ten thouſand Timariots.
14 Gemen and Aden, two famous cities in Arabia Fœlix, vpon the coaſt of the Red-Sea, who hath vnder him thirty thouſand Timariots.
15 Chebetz, or Zebet, vpon the coaſt of the Arabian gulfe, neere vnto the Kingdome of the great Æthiopian King Prejanus, commonly (but corruptly) called Presbiter Iohn.

The Beglerbegh of

16 Cyprus, who lieth at Nicoſia or Famaguſta, commandeth ouer all that great Iſland, ſometime of it ſelfe a Kingdome. G 17 Scheheruzul in Aſſyria, bordering vpon the Perſian, who hath vnder his gouernment ten thouſand Timariots.
18 Wan, a city in the confines of the greater Armenia towards Media, who hath vnder him twelue thouſand Timariots.
19 Artzerum, or Erzerum in the borders of Armenia toward Capadocia, about foure daies journey from Trapezond, who commandeth ouer twenty thouſand Timariots.
20 Teflis, neere vnto the Georgians, erected by Muſtapha Baſſa, Generall of Amurath the third his army againſt the Perſian, in the yeare 1578. H 21 Siruan, or Media, erected by the ſame Muſtapha, and at the ſame time, commandeth ouer all that great country, ſometime a famous Kingdome.
22 Temir-Capi, or Derbent, neere vnto the Caſpian Sea, taken by Oſman Baſſa the ſame yeare 1578: who hauing ſlaine Schehemet Chan his father in law, reduced that country into the forme of a Beglerſhip.
23 Cars, a city of Armenia the greater, diſtant from Artzerum foure daies journy, by Muſtapha Baſſa made a Beglerbegſhip in the yeare 1578.
24 Tſchilder or Tzilder, in the confines of the Georgians, erected by the ſame Generall Muſtapha, in the yeare 1579.
25 Faſſa, or Phaſis, in Mengrelia, neere vnto the Georgians, erected by Vluzales, the Turks Admirall, the ſame yeare 1579. I 26 Sochum, in the borders of the Georgians, erected by the great Baſſa Sinan, in the yeare 1580.
27 Batin, there erected alſo by the ſame Sinan Baſſa.
28 Reiuan, erected by Ferat Baſſa, Generall of the Turks Army, taken from Tochomac Chan the Perſian in the yeare 1582, whereof Cicala Baſſa was the firſt Beglerbeg.
29 Sumachia, in the Countrey of Media, erected by Oſman Baſſa in the yeare 1583.
30 Tauris, a moſt famous city of Armenia the greater, ſometime the Regall ſeat of the Perſian Kings, but of late taken from them by Oſman Baſſa, and conuerted into a Beglerbegſhip in the ſame yeare 1583. K

But theſe late erected honours, namely the Beglerbegſhips of Teflis, Siruan, Temir-Capi, Cars, Tſchilder, Faſſa, and the reſt gained by Amurath from the Perſians and the Georgians, although they containe a great territory, are not of themſelues any of them worthy of thoſe proud titles, or yet able to maintaine the ſame (Siruan, Reiuan, and Tauris only excepted) but were by the great Baſſa's, Muſtapha, Sinan, Ferat, and Oſman, Amurath his Lieutenants, for their owne greater honour, and the encouraging of them which were to defend thoſe their new conqueſts, erected; being indeed nothing either in power or ſtrength comparable with the other more antient Beglerbegs either in Europe or Aſia. L But hauing thus paſſed through the great Kingdomes and Prouinces by the Turks holden in Europe and Aſia, with their proud honours therein, let vs go forward toward the South, to ſee what great Kingdomes and territories they at this preſent hold in Africke alſo.

The Beglerbeghs or great Commanders of the Turks Empire in AFRICKE.

The Beglerbegh of

1 Miſſar, who ſtill making his abode at the great city of Caire, hath vnder his command all the Kingdome of Ægypt, with ſixteene Sanzackes, and an hundred thouſand Timariots. M 2 Ceſair, in antient time called Iulia Caſaria, but now commonly Algiers, where the Beglerbegh ſtill reſiding, commandeth ouer all that Kingdome, wherein are forty thouſand Timariots.

A The Beglerbegh of 3 Tunis, where he ſtill remaining as a Viceroy, commandeth all that great and large Kingdome.
4 Tripolis, the ſeat of his Beglerbegſhip, by Sinan Baſſa taken from the Knights of Malta in the yeare 1551.

There are beſide theſe, two other Kingdomes in Africke inrolled in the Turks records as their owne, although they be not as yet by them brought into the forme of Beglerbegſhips, namely the Kindomes of Fez and Moroco, but are as yet holden by them as their tributaries and Vaſſals.

But hauing thus as it were taken view of the greatneſſe and forces of this ſo mighty a monarchs Empire by land, and ſo in ſome ſort bounded it out, let vs conſider alſo his power by B ſea. With the great Ocean he much medleth not, more than a little in the gulfes of Perſia and Arabia, moſt of his territories lying vpon the Mediterranean and Euxine ſeas, or elſe more inwardly into the heart of Aſia neere to no ſea. Now for theſe ſeas, no Prince in the World hath greater or better meanes to ſet forth his fleets than hath he: for the ouergrowne woods of Epirus and Cilicia, and more than they, thoſe of Nicomedia and Trapezond, are ſo great and thicke, and ſo full of tall trees fit for the building of ſhips and gallies of all ſorts, as is almoſt incredible. Neither wanteth he ſtore of ſhipwrites & carpenters for the framing of that ſo great ſtore of timber, large pay drawing euen the Chriſtian skilfull carpenters and workmen into his Arſenals at Conſtantinople, Synope, Callipolis, and others. For proofe whereof it is worth the noting, that Selymus the ſecond in our freſh remembrance, the next yeare af- C ter that notable ouerthrow by him receiued at the Echinades (commonly called the battell of Lepanto) rigged vp a fleet wherewith Vluzales his Admirall was not afraid to face the whole power of the confederate Chriſtian Princes at Cerigo. Neither hath the Turke euer wanted good ſtore of expert ſeamen after the manner of thoſe ſeas; for beſide thoſe he hath in ſtore at Callipolis and Sinope, out of his gallies which he hath alwaies in readineſſe at Lesbos, Chios, Rhodus, Cyprus, and Alexandria, and from the pyrats which he continually receiueth into the ports of Tunis, Bugia, Tripolis, and Algiers, he can and doth from them when need is, chuſe captaines, marinors, and rowers ſufficient for the manning and ſtoring of his fleet. What he is able to do in thoſe ſeas, was well ſeene in our time, by thoſe fleets which he had at Malta, Cyprus, the Echinades, and Guletta. He hath beſide of all neceſſary and war- D like prouiſion aboundant ſtore, and of great ordnance to furniſh himſelſe withall both by ſea and land an infinite quantity. Out of Hungary he hath carried away aboue 5000 great peeces, out of Cyprus 500, and few leſſe from Guletta, not to ſpeake what he hath more got from the Chriſtians in diuers other places alſo. What ſtore he hath of ſhot and pouder he ſhewed at Malta, where hee diſcharged aboue 60000 great ſhot; at Famaguſta, where hee beſtowed, 118000; and at Guletta, where in the ſpace of 39 daies he by the fury of his great ordnance ouerthrew the fortifications which the Chriſtians had bin 40 yeares in building. So that to returne againe to our purpoſe, the great Turke ſo well prouided of men, mony, ſhipping, and great ordnance, and hauing done ſo great matters at ſea as is before rehearſed, is not in reaſon otherwiſe to be accounted of, than as of a moſt mighty and puiſſant Prince as well by ſea as E land: which to be ſo, the greatneſſe of his Denizi Beglerbeg or great Admirall (commonly called Capitan Baſſa, of whom we haue not yet ſpoken) well declareth. This great man hauing charge of all the grand Signiors ſtrength at ſea, is alway one of the Viſier Baſſaes, not bound ſtill to follow the court, as the other Viſiers be, but alwaies or for moſt part reſiant at Conſtantinople or Callipolis, ſo to be the neerer vnto his charge. He that now hath this honourable place is called of the Turks Cigala Baſſa, deſcended of an honorable family of that name in Genoa: who commonly reſiding at Conſtantinople or Callipolis, hath vnder him fourteen Sanzacks, all of them great commanders and men of great place: namely, the

The Princes as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, vpon whom the great Empire of the Turk confideth, and of what power they be in compariſon of the Turks.

The greatneſſe, wealth,and ſtrength of this ſo mighty an Empire,as well by ſea as land, G thus in ſome ſort declared, let vs now ſee vpon what Princes it alſo confineth, and of what power euery one of them is in compariſon of it ſo great and ouergrown a State. The Turks toward the Eaſt border vpon the Perſians, according to a right line drawne by imagination from Tauris to Balſara : vpon the Portugals at the Perſian gulfe, and ſo there likewiſe toward the South : at the Red Sea,vpon the great Æthyopian King Prejanus, commonly called Preſter Iohn: towards the South, in Affricke vpon the King of Moroco; and in Europe, vp-on the Kingdome of Naples,with ſome part of the Venetian ſigniory : toward the North vp-on the Polonians,and the teiritories of the houſe of Auſtria. Now to begin with the Perſian, the great Turke no doubt is in field too ſtrong for him, as by prooſe hath beene oftentimes ſeene; for Mahomet the Great, in plaine battell ouercame the valiant Vſun Cuſſanes : Se- H lymus the firſt, and after, Solyman his ſon put to fight the noble Hyſmael and Tamas, the two great and famous Perſian Kings : and now of late in our time Amurath the third by his Lieutenants hath taken from the Perſians all Media, with the greater Armenia, both ſometimes famous Kingdomes,together with the regall city of Tauris. That the Turke ſo preuaileth, is by reaſon of his footmen, which the Perſian wanteth; and of his great ordnance, whereof the Perſian hath neither ſtore nor vſe : and although the Perſians by valour of their horſemen haue ſometime in open field foiled the Turk,yet haue they ſtill loſt ſome part of their country; Solyman taking from them Meſopotamia, and Amurath Media and Armenia. Neither did the Perſians alone feele that harme, and loſe their owne, but vndid their Confederates alſo; Selymus the firſt ſpoiling the Mamalukes of Ægypt and Syria, and vtterly rooting them I from off the face of the earth;and Amurath by his Lieutenants hauing brought to a low ebbe the warlike Georgians,both of them the Perſian Kings friends and confederats. Now is not the Turke ſo much too ſtrong at land for the Perſian, but that he is as much too weake at ſea for the Portugals; in thoſe ſeas I meane where their forcss haue more than once to the Turks coſt met together in the Eaſt Indies:the Portugals hauing in thoſe rich but remote countries, many ſure harbours and ports,yea,faire countries and territories abounding with victuals and all prouiſion neceſſary for ſhipping,with ſome alſo of thoſe great Eaſterne princes their allies and confederats:wheras the Turke on the other ſide hath nothing in the Perſian gulfe ſtrong, beſide Balſara; the ſea coaſt of Arabia which might ſtand him in beſt ſtead,hauing no more but foure townes, and thoſe but weake and of ſmall worth. So that there, as alſo in the Red K ſea, it is a matter of exceeding charge and difficulty for him to ſet out any great fleet into thoſe ſeas, for that thoſe countries are vtterly deſtitute of wood fit to make ſhips of. For which cauſe, thoſe few times that hee prepared his fleets in the Red ſea (to haue cut off the Portugals trade into the Eaſt Indies)being not able to performe the ſame in the Perſian gulf, he was inforced to bring the timber for the building of his gallies out of the Port of Bithy-nia and Cilicia (out of another World as it were) vp the Nile vnto Caire, and from thence vpon camels by land to Sues,where he hath his Arſenall,a thing almoſt incredible. And yet hauing done what he could, as oft as he hath made any expedition againſt them, he neuer gained any thing but loſſe and diſhonor : as in the yeare 1538 at the city of Dium;and in the yeare 1552 at the Iſland of Armuz, and after that at Mombaza, where foure of the Turks L gallies,with one galliot,which by the fauour of the King of Mombaza had thought to haue ſtaied in thoſe ſeas,were by the Portugals taken:who ſtill haue a ſpeciall regard and care that the Turks ſettle not themſelues in thoſe ſeas; but as ſoone as they perceiue them to prepare any fleet,they forthwith ſet vpon them, and to that end oftentimes without reſiſtance enter into the Red ſeas. Preſter Iohn, of whom although men ſpeake much, yet is he nothing in ſtrength to be compared vnto the Turke,but far inferior vnto him both for Commanders and ſoldiers,as alſo for weapons and munition:for that great Prince hath a great kingdome without fortification, and a multitude of ſoldiers without armes:as appeared by the ouerthrow of Barnagaſſo his Lieutenant towards the Red Sea; who hauing loſt all that Sea coaſt vnto the Turks, was brought to that extremity, that to haue peace with them, he yeelded to pay vnto M them a yearely tribute of a thouſand ounces of gold. In Africke the Turke hath more Territories than hath the King of Moroco, otherwiſe called the Xeriſe; for he poſſeſſeth all that there lyeth betwixt the Red ſea and the kingdome of Fez:but the Xeriſe hath the better part, the richer,ſtronger,and more vnited : yet dare neither of them well make war vpon the other,
for

A for the neereneſſe of the King of Spaine, enemie vnto them both. Now then there remaineth the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes bordering vpon the Turke; and firſt the King of Polonia. What theſe two Princes can do the one againſt the other, hath beene ſeene in ſome former expeditions, wherein the Polonian had ſtill the worſe: yet it ſhould ſeeme, that of later time the Turke hath not bin greatly deſirous to mooue the Polonian too farre, for that being prouoked by diuers occaſions (namely in the reigne of Henry the third, in the warres that Iohn the Vayuod of Valachia had with the Turkes, many Polonian horſemen ſerued the ſayd Vayuod, though not indeed ſent from the King: and in the time of Sigiſmund the Polonian Coſſacks haue with diuers incurſions not a little troubled them: beſide the late motions of Iohn Zamoſchy the great Chancellor, and Generall of the Polonian forces, for the ſtaying of B the Tartars by the Turks ſent for) he hath bin content to comport the ſame, and not with his wonted pride ſought to be thereof reuenged, as he hath for far leſſe vpon ſome other princes. And on the other ſide, the Polonians ſince the vnfortunat expedition of King Ladiſlaus, neuer tooke vpon them any warres againſt the Turkes, neither gaue ſuch aid as they ſhould, vnto the Valachians their Confederats, but ſuffered to be taken from themſelues whatſoeuer they had toward the Euxine or Blacke Sea: a thing imputed rather vnto the want of courage in their Kings, than in the Nobility of that Kingdome. Sigiſmund the firſt being by Pope Leo X. inuited to the war againſt the Turks, anſwered them in theſe few words: Set you the Chriſtian Princes at vnity amongſt themſelues, and I for my part will not be wanting. Sigiſmund the ſecond ſo abhorred the wars, that he not only declined the Turks, but prouoked by C the Muſcouites, neuer ſought to reuenge the ſame. King Stephen (by the commendation of Amurath choſen King of Polonia) an indifferent eſteemer both of his enemies Forces and his owne, thought it a moſt dangerous thing to joyne battell with the Turke, and yet in priuate talke with his friends, would oftentimes ſay, That with thirty thouſand foot joyned vnto his Polonian horſemen, he durſt well to vndertake an expedition againſt the Turke: which he was ſuppoſed oftentimes to haue thought vpon. The Emperour, with the reſt of the Princes of the Houſe of Auſtria, are by a longer tract of ground joyned vnto this great empire of the Turks, than any one other Prince of the World, and beſtow in fortifications and maintenance of their garriſons, (wherein they haue continually aboue twenty thouſand horſe and foot) the greateſt part of their reuenues euen in the time of peace, much more in theſe D their long wars: and with the German forces joyned vnto their owne, are more carefull how to defend that they haue yet left, than how to recouer that they haue already loſt, or to enlarge their Empire. The Emperor Ferdinand with greater force than ſucceſſe vndertooke the vnfortunate expedition of Buda and Poſſega: which ſo euill fell out, not for that his forces were not ſufficient or ſtrong enough, but for that they wanted agility and dexterity. The truth is, thoſe his armies were ſtrong enough, and ſufficiently furniſhed with all things neceſſary, but conſiſted for the moſt part of Germans and Bohemians, ſlow and heauy people, vnfit to encounter with the Turks, a more ready and nimble kinde of ſouldiers. The Venetians alſo confrontier the Turks by many hundred miles, both by ſea and land, and defend themſelues rather by peaceable policy than force of armes: notably fortifying their ſtrong E Holds vpon their frontiers, declining by all meanes the dangers and charges of war, by Embaſſages and rich preſents, leauing nothing vnattempted (their liberty and ſtate preſerued) rather than to fall to wars. To ſay the truth of them, although they had both coyne and warlike prouiſion ſufficient, yet want they men and victuals anſwerable to ſo great a war againſt ſo puiſſant an Enemy. There remaineth onely the King of Spaine, of all other the great Princes either Chriſtians or Mahometans bordering vpon him, the beſt able to deale with him; his yearely reuenues ſo farre exceeding thoſe of the Turks, as that they are alſo probably thought to counteruaile the greateſt part of his Timariots: and his great Dominions in Spaine, Portugall, Naples, Sicilia, Millaine, Sardinia, and the Low-Countries (if they were with him at vnity) able to affourd vnto him ſo great and powerfull a ſtrength both by F ſea and land, as might make him dreadfull euen vnto the Great Turke when hee ſwelleth in his greateſt pride: but conſidering how his Forces are diſtracted for the maintenance of his wars at once in diuers places; as alſo for the neceſſary defence and keeping of his ſo large and diſperſed territories, not all the beſt of themſelues affected to the Spaniſh gouernment,

The King of Spaine, of all other Princes that border vpon the Turks, beſt able to wage war with him.

ment,he is not to be thought of himſelf ſtrong enough againſt the vnited forces of the great G Turke, whenſoeuer they ſhall chance to be imployed vpon him. So that by this we haue already ſaid,is eaſie to be gathered, how much the Turke is too ſtrong for any one the neighbor Princes, either Mahometans or Chriſtians, bordering vpon him, and therefore to be of them the more feared. Yet leſt ſome miſtaking me, might thinke, What, is then the Turke inuincible ? Farre be that thought from me,to thinke any enemy of Chriſt Ieſu(be his arme neuer ſo ſtrong) to be able to withſtand his power,either quite to deuoure his little flocke, rage he neuer ſo much about it. As for the Turke, the moſt dangerous and profeſſed enemy of the Chriſtian Commonweale, be his ſtrength ſo great, yea, and haply greater too than is before declared (the greatneſſe of his Dominion and Empire conſidered) yet is he not to be thought therefore either inuincible,or his power indeed ſo great,as it in ſhew ſeemeth for to H be:his Timariot horſmen(his greateſt ſtrength)diſperſed ouer his whole empire,being neuer poſſible the one halfe of them by him to be gathered into the body of one army: neither if they were ſo,poſſible in ſuch a multitude long to be kept together, liuing vpon no pay of his, but vpon ſuch ſtore and prouiſion only as they bring with them from their Timari,neuer ſufficient long to maintaine them. Beſides that,the policy of his ſtate hardly or neuer ſuffereth him to draw aboue a third part of his Timariots out of his countries where they dwell,for feare leſt the reſt of the people,by them ſtill kept vnder, ſhould in their abſence take vp arms againſt him in defence of themſelues and their antient liberty:whereafter the greateſt part of thoſe poore oppreſſed Soules, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians in euery Prouince of his Empire, awaiting but the opportunity,moſt deſirouſly longeth. So that more than two I parts of them being alwaies to be left at home for the neceſſary defence of the ſpacious borders of his ſo large an Empire, as alſo for the keeping in obedience of ſo many diſcontented Nations; it is a great matter, if he euen in his greateſt warres draw together of theſe kinde of ſouldiers the full number of an hundred and fifty thouſand ſtrong, making vp the reſt of his huge multitude with his Acanzij,liuing of no pay of his,but vpon the ſpoile of the enemy onely, the fifth part whereof they pay vnto him alſo. All which put together, what manner of men they be, and of what valour, not onely the ſmall Armies of the Chriſtians vnder the leading of their worthy Chiefetaines, Huniades, Scanderbeg, King Matthias, and others, haue to their immortall glory in former times made good proofe; but euen in this our age, and that as it were but the other day,the Tranſyluanian Prince, with diuers other Captaines and Commanders yet liuing, haue done the like alſo, as well witneſſeth the late battell of K Agria, wherein the Chriſtians, in number not halfe ſo many as the Turks, by plaine valour draue the great Sultan Mahomet himſelfe,(with Ibrahim Baſſa his Lieutenant Generall)out of the field, and had of him had the moſt notable victory that euer was got againſt that Enemy,had they not by too much careleſneſſe and vntimely deſire of ſpoyle, themſelues ſhamefully interrupted the ſame.But thus to let his horſemen paſſe,the chiefe ſtrength of his footmen are his Ianizaries,neuer in number exceeding twelue or foureteene thouſand,yet ſeldome times halfe ſo many euen in his greateſt armies,except he himſelfe be there in perſon preſent in the middeſt of them: who beſide the ſmall number of them, in the time of theſe their late voluptuous and effeminate Emperors,corrupted with the pleaſures of Conſtantinople, L and for want of their wonted diſcipline, haue together with their antient obedience and patience,loſt alſo a great part of their former reputation and valour: all the reſt of his footmen filling vp the body of his populous Army, being his Aſapi, rather pioners than ſouldiers, men of ſmall worth, and ſo accounted of both by the Turks and their Enemies alſo. So that all things well conſidered, his beſt ſouldiers being the leaſt part of his greateſt armies, and they alſo farre vnlike their predeceſſours the ſterne followers of the former Othoman Kings and Emperours, but men now giuen to pleaſure and delight; it is not otherwiſe to be thought,but that he bringeth into the field farre moe men than good ſouldiers, more brauery than true valour, more ſhew than worth, his multitude being his chiefeſt ſtrength, his ſuppoſed greatneſſe the terrour of his neighbour Princes, and both together the very Maieſty of M his Empire. Which although it be indeed very ſtrong,for the reaſons before alledged,yet is it by many probably thought to be now vpon the declining hand,their late Emperors in their owne perſons far degenerating from their warrelike progenitors, their ſouldiers generally giuing

A giuing themſelues to vnwonted pleaſures, their antient diſcipline of war neglected, their ſuperſtition not with ſo much zeale as of old regarded, and rebellions in diuers parts of his Empire of late ſtrangely raiſed, and mightily ſupported: all the ſignes of a declining State. Which were they not at all to be ſeene, as indeed they be very pregnant; yet the greatneſſe of the Empire being ſuch, as that it laboureth nothing more than with the weightineſſe of it ſelfe, it muſt needs (after the manner of worldly things) of it ſelfe fall, and againe come to nought, no man knowing when nor how ſo great a worke ſhould be brought to paſſe, but he in whoſe deepe counſels all theſe great reuolutions of Empires and Kingdomes are from eternity ſhut vp: who at his pleaſure ſhall in due time by ſuch meanes as he ſeeth beſt, accompliſh the ſame, to the vnſpeakeable comfort of his poore afflicted flocke, in one place or B other ſtill in danger to be by this roaring Lyon deuoured. Which worke of ſo great wonder, He for his ſonne our Sauior Chriſt his ſake, the glory of his name, and comfort of many thouſand oppreſſed Chriſtians, fed with the bread of carefulneſſe amidſt the furnace of tribulation, in mercy haſten, that we with them, and they with vs, all as members of one body, may continually ſing, Vnto him be all honour and praiſe World without end.

TO THE HONORABLE
Sr Thomas Rowe.

Sir,

AS your Vertues haue made you eminent, ſo your Fortunes haue confirmed that eminence, not only with knowing diſcerners, but others the moſt ignorant, that informe themſelues from mens outſides, and the Gloſſe which ſucceſſe ſets vpon their actions. Amongſt thoſe vertues, your φιλανθρωπία with all it's ſignifications, hath not the leaſt place; being one free to cheriſh worthy endeauors in others, by condeſcending to their defects: And in this aſſurance, I (a ſtranger) am bold to preſent my following labors to be judged of by you; and to the ſentence you paſſe vpon them, all other cenſures ſhall ſubſcribe. I confeſſe I wiſh ſome of my few yeares had been ſpent abroad, where I might haue informed my ſelfe better from obſeruation, than from report: for my contemplatiue knowledge renders me more ſubject to errors, than a practiue would haue done. Yet if the enſuing hath an allowance from you, your known judgemnt will command in all men a good opinion of it, and my defects herein be made excuſeable, by the ſlenderneſſe of my intelligence. My deſire is to be reckoned amongſt the humbleſt of your Seruants, Thomas Nabbes.

A CONTINVATION OF THE TVRKISH HISTORIE, FROM THE YEARE OF OVR LORD 1628, TO THE END OF THE YEARE 1637.

Collected out of the Diſpatches of Sr Peter Wyche Knight, Embaſſador at Conſtantinople, and others:

By Thomas Nabbes.

D THat I begin with a ſeeming impertinencie, if it appear an error, it is voluntarie and conſideratiue; and therfore let the following reaſons ſatisfie or excuſe it. Actions that may be preſidents to poſteritie, ought to haue their records, and merit a carefull preſeruation. This (if wee conſider the perſon, deſigne, or ſucceſſe) will be allowed both honorable and imitable, though ſubiect to diuerſitie of cenſures, till clear judgments confirm it from the circumſtances. Why it ſhould or may take place here, is, That the Scene of its execution was in places belonging to the Turkes, and by conſequence had, or at leaſtwiſe required a determination of juſtice by the grand Signior.

E SIR Kenelme Digby (authoriſed by his Maieſtie of Great Britaines ſpecial Commiſſion vnder the great Seale of England, for a deſigne againſt the French, then his Maieſties enemies (the period of which deſigne pointed at thoſe parts) with ſix ſhips, of which his own went Admirall; after many encounters by the way, vpon the 10 of Iune 1628, came before cape Congure, where hee lay at Hull faire all that night. The Cape is about ten leagues from Scanderon; whence on the morrow in the afternoone he ſent his boat wel armed to deſcry the road, and to bring him ſome intelligence. Which they did the next morning, F hauing met with ſome Venetian boats that were fiſhing, with which Venetians they paſſed for Maltæſes: for there were in Sr Kenelmes boat both Maltæſes and Greeks. They brought word that there were at anchor in the road two Venetian Galliaſſes, (which the Engliſh call Galligroſſes) two other Gallions, two Engliſh ſhips, and foure French Veſſels, one of which came in but the day before, being very rich, and hauing as yet vnladed nothing. Sir Kenelme 1628. ſpent all the night following in ouerſeeing the preparations for fight and firing in his ſeuerall G ſhips; for that hee expected a fierce onſet the next day from the Venetians, who had declared themſelues the garders of that Road, and were reported to haue giuen out, They would ſink all the Engliſh men of War they ſhould meet either in their own, or in the grand Signiors ſeas. Which peremptorineſſe, if true, including an intent of diſhonor to the nation, could not but exaſperat any true Engliſh ſpirit, eſpecially of the nobler difference. This mooued not yet Sr Kenelme to any violence of paſſion, but that with a carefull temper and diſcreet iudgement, he prepared himſelfe and fitted his ſhips at all points, for all occaſions.

And here though it be a digreſſion, (ſince it may be worth an obſeruation, eſpecially with the Curious) let me inſert a report of his own, with the preface of his proteſtation in the way of caution, That he was neither ſo ſimple or ſuperſtitious, as vainely to builde a faith vpon H any waies of diuination, ſuch as the Sortes Virgilianæ, which the Antients much relied vpon, and of which the Romane hiſtories haue many ſtrange examples, that make them ſeeme no leſſe than Oracles: yet thus it hapned to Sr Kenelme, that being wearied with cares, and deſirous to ſleep vpon the poup, till the wind might ſerue to bring them in; amongſt other cogitations, the remembrance of theſe Sortes intermixt it ſelfe, and by accident one that was neere him was reading Virgil. Which Sr Kenelme taking, hauing firſt conceiued the chance of a number for the verſe which hee ſhould take; vpon that leafe where hee opened the booke, theſe two following preſented themſelues:

Æneas celſa in puppi jam certus eundi I Carpebat ſomnos, rebus jam ritè paratis.

In's lofty ſhip Æneas bent to goe, Slept, at all points prepar'd to meet his Foe.

Which falling out ſo fit to the preſent circumſtances, and the relation they had to the Trojans inſuing fortunes, was receiued betwixt jeaſt and earneſt for a very good omen, and became the inſtrument of an encouragement, by being made the concluſion of a ſhort ſpeech to his men. For it ſeemed to confirm their reſolutions, and preuent the diſturbance of them, by any diſpute that might ariſe concerning the iuſtneſſe of Sir Kenelmes deſigne and pro- K ceeding.

But his iudgement took another courſe for the ſtrengthning of his cauſe, and that the iuſtneſſe of it might the better commaund the attendanſe of ſucceſſe (reſpecting notwithſtanding his Honour, before any politique ſafety which might tend to diſreputation) he ſent his Sattie in before to the Venetian General (the Galliaſſes hauing weighed anchor, and beeing come within halfe a league of his ſhips) with letters; which letters declared to the Venetians, That his voyage of warfare was by his Maieſties Commiſſion; and gaue them aſſurance of all reſpect and friendſhip, and that the French were the onely obiects of his attempts, for which he had ſufficient Warrant. To the two Engliſh ſhips he likewiſe ſent letters, to ſettle the diſquiet he conceiued their fears had put them in, and to giue them ſatisfaction, That his L buſineſſe was no way to diſturb their negotiations. But before the Satties boat could come aboord to deliuer the anſwer, the Admirall Galliaſſe of the Venetians diſcharged ſeuen or eight ſhots; the firſt of which lighting ſhort, was receiued as a ſalute, and returned with a piece from themwards: but ſome of the reſt hitting his ſhip, and one ſhot at his flag, together with the Satties ariuall and information, their intents were known; and Sr Kenelm to let them know, that his long forbearance was no apprehenſion of fear he had of their ſtrength and aduantage, but a ſtrengthning of his Cauſes juſtice, gaue them three or four broad ſides in a verie ſhort ſpace, which did ſo much ſpoyle both to the French and the Venetians, (who found pretence by this time, That their quarrell was the protection of the French, which they had vndertaken) that they were inforced to retyre, and fight at a more wary diſtance. In the mean M time Sr Kenelm playd ſo wel vpon their gallions, that the men ſtowed themſelues vnder hold, and left the Veſſels to their fortune without any guidance. The Galliaſſes then comming vp to their ſuccour, receiued ſuch a rude welcome, that they rowed away, to ſhelter themſelues vnder the Engliſh ſhips which lay in the road. Which policie was a ſure defence to them;

A them; for Sr Kenelme was ſo cautious, that he would rather loſe an opportunitie of offending his enemies, than take hold of it to his countrymens offence. The Galliaſſes thus leauing action, to be witneſſes of it only at that ſafe diſtance, the gallions were in great danger, their men being ſtowed vnder hatches; but that Sr Kenelme directing all his indeauors againſt the French (from whom hee had receiued the moſt dammage) gaue way to their quiet without much diſturbance, more than what proceeded from their owne feares; and perceiuing the French to come vp cloſe (their ſhips being luſty Veſſels, ſome hauing ſix and twenty pieces of ordnance) he firſt directed his two leſſer ſhips to deal with them: but quickly taking notice of the aduantage, ſent the rere-Admirall to their ſuccor; by which means the three ſhips boorded and took each of them a ſeuerall prize; the fourth French ſhip being run aground at B the beginning of the fight: to which this ſucceſſe gaue an end after three houres.

It is remarkable, That in this fight not one of Sr Kenelmes men receiued a hurt to death, and of the Venetians and French there were ſlain ninety nine perſons: of whom one was commander of the Venetian land ſoldiers, a braue and generous man, whoſe loſſe was much lamented by them, and pittied by Sr Kenelme. The Admirall Galliaſſe of the Venetians was the onely one of thoſe four which the Venetians ſent to the King of Spain, that returned from the battel of 88; where ſhe fought with Sr Martin Frobiſher in the Triumph of the Queen, whilſt the other three were ſunk or fired. Since when, ſhe hath been preſerued by putting in of new pieces where need required (as they ſay the Athenians did the gally of Salaminco) ſo that now nothing of her was remaining of thoſe times but the mould.

C This action and ſucceſſe of Sr Kenelme, though perhaps clear in it ſelfe, became queſtionable by the grand Signiors Miniſters, through the complaints of the French and Venetians; ſo that the Baſſa of Aleppo and the Cadi of Scanderon took hold of the occaſion, to practiſe & exact an Auanea vpon the Engliſh Merchants, taking from the Engliſh Conſul at Aleppo a large ſum, which he through fear of any ſhips retention deliuered without much reſiſtance, and ſo appeaſed and calmed that ruggedneſſe, which notwithſtanding proued afterwards an aggrauation in other cauſes.

For ſhortly after, William Bundock captain of an Engliſh ſhip called the Safe Bonaventure, hauing lien ſome time at Zant in harbor, went out to ſea for purchaſe, and fell vpon a ſhip trading betwixt Meſſina and Malta, that belonged to Haggi Caſſum, Coſmo Orlando, and others, D ſubiects of the grand Signior, and had letters of ſafe conduct from the Imperiall Port. This ſhip Captain Bundock making prize of, the complaint arriued at the Port, to a ſudden diſturbance of Sr Peter Wyche the Engliſh Embaſſador there reſiding. Which complaint made the more noiſe, for that the Chimacham, Captaine Baſſa, and other principall miniſters pretended themſelues intereſſed therein, hauing committed monies to the charge of the Captain of the ſhip taken, for the redemption of Turkiſh captiues at Meſſina, Malta, and other places. Which particular pleading, with their aptneſſe to make any thing a cauſe for practiſes vpon ſtrangers, the Vizier ſent his expreſſe commaund for the detention of two Engliſh ſhips then in the Port, called the London and the William, ſo to compell a reſtitution. Vpon which the Embaſſador went to the grand Signiors Court, and after much arguing, and a E ſecond repair to the principal Miniſters, making it appear what a diſreſpect it would bee to his Maieſty of England, and how vniuſt it would ſeem to the world, obtained a releaſe for the preſent, but without any final determination.

The Embaſſador in this buſineſſe made vſe of all faire endeauors and policies, for the gaining of time, til his delaies bringing him into ſome ſuſpition of a neglect, the Ianizaries anew inſenced the Vizier, by reuiuing it, with a pretence of loſſe which they receiued by Bundock; and procured a peremptory order, that all ſhould be made good preſently. Which Order being notified to the Embaſſador by a Chiaus, he replied, and ſent it by a Druggerman: which notwithſtanding gaue no ſatisfaction to the paſſion of the Vizier, who to inſinuate himſelfe with the Ianizaries, gaue way to moſt of their outrages. So that the Embaſſadour F to preuent his houſe being aſſaulted, was inforced to giue 500 Dollars amongſt the Ianizaries, and ſo all was calmed again, till ſome following accidents of like nature reuiued the memorie of it.

TO the glorious amongſt the great Maieſties of the Chriſtian Princes, and reuerenced of the great Potentates of the people of Meſſiah, Director of the eminent affaires of the Nation of Nazareth, true Lord of the Robe of Honor and Grace, and Patron of greatneſſe and glory ; CHARLES King of England, whoſe daies the Lord accompliſh with happineſſe. H

AT the arriuall of this our ſublime and Imperiall Signet be it informed, That at the bleſſed Throne of our high Port, which at this preſent (by the mercy of the Diuine Majeſtie of the high and iuſt God, and the celeſtiall protection and care of our Prophet Mahomet Muſtapha, the Sun of this and the other world) is the true ſanctuarie of the Princes of the world, and the refuge of the Emperours of the preſent Age ; there arriued your Maieſties Royall Letters, ſent with your Embaſſadour, the honoured amongſt the people of Meſſias, the eſteemed and famous Lord, and your truſty Sir Peter Wyche, whoſe I end be happy. The intent whereof being by our honoured high Counſellors and Procurators declared and interpreted, and preſented at our Imperiall Throne, wee haue entertained euerie particular affaire thereof into our perfect knowledge, and admitted the aforeſaid Sir Peter Wyche, with your former Embaſſador Sir Thomas Rowe, to be conducted to our Imperiall Divan, and with all acceptance, Royall curteſie, honour and gratitude, entertained and honoured ; both of them being graced and renowned with hauing kiſſed our Imperiall Veſt. The former we haue diſpatched to your Maieſtie with our Imperiall Letters, and his ſucceſſor is ſetled in our bleſſed Port in charge of his Embaſſage ; both of them be bleſſed, in regard they haue borne themſelues loyally, and alwaies proceeded wiſely, in all worthy and commendable K wiſe procuring the continuance of friendſhip, from both parts, and duely obſeruing the Articles of our good Peace: The worthineſſe of whom is deriued from your Maieſties moſt ſincere affection ; which is alſo the cauſe of the increaſe of our loue and reſpect. For as when the root of the tree is ſound and nouriſhing, it bringeth forth good and perfect fruit, ſo the Seruants of gratious and wiſe Princes are alwaies diſcreet and prudent.

The grand Signior remits the cuſtom of Engliſh cloath.

The chiefe particular in your Maieſties letters intimated (and of which alſo your Embaſſador Sir Peter Wych hath informed vs) is, That our Viſier Baſſa Muſtapha being aſigned to examine certaine grieuances in Natolia ; ariuing in the parts of Smyrna, hath vniuſtly taken L four thouſand Dollars from your Conſull. As ſoone as it arriued at our knowledge, That he had contrary to honourable Juſtice, committed ſo vile an action, wee called him before our bleſſed throne, and to the example and diſcipline of others, chaſtiſed and gaue him his deſerued puniſhment. For in this time of our bleſſed reign, it is not our Imperiall will that the leaſt iniurie be committed, as in this particular it ſhall be manifeſted, and appear to reaſon.

He hath further ſolicited with vs, That the cuſtome appointed to be impoſed vpon cloath, which from your Realme of England is brought into our Dominions, might be diſclaimed: which we haue alſo granted, and whatſoeuer elſe is due to loue and friendſhip, or anſwerable M to the termes of relation and commerce. From antient times to this we haue beene euer accuſtomed to obſerue and honor thoſe gratious Princes, that with ſincere and loyall mindes haue ſhewn pure loue and affection to our renowned and Imperiall Throne ; at whoſe requeſts wee are

A are ready to imploy our ſublime care and attention, ſo that whilſt your Maieſtie ſhall continue in the direct way to be conſtant in loue and affection, our friendſhip ſhall certainly be, as it euer hath bin, firm and inviolable.

Your Majeſty ſhall vnderſtand, That Haggi Caſſum and Coſmo, Owners, inhabitants of our well fortified city of Conſtantinople (the Centre of our Empire) going in their Veſſell from Ligorne in Meſſina, towards Malta, to redeeme certain Muſſulman Captiues, were incountred by an Engliſh Captain named William Bundocke, who boorded them, and tooke from them in mony, ſilkes, pieces of ordnance, with other goods and merchandiſes belonging to B the ſhip, to the value of 34000 Dollars. Of which preſumptuous action (ſo contrary to our good peace and friendſhip) we being informed, haue thought it requiſite and neceſſary to acquaint your Maieſty, and haue therfore expreſſed it in theſe our Imperiall Letters, to the end that your Majeſty may cauſe the 34000 Dollars to be reſtored to the aforeſaid Haggi Caſſum and Coſmo the true Owners. Therefore it is neceſſary at the arriuall hereof, That in conformitie to the great loue and ſincere affection which your Majeſty beareth to our ſublime Port, your Majeſty cauſe the aforeſaid Captaine to reſtore the ſaid foure and thirty thouſand dollars to the iuſt owners, & that herafter the conditions and articles of peace and friendſhip betweene vs contracted and eſtabliſhed, may be obſerved and kept inviolable; as on our C part the aforeſaid articles and agreements of peace and friendſhip haue bin, and ſhall euer be continued: whereupon peace and good correſpondence ſhal not only increaſe and flouriſh euery day, but produce more good and profitable effects.

To conclude, Your Maieſty knoweth that in no wiſe it is our conſent, That in the time of our Empire the leaſt iniury be done to any: and therfore if your Maieſty remain conſtant and firm in the friendſhip and ſinceritie profeſſed, and deſire we ſhould obſerue the good peace and correſpondence, your Majeſty will cauſe the ſaid Captaine to reſtore the full value of the money and goods to the wronged Owners; and puniſh the ſaid Captain, that hereafter none ſhal dare D to commit the like hoſtile action, ſo contrary to our good peace and friendſhip.

Vpon the receit of theſe Letters from the grand Signior, his majeſtie returned this anſwer E following.

CHARLES, by the grace of the moſt high God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland; the moſt puiſſant Defender of the true Chriſtian Faith, &c.

F TO the moſt high and mighty Emperour, Sultan Morat Han, chiefe Lord and Commander of the Muſſulman Kingdome, ſole and ſupream Monarch of the Eaſtern Empire, &c. ſendeth Greeting.

Right

1628. Right high, right excellent, and right mighty Emperour: By your Princely letters, G of the tenth of Nouember 1628, which came not to our hands vntill the month of June laſt, we haue vnderſtood of the receipt of our Letters directed to your Majeſty by our faithfull ſeruant Sir Peter Wyche, our Embaſſadour reſident in your Imperiall Port at Conſtantinople, and with great and ſingular contentment haue taken notice of your Princely fauours, in the admittance of our ſaid ſeruant and Embaſſador to your Jmperiall preſence, thereby expreſsing your firme and conſtant purpoſe to continue in ſtrict amity with vs; which we do embrace with all Princely entertainement, and ſhall be ready to performe all good offices which may conduce to the maintenance and preſeruation of the H ſame. In our ſaid Letters we recommend vnto your royall Majeſties juſtice, That reſtitution and ſatisfaction might be made vnto our Merchants, trading in your Majeſties Port at Conſtantinople, for Dollars, 4000, vnjuſtly, and with great oppreſsion, extorted from our Conſull reſident in Smyrna, by Muſtapha Baſſa, vpon whom your Majeſty writeth puniſhment hath been inflicted according to his deſerts, but our Merchants haue receiued no ſatisfaction, as we expected out of your Princely juſtice they ſhould haue had. And therefore they are againe become humble petitioners to our Majeſty, to recommend their ſaid complaint to your Imperiall Majeſty, deſiring that juſtice may be done them accordingly. Whereof we ſhall I not doubt, in as much as your Majeſty maketh ſuch royall expreſsion of your deſire and willingneſſe to correſpond in amity with vs. And whereas it hath pleaſed your Majeſty, vpon the inſtance of our Embaſſador reſident in your Jmperiall Port, to take off the Narge vpon all ſuch Cloath as ſhall be brought into your Dominions; therein your Majeſty hath expreſſed your prudent reſpect to encourage our Merchants, for the inlargement of their trade into your Dominions, for the profit of both our Subjects, and the firme eſtabliſhment of the loue, friendſhip, and good correſpondency betweene our Kingdomes.

And to teſtifie with how great and intire affection we deſire to entertaine, and continue K peace and friendſhip with your Imperiall Majeſty, and as far as is poſsible and in our power to preuent occaſions tending to the contrary, We haue cauſed that part of your highneſſe Letter concerning the complaint made by Haggi Caſſum and Coſmo Orlando, againſt William Bundocke our ſubject, That he ſhould haue taken a ſhip belonging to the ſaid Haggi Caſſum and Coſmo, and taken out of her in mony, ſilks, artillery, and other goods belonging to the ſhip, to the value of 34000 Dollars, to be duely examined in our high Court of Admiralty, and by examination of the ſaid Bundocke, and many others of his ſhips company, and ſome of the mariners belonging to the ſhip of Coſmo, taken vpon Oath: Thereby it appeareth, L That he tooke not in mony and goods, aboue the value of 8500 Dollars, which we cauſed to be depoſited immediately vpon the arriuall of the ſaid Bundocke, in our Court of Admiralty, where there hath beene a Legall proceeding before our Judge. And for that our merchants trading in your majeſties Dominions, vpon whoſe humble petition we cauſed the ſaid mony and goods to be ſtated, had not receiued any authenticall Teſtimony, or Procura from the Proprietars of the ſaid mony and goods; they wanted meanes to proſecute the ſuite, and in the meane time one Almango Saluettey, a ſubject of the Duke of Florence, hauing receiued a ſufficient power and authenticke proofes from Coſmo Orlando, hath obtained ſentence in our Court of Admiralty for all the ſaid mony and goods, and is in poſſeſsion of the ſame, M to the vſe and behoofe of the ſaid Coſmo Orlando; who being an inhabitant within your maieſties royall City of Conſtantinople, is ſubject by your maieſties juſtice to be reſpondent to any others, which may pretend intereſt in the ſaid mony and goods, and to that purpoſe our Embaſſador

A Embaſſador is fully inſtructed, and ſhall receiue authenticall Coppies of the whole proceedings 1629. in our Court of Admiralty, to whom your maieſty may pleaſe to giue credit. And as it will plainely appeare vnto your Princely maieſty, with what affection and readineſſe we haue expreſſed our care and princely attention to do iuſtice to all your ſubiects, and to entertaine and cheriſh all occaſions to teſtifie our ſincere loue and friendſhip, and to maintaine the termes of our good neighbourhood and correſpondency betweene vs. So if your maieſty ſhall deſire to maintaine and continue the ſaid peace and friendſhip together with vs, we ſhall expect from your highneſſe the like correſpondency of iuſtice to our Subiects. Aſſuring your maieſty it B ſhall be much diſpleaſing vnto vs, when any occaſion ſhall be offered by any our Subiects, to call in queſtion the antient friendſhip inuiolably on our parts continued, betweene our royall Progenitors and the mighty Monarchs of the Othoman Empire. And although we cannot doubt but that your maieſty with like affection and ſincerity, doth embrace our Princely loue and friendſhip; yet our Subiects trading in your highneſſe Dominions, haue lately made humble Petition vnto vs, lamenting their wrongs, and vnſufferable iniuries and damages done vnto them by your Miniſters and Officers in Aleppo, by impriſoning their Conſull, ſealing vp their Warehouſe-dores, and extorting from them 50000 Dollars in mony at the leaſt, no cauſe at all being giuen by our ſaid merchants, or any of them, the particulars whereof, C our Embaſſador is able to informe your maieſty at large, praying your maieſty to take into your Princely conſideration, that ſatiſfaction may be giuen for ſo great an oppreſſion, and the Offenders puniſhed, as in iuſtice their offence ſhould deſerue. Conſidering how much it doth import vs in our Princely honour, to take care that our Subiects may be righted in their iuſt grieuances, and that it is alſo neceſſary, in conformity to the loue, and ſincere affection that your maieſty beareth to vs and our friendſhip, that our Subiects may be maintained in their peaceable trade, within your Dominions, and freed from exactions, extortions, and oppreſſions. And that all ſuch as ſhall agrieue them therewith, may be held as contemners D and violaters of the ſincere Peace and Amity betweene vs, and receiue puniſhment according to the offence of ſo high a nature. We haue alſo thought good to ſignifie vnto your maieſty, That whereas of late yeares, diuers of our Subiects haue letten out to fraight vnto the Venetians ſome of their ſhipping, both aſwell to, as from your maieſties Ports, and doe therby beare the Colours of the State of Venice, to the great diſhonour of our Perſon and Soueraigntie, contrary to the expreſſe command by vs giuen vnto our Subiects, and do alſo deny to pay vnto our Conſull, ſuch antient duties as hath beene vſuall, and accuſtomed, and belonging vnto vs, by our Capitulations, and Commandements from your maieſtie in that behalfe, E pretending that your maieſtie hath of late giuen your royall command vnto the Venetian Embaſſador reſident in Conſtantinople, That they ſhall neither pay thoſe antient duties, nor beare our Flags in our owne ſhipping, whileſt they remaine in their ſeruice. The particulars whereof we ſhall referre to our Embaſſador, expecting that your maieſtie, both herein, and in all other cauſes of our Subiects iuſt complaints, will do nothing contrary to the Law of Nations, the diſhonour of our ſelfe, and the preiudice of the amity and friendſhip betweene vs, which on our part ſhall be kept inuiolable. And ſo we wiſh you health and true felicity.

Giuen at our Royall Honour of Hampton Court, the eleuenth F day of October, in the yeare of our Lord 1629, and of our reigne of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, the fifth.

The

1629. The grand Signior after much debating in counſell, made prouiſion to renew his War in G Perſia, as the only deſigne of honor and conſequence. For though the Turkiſh Empire, ingaged in many troubles, required a judicious and more than common prouidence to keepe it vpright where ſo many dangers attempted it, and bearing more ſhew of declination now than euer; yet the diſgrace of Halil Baſſa's retyring from Arzirum, and the loſſe of the treaſure and munition there, ſo much inflamed the new choſen Vizier Huſſeruph Baſſa, that he minded nothing but a vindication vpon the Perſian. Neither did it want a ground of policie; for had he not declared himſelf ready to attempt ſomthing that way, there was appearance he might haue ſhared in Halil Baſſa's puniſhment, which was diſplacing from his great authority of Vizier: which notwithſtanding to Halil might not iuſtly be imputed a diſgrace, ſince the fault that drew on this puniſhment might not be want of vertue but fortune. H Huſſeruph Baſſa now great Vizier, hauing made prouiſion the year before, and all things being now in readineſſe, paſſed ouer with the army into the plains of Scutari on Aſia ſide, vpon the 27 of May, 1629; where he remained fourteene daies, and then proceeded in his march towards Babylon. In the mean time the Captaine Baſſa went forth with the gallies into the Mediterranian; where after many incounters by the way to Rhodes, whilſt he remained there in harbor, he ſent Huſſein the Sangerbegh of Lemnos with ſome veſſels to diſcouer the Enemies coaſts. Where Huſſein incountring with a veſſel of Genoa laden with ſpices, made prize of it, and hauing manned it with twelue Turks, ſent it toward the port. By the way a ſhip of London called the Golden Cocke, of which Iohn Barker was maſter, meeting with this Sattia, again repriſed her, and caried her away to Zant. Vpon which the Captaine Baſſa ſent his I complaint to the Engliſh Embaſſador, to his great diſturbance, and almoſt a danger of deſtroying all Engliſh trade in the Levant. For the Captain Baſſa preſently to reuenge & command reſtitution, cauſed an Engliſh ſhip called the Rainbow to be detained and carried into the Port of Scio. Which ſhip by the Embaſſadors endeauors, and the expence of ſome money, being releaſed, was vpon a new aggrauation of the former complaint againe detained: which drew new troubles vpon the Embaſſadour, that could not end in a ſucceſſe, vntill the grand Signior had diſpatched his letters of complaint to his Maieſty of England, drawne from the articles and capitulations of peace concluded vpon, and on the Engliſh part in this particular violated. Which letters had this form following.

The Grand Signiors Letter to his Majeſty of Great Britaine.

TO the glorious amongſt the greateſt Maieſties of Chriſtian Princes, and reuerenced amongſt the great Potentates of the people of the Meſſias, ſole Director of the eminent occurrences of the Nation of the Nazarits, and L true Lord of the habit of Honour and Grace, and Patron of the appearances of Greatneſſe and Glory, CHARLES King of England; whoſe laſt days we pray almighty God may end in goodneſſe: Vnto whoſe Royal preſence ſhall be made known by our high and Imperiall Form,

WHereas from antient time vntill this preſent, the termes of good correſpondence haue alwaies bin obſerued with the happy Port and our Imperiall Houſe, and that the ſtipulated conditions of the Peace and amitie between vs, haue bin kept and obſerued, and that alwaies your Merchants that goe to trade by ſea, and your ſubiects ſhips which come to our bright Port, meeting at ſea with the Turkiſh ſhips M and others, they haue not done them any moleſtation or damage; your ſaid ſhips comming and going alwaies in theſe parts with all friendly tearmes, and likewiſe there not being committed by our ſubiects any action or thing contrary to our Imperial Couenant giuen, nor proceeded againſt the conditions of our good Peace, which hath bin euer obſerued by vs in the year paſt: The Sanderbegh of Lemnos, the worſhipful among

A mong the noble Captaines, called Huſſein Begh, he being charged by our Imperiall Command, to go and 1629. inquire news from the coaſt and enemies parts, and to get ſome knowledge of their fortunat actions ; being ariued with his Galley neer vnto the ſaid Enemies country, hee hath met with a pinnace of the Enemies which came from the parts of the Indies, laden with pepper, Cinnamon, Sugar, and other Indian commodities
; and the men in the ſame ſeeing the ſaid Captaine, and not being able to reſiſt him, fled on ſhore and left the Pinnace empty. The ſaid Captain took her, and made it his prize, and put twelue Turkiſh men of his into her, without taking any the leaſt thing out of her, and ſo ſent and directed her thus vntoyled; vnto our happy Port ; and afterwards he returned to performe the ſeruice committed to his charge, to inquire after newes. Which twelue Turks conducting and bringing hither the ſaid Prize, beeing arriued neer the Iſle of Zant, ſubiect to the Venetians, an Engliſh ſhip called the Golden Cocke, of which Iohn B Barker was Maſter, incountred with her, and going vpon her, tooke all the Turks which were in the ſayd Pinnace, into his ſhip, and examined them. They hauing told him the truth of the ſucceſſe and caſe iuſt as it is before related, he permitted ten of them to go away, and with great vexation gaue the torture to the two remaining ; telling them, That they muſt ſay the ſaid Pinnace was a prize taken from them of Algier, or otherwiſe he would cauſe them to be ſlain. Which vntruth the two men would not conſent to ſay, but related the ſame to him in the manner aforeſaid. Neuertheleſſe he would not beleeue them, but tooke the ſaid Pinnace vniuſtly out of their hands, and brought her to Zant, and cauſed to be emptied out of her into his own ſhip, all the wares and merchandiſes which were found in her, which goods amounted to 80000 Dollars. And after that, the ſaid Captaine by his Letter to our high Port certified, That the ſaid Maſter afterwards ſold the ſaid Pinnace in the ſaid place of Zant. There came alſo one of thoſe two that had been C tortured by him, and did tell and relate it all : and there being at that inſtant one of your Gallions detained here at our happy Port, and that on the behalfe our ſea Generall, there were letters written and ſent to the Gouernor of Zant, to the end that the ſaid pinnace might be recouered out of his hand ; there comming a letter and anſwer from the ſaid Gouernor of Zant, That before the ſaid letters were arriued, the ſaid ſhip-maſter had already emptied all the goods of the ſaid Pinnace into his owne ſhip, and had ſold the ſaid pinnace, and with great ſpeed was departed for England. And this beeing intimated to our Imperiall preſence, ſuch deeds of the ſaid ſhip-maſter being a thing proceeding much againſt the good peace and couenants, our Imperiall command was giuen, That your ſaid Gallion ſhould not be permitted to depart. But there being a new petition made to our Imperiall Throne by our aforeſaid ſea Generall, That your Embaſſador now here in our happy port prayed, that your aforeſaid Gallion might be ſet at libertie, and that hee D would ſee the goods and merchandiſes recouered, that were vniuſtly taken out of the ſaid Pinnace : We accepted of the petition and requeſt of your ſaid Embaſſador, and of the ſurety giuen to our ſea General, That the ſhip-maſter who committed ſuch an act ſo contrary to our good friendſhip, ſhall be puniſhed and chaſtiſed, and that all the goods and merchandiſes which were taken out of the ſaid Pinnace, ſhall be ſent back to our high Port : We gaue our Imperiall command, That your ſaid Gallion ſhould be permitted to depart in manner. Becauſe your Maieſty ſhould be pleaſed not to conſent, that any action be committed by any one, contrary to the ſame our good peace, we haue writ and ſent vnto you this our preſent Imperial letter ; at the arriuall whereof it is required, That according to the ſincere friendſhip and louing affection which your Majeſty beareth vnto vs, and vnto our happy Houſe, you would vſe your benigne care and fauour in this particular buſineſſe, and to giue order that the ſaid ſhip-maſter may be found, who hath violated the E couenants of the good peace contracted between vs ; and to do ſo, that all the goods and merchandiſes may be wholly recouered, or the monies for the ſame, which were leuied and taken out of the ſaid Pinnace, and that all of it may be conſigned and ſent hither to our high Port : and that ſuch deſerued puniſhment and chaſtiſement may be inflicted vpon the ſaid ſhip-maſter, who hath bin bold with ſuch indignation to interrupt and cauſe the diſturbance of the good friendſhip betweene vs, which now for ſo long time hath beene proſperouſly aduanced ; that he may ſerue for an euident example, and a good leſſon for after ages, that in time to come, not any one in the leaſt maner whatſoeuer, may haue any more inclination, or bee diſpoſed to preiudice our good peace. Finally, Since on our part and our Captains that go to ſea, there is not any moleſtation or wrong done to any the ſhips or merchants your ſubiects, but that they go and come ſafely and ſecurely into our Dominions, and the articles of the good peace and amitie between vs are punctually by vs F obſerued ; it is euident and clear, that ſuch vnreaſonable and euill deeds committed by your ſubiects , ſhall neuer be praiſed or admitted by wiſe perſons. Therefore we remain confident, that your Maieſty will not only ſhew your loue herein, and not in any maner permit any conditions that ſhall tend to the preiudice of the good foundation of our ſaid good peace and beſt correſpondence, but alſo according to our Imperiall deſire, will mke, that all the aforeſaid goods taken out of the ſaid pinnace ſhall be wholly recouered from the 1629. ſaid Shipmaſter, and that the ſame be ſent with the firſt vnto our high Port, aſſuring your ſelfe that by giuing him his due puniſhment, your Majeſty will manifeſt and ſhew your ſincere loue and affection that you haue vnto our high Port. And ſo we reſt, expecting that you will aduiſe vs with the firſt to haue effected it all. G

Written in the Moneth of December 1629.

The Captaine Baſſa all this while practiſed according to his inclination, with Turkiſh violence and liberty in any vſe of occaſion, according to Menander (though I preſume the Captaines learning deriued it not thence) καιρὸς ἐςὶ τῶν νόμων κρείττων πολύ: Occaſion is more powerfull than Lawes. So that whatſoeuer he did, though vnjuſt, his pretences excuſed and gloſſed with a ſhew of lawfulneſſe; vntill his Majeſty of England returned a ſatisfaction to the Grand Signior by his Letters royall, wherein the puniſhment of Barker by impriſonment was notified, together with his Majeſties command for reſtitution (which was accordingly performed by the Embaſſador, notwithſtanding, ſome practiſes of the Venetian Baylo, who argued to deale vnderhand, and thereby obtaine ſome pretences of his owne, which the Embaſſador conceiued might be prejudiciall to his Majeſties juſtice) ſetled all theſe diſquiets by a releaſe from the Grand Signior. The forme of which releaſe, followeth his Majeſties Letter. H

CHARLES, by the grace of the moſt high God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, the moſt puiſſant Defendor of the true Chriſtian Faith.

TO the moſt high and mighty Emperor, Sultan Morat Han, chiefe Lord and Commander of the Muſſulman Kingdome, ſole and ſupreme Monarch of the Eaſterne Empire, ſendeth Greeting. K

RIght high, right excellent, and right Mighty Emperor, There are now fifty yeares paſt, ſince a friendly correſpondency of peace and amity hath been contracted and continued betweene the Imperiall Othoman Family, and our Regall State, and is now without intermiſſion deſcended to the preſent time of your Imperiall Majeſty, and our Royall Selfe; which the eternall God continue with length of yeares and all other felicities.

Now foraſmuch as it is impoſſible that friendſhip betweene States ſo diſtant and remote, ſhould continue ſincere, without caſuall and vnpreuentable miſunderſtandings, vnleſſe there were vſed the interceſſion of interuenient Miniſters for negotiations; We for our parts in proſecution of the laudable proceedings of our Royall Progenitors haue continued our honourable Embaſſadors at your Royall Port, where at this preſent is reſiding for vs our noble Seruant Sir Peter Wyche, Knight, one of the Gentlemen of our priuy Chamber, being the eighth in number that hath ſucceſſiuely reſided for that purpoſe; whoſe mediations vpon all requiſite occaſions, as they haue beene heretofore, ſo wee haue expected, and do yet hope, that no occurrence, howſoeuer repreſented by ill affected Miniſters, ſhall diſappoint the expectation of ſucceſſefull iſſue of ſo neceſſary a meanes for continuance of peace and friendſhip. Yet we know not how it comes to paſſe, but of late time, wee finde that neither the preſence of our ſaid Embaſſador at your Port, nor other our publike Miniſters elſewhere reſiding in your Dominions, can preuaile to accommodate diſpatches for our honour, nor defend and keepe in ſafety the Perſons, and States of our Subjects the Merchants, from the injuſtice of your ſubordinate Gouernors, but that vpon euery falſe pretence and ſuggeſtion, they are ſo wrongfully troubled, and heauily oppreſſed, that beſides many great and important ſums of mony lately extorted from them, they haue beene generally expoſed to the fury of ſuch, as haue both diſturbed them in the proſecution of their trade, and endangered their liues and perſons. L M

And

A And whereas vpon former complaints of our ſaid Subjects, we addreſſed our Princely Letters of the eleuenth of October laſt, to your Majeſty, thereby repreſenting ſundry great and vnſufferable injuries and oppreſsions impoſed vpon them by your Miniſters, wherein we no way doubt, but vpon receit of our ſaid Letters, your Majeſty in your Princely juſtice will afford to our ſaid Subjects ſuch reliefe and reparation in their grieuances, as may ſtand with the league of amity and good correſpondency ſo long and happily continued betweene vs, our kingdomes, and people, and we to ſettle ſome effectuall order for the peaceable and qaiet trading of our ſubjects in your Dominions, as they may haue no further cauſe of lament vnto vs, nor we of repreſenting the ſame vnto your Imperiall Majeſty.

Since which time, vpon ſeuerall and great complaints of our Subjects, we could do no leſſe out of the true ſence of our owne honour, and juſtice to our Subjects, than to repreſent the ſame by theſe our ſecond B Letters to your Imperiall Majeſty, thereby ſignifying the wrong and damage done them by your Captain Baſſa in detayning one of their great Ships, bound for your Imperiall Port; vpon pretence that one Barker, a Subject of ours had taken a Sattie pretended to be formerly taken by Huzein Begh, Captaine of a Gally belonging to Corone: Herein as we are tender that our Subjects ſhould not ſuffer vnjuſtly, ſo ſhall it alwaies be our Princely care that they neither offer nor doe wrong to the Subjects of any Prince in amity with vs. And therefore we haue giuen eſpeciall order, That the ſaid buſineſſe be duly examined, and when the truth thereof ſhall be made manifeſt, then we ſhall proceed therein, as may be agreeable to juſtice, and the mutuall amity betweene your Majeſty and Vs; meane while, we haue cauſed the ſaid Barker to be impriſoned, and his perſon ſecured to anſwer the ſaid fact. And becauſe it cannot otherwiſe fall out during our warre with the King of Spaine, who is likewiſe in war with your Imperiall Ma- C jeſty, but that Ships of our Subjects which by vertue of our Commiſsion, make prizes of ſuch as aſsiſt that King with armes or any kinde of munition, or ſuch Ships as are laden with Spaniſh goods, and for that purpoſe frequenting the Seas, as well within the Streits as without, may happily vnder that pretence commit ſome acts which may be offenſiue to your Majeſty. We in regard thereof, haue of late daies forbidden, and from henceforth do expreſſely forbid all our Subjects, (Merchants only excepted) to enter with their Shipping within the Steights: whereby may appeare our former intention, to liue in peace and good correſpondency with your Majeſty.

And further, we do likewiſe repreſent vnto your Majeſty a great and inſupportable injury of a high nature, done vnto our Merchants by your great Officers at Aleppo; who giuing eare to an vnjuſt complaint againſt our people, for a fact done by Sardinians, ſubjects to the King of Spaine, vpon your Ma- D jeſties Subjects of Arſoes, and not admitting of any plea or proofe, produced on the behalfe of our Merchants to the contrary, did after many vnſufferable indignities, offered to the perſon of our publike Miniſter the Conſull, to the great diſhonour of Vs, and our Nation, moſt injuriouſly, and directly contrary to the Capitulations, impriſon our ſaid Subject in a loathſome dungeon for many daies, threatning to take away his life, with the liues of others of our People, to make ſlaues of the reſidue, and make ſeiſure of their eſtates, cauſed his Druggerman in moſt bloudy manner to be murthered; and in concluſion, before he could be releaſed, there was great ſums of mony extorted from our ſaid Subjects.

The former vnſufferable injuries (of which as yet we heare not of any ſatiſfaction) and theſe laſt intollerable oppreſsions, all done vpon our Merchants and Subjects, are moſt diſpleaſing vnto Vs, and we cannot in reſpect of our own honour, and care of the ſafety and protection of our ſaid Subjects, paſſe them ouer without due conſideration, and repreſentation to your Imperiall Majeſty.

E We do therefore hereby demand, and ſhall expect by your highneſſe Princely order, ſuch ample ſatiſfaction in euery particular, as vnto juſtice appertaineth, to the end we may as our Predeceſſors haue formerly done, hold all good correſpondency with your highneſſe, in maintaining an Embaſſador our publike repreſentant in your Port, and incouraging our Merchants to continue their trade into your Dominions; which otherwiſe, neither the reſpect of honour to our ſelfe, or profit to our Subjects, will ſuffer Vs to doe. And for the better ſatiſfying of all complaints and ſetling of differences, We haue expreſſely imployed our truſty and welbeloued Seruant Iohn Wandesford Eſquire, vnto your Princely Port vpon this occaſion, whom we haue addreſſed to our Embaſſador Sir Peter Wyche there reſident, to be preſented to your Imperiall Majeſty, with order and inſtructions to them both more amply, to acquaint your Majeſty F with all occaſions of complaints and differences, praying your majeſty to giue them audience and credence, and to eſtabliſh ſome ſuch effectuall order, for the behoofe of our Subjects in the quiet proſecution of their trade in your Dominions for the time to come, as may be agreeable to your high and Princely juſtice, and the good correſpondency continued betweene vs. Giuen at our Royall Pallace of Whitehall, the 21 day of February. An. Dom. 1629, in the fifth yeare of our Reigne, of England, &c.

The grand Signiors Letter to his Majeſty of Great Britaine.

TO the glorious amongſt the famous Princes of IESVS, honoured among the great Potentates of the people of Meſſiah, Compoſer of the affaires of the Nazaren Nation, Lord of Honour and Grace, Poſſeſſor of Greatneſſe and Glory; CHARLES King of England, whoſe H end be in happineſſe.

AT the report of this our ſublime and noble Seale be it knowne; That heretofore the Vizier Haſſan Baſſa, when he was my Generall by ſea, hauing declared to our happie Port, That ſending the Begh of the Iſland of Lemnos, called Huſſein Begh, towards the Enemies coaſts, to take information, and he with his Gally going in purſuit thereof, meeting with a Sattia of the Enemies, laden with Sugar, ſpicerie, and other Indian commodities, tooke her, and put into her ſome of his owne men, and ſent her towards our moſt glorious I Port: Which in the way comming neere vnto the Iſland of Zant, was met by Iohn Barker Maſter of the ſhip called the Golden Cocke, and by him taken, and the men that were therin put on land, and he lading the ſaid goods and merchandiſes in his owne ſhip, hauing ſold the Sattia in the ſaid Iſland, ſailed thence for England. Which act being altogether contrarie to the due termes of peace, friendſhip, and confederation made between vs, was then by vs aduiſed to your Maieſtie by our Imperiall letters; requiring that the authors of ſuch vnworthy action might be puniſhed, and the goods of the ſaid Sattia ſo taken, might bee recouered and ſent to our Imperiall Port. Whereof notice beeing giuen to the moſt honourable amongſt the Chriſtian Lords, Sir Peter Wyche your Embaſſadour, Preſident in our ſublime Port, K That when our Letter ſhould come vnto you, and that you ſhould vnderſtand our Roiall meaning herein, your Majeſtie in contemplation of the great affection and loue which wee beare vnto you, when the ſaid Maſter ſhould arriue in your Dominions, would giue order that hee might preſently be layd hold on, and for his tranſgreſſion committed in an action ſo contrarie to our correſpondence and friendſhip, be ſeuerely puniſhed, and all diligence vſed for the recouerie of the ſaid goods and merchandiſes ſo vniuſtly taken.

Now foraſmuch as all the ſaid goods and merchandiſes by the ſaid Iohn Barker taken out L of the ſaid Sattia is recouered, as alſo the value of the ſaid Sattia, and all intirely arriued at our Imperiall Port, and the ſame deliuered into our roiall Treaſurie by the hands of the ſayd Embaſſadour; and that of the particularities of the ſaid goods and Sattia, there reſteth no further pretence or demand againſt the ſaid Barker, hauing receiued for the ſame an entire and full ſatiſfaction; we haue written and ſent you this our moſt affectionat Letter: The tenor whereof being declared vnto you, it is conuenient, that as your Majeſtie hath bin pleaſed to demonſtrate in this particular your great loue and ſinceritie which you beare vnto our happie Port; ſo in time to come, in all other our occaſions, in contemplation of the good amitie and correſpondence betweene vs, you will alwaies yeeld your moſt noble attention and fauour. For M by the grace of the moſt high God, for our part, the moſt requiſit tearms of our friendſhip ſhall be alwaies moſt readily obſerued, and for whatſoeuer ſhall concern the conſeruation of our ſincere peace and correſpondence, you ſhall alwaies ſee our exquiſit diligence for the augmentation

A tation thereof; applying our deſire and Imperiall deuotion to reſerue a moſt affectionate regard to your Majeſtie. In this particular of the Prize, the Bailo of Venice hath made ſome ſmall motion, pretending that the lading of the ſaid Prize did belong to Venetian Merchants, and therefore demanded of vs authentique writing, that the goods be conſigned vnto them: but in regard that his ſaid pretence was vain and vniuſt, it was not regarded, neither was there giuen vnto him any ſuch writing, neither were we pleaſed with his ſaid vnreaſonable demands. Therefore in concluſion, all the monie for the value of the ſaid goods and merchandiſes, as alſo of the ſaid Sattia, is by your Embaſſador Sir Peter Wyche fully and intirely delivered vnto vs, and all entred in our Imperiall Treaſurie, and we reſt fully ſatisfied For B which particular there remaines no further pretence againſt the ſaid Iohn Barker : And ſo much be known vnto you.

Written the firſt day of the moneth called Ramazan, in the year 1041.

In the Imperiall city of Conſtantinople.

C The grand Vizier in October, following his firſt entrance on the deſign for Perſia, after many vſuall accidents of War, interruptions in his march, and ſo ſtrong a reſiſtance of his ſiege to the loſſe of the third part of his army, together with the approch of Winter (the common hinderer of the Turkes proceedings, as greateſt enemy to their conſtitutions) hee withdrew his forces, and returning by the way of Aleppo, remained there ſome time to practiſe his tyrannies. Which had theſe grounds of policie: The Turks being men that conclude all actions from the ſucceſſe, and thence allow them merit, grew into ſome ſuſpition of the great Vizier; beſides, their depredations being ſometimes hindered by the enemies, other times recouered with the loſſe of ſome liues, moſt of their ſouldiers returned home poorer than they went forth; a ſtrong motiue to a mutiny. To preuent which, and to keep his ſcattered troups D in ſome order, as alſo to hinder the Perſians further attempts, at Aleppo he vſed a tyranicall ſeueritie againſt all Nations during his ſtay there; the end of which was exaction onely of fiues vpon his iudgements, which paſt vpon euery complaint, iuſt or vniuſt, which either malice or couetouſneſſe could beget vpon inuention; which ſoon became pregnant vpon obſeruance of the grand Viziers diſpoſition. With theſe exactions he inriched himſelf, appeaſed the muttering of his ſoldiers, and made himſelfe popular: and the aſperſion thrown vpon his valour, was preſently loſt in the opinion conceiued of his juſtice. The Engliſh Merchants felt more of this ſtorme than any other nation; for the buſineſſes before declared being reviued, pretences were ſoon found to impriſon the Engliſh Conſul there, and for the more terror to hang his Druggerman. An inſolencie much diſtaſtefull to the Embaſſadour, who not- E withſtanding as yet found not conueniencie for a complaint; the Viziers greatnes and fauor with the grand Signior beating him out in all his actions. 1630.

The Captaine Baſſa returning from the Blacke ſea, after a diſpute vpon his proceedings (ſome of which wanted a cleare iuſtification) was diſmiſſed his place vpon the fourteenth of October; and another aſſigned to it, who was Maſter of the grand Signiors horſe, a man of great eſteeme, and reputed for a very good Turke, how rare ſoeuer it be. For Turkes (as Topographers obſerued the Carthaginians to be perfidious Naturâ loci) are noted by Hiſtorians to be vitious for the moſt part, Naturâ populi.

The great Vizier could now no longer conceal his ill ſucceſſe before Bagdat, but that it arriued at the Port, and cauſed the grand Signior to ſuſpect him. For the Vizier had a long F time by his Inſtruments filled euery place (eſpecially thoſe remote) with reports of a proſperous proceeding; which multiplied at length to a rumour of certaine victorie. The contrarie of which appearing, his diſplacing was determined, and the aduancement of the new Captaine Baſſa vnto it. Of which the Vizier receiuing a priuate information, ſtrengthened himſelfe in Moſul, and hauing won to him the hearts of the Ianizaries, reſolued to refuſe a ſurrender.

1630. ſurrender of his authority. Whereupon a new Viſier Halis Achmat Baſſa was made; an old G man of a pettiſh froward diſpoſition, and very couetous: who was commanded to prepare anew for the war of Perſia, and to be ſetting forward the next Spring. In the meane time, the old Captaine Baſſa was employed in Græcia to raiſe forces and ſend them away for Perſia: which proceeding, his death from ſickeneſſe hindred: an end vnuſuall for great perſons employed in that State, of whoſe laſt action the State could be jealous.

The French Embaſſador receiued this yeare a great afront, vpon occaſion of complaints by Turks that were taken by ſome French Ships, and carried to Malta. He appearing before the Chimacham to cleere the buſineſſe, was found ſo weake in his defences, that he was diſmiſſed without any reſpect, and his Druggerman impriſoned before his face in the Baſſa's houſe. On the laſt of September, a French ſhip from Marſeellis arriued at the Port, wherein H came a new French Embaſſador, his inſtructions and buſineſſe of the ſame nature and conſequence as formerly were renewed.

The new Captaine Baſſa made the entrance into his authority with an acceptable preſent; returning to the Port with foure ſhips taken in the Archipelago, three ſmall French ſhips, and one Sauoyard: hauing receiued vſuall coſtomes from all other ſhips he met, according to their ſeuerall values and conditions.

The old Viſier being diſplaced (who was yet abroad with the ſouldiers) there was publiſhed a ceſſation of the war with Perſia for two yeares. Which though really it proceeded from feare in the Grand Signior, yet was it interpreted, to ſaue his honour, a policy: for the ſouldiers by this ceſſation, hauing leaue and order to depart, and returne euery man to his owne home, and place of repoſe, they would be pacified from muttering, and be ſeuered the I more eaſily from the late Viſier, if the diſgrace throwne vpon him ſhould exaſperate his high ſpirit to be obſtinate and factious.

This politicke intention found a contrary end; for after the diſplacing of the great Viſier Huſſeruph Baſſa, (who had won the affection of the ſoldiery in generall) a diſcontent began to appeare and breake out amongſt them, and the more, in that they conceiued a diſtaſte againſt the placing of Haffis Achmat Baſſa in that office; a man for his want of liberality towards them in great contempt and hatred. For though couetouſnes in Turks is a vice almoſt neceſſited, yet the ſouldiers finde the differences in their ſeuerall Generals, ſome being freer by diſpoſition, others for State ends. But this Haffis Achmat Baſſa was the moſt noted with K that marke of infamy, which (according to Sophocles) includes in it ſelfe all ſorts of barbariſme.

This Viſier, endeauouring by many practiſes ſuting with his owne nature (which neither danger nor any thing elſe could alter) to pacifie the muttering of the ſouldiers conceiued, he had laboured effectually, and perfected the way of his owne quiet proceedings.
But it hapned otherwiſe: for three daies after, as in this confidence he was riding to the Diuan, diuers Ianizaries and Spahies joyning themſelues ſuddenly together, tooke head towards the Seraglio, where they ſurpriſed him in the firſt yard, and ſtoned him from his horſe: which brunt for the preſent he eſcaped, by the help of ſome Miniſters getting into the Seraglio where the Grand Signior then was. Which notwithſtanding, proued no ſanctuary to the L great Viſier, for the ſouldiers proſecuted their ſedition ſo violently, that the Grand Signior was compelled to appeare in perſon before the multitude, preſuming ſo, Regere dictis animos & pectora mulcere; queſtioning the cauſe of their inſurrection: which the ſouldiers would neither anſwer, nor receiue any other ſatiſfaction from the Grand Segnior to pacifie them, but a deliuery of Haffis Achmat Baſſa into their hands. Who being expoſed by the Grand Signior to their fury (which was the beſt ſecurity the Grand Signior himſelfe could at that ſuddaine make vſe of for his owne ſafety) was preſently by the ſouldiers, without any regard to his age or dignity, euen before the Grand Signiors face moſt barbarouſly torne in pieces.
Which ſpectacle reuiued in the memory of the Grand Signior (who then likewiſe found himſelfe at the mercy of the tumult) the manner of the death of his brothe Oſman, no way M differing from this but only in the difference of the perſon.

After their furies had thus ſacrificed the Viſier, the ſouldiers began for the preſent to be a little quiet: but the next morning the torrent of their violence increaſed, and rouled them headlong with more dangerous cateracts of inſolency; for entring the Seraglio in a diſordred

A dered tumult, they brought new feares vpon the Grand Signior, by demanding him in perſon to deliuer them likewiſe the Mufty and the Teſterdar with many other perſons in office: 1630. but at the great inſtance of the Grand Signior, and in a manner ſubmiſſiue intreaty made to them, the ſouldiers mitigated their intended puniſhment (for the multitude would haue all their acts called iuſtice) which was death, and deſired onely a diſplacing of thoſe officers; which through feare of a worſe progreſſion in their vnruly courſe, was preſently effected: which together with putting into the office of great Viſier the late Chimacham Regeb Baſſa, againe quieted the ſtorme for the preſent; the ſouldiers amongſt themſelues propoſing a condition, That Regeb ſhould hold the place of Viſier no longer, but till the returne of Huſreph Baſſa, though himſelfe and ſome others hoped it for longer continuance.

B These ſtormes had now a ſhew of being calmed, and gaue ſome liberty to the Grand Signior for conſideration: in which, his reuenge vpon ſuch inſolencies guided him to circumſtances, that concluded Huſreph Baſſa to be the onely inſtigator of the ſouldiers to theſe attempts: the firſt was his diſgrace by being diſplaced from his office of great Viſier, which might exaſperate him, and pricke forward his diſcontent to ſuch actions, as might aduantage his deſire of proceeding to a vindication of his loſt honours: another was the opinion he had amongſt the ſouldiers, to which he had won them by his liberality, and diſtribution of thoſe exactions he had practiſed in Aſia: a third was his keeping out vnder pretence of prouiding for the next Summers war; all which interpreted and wreſted to the worſt ſence, confirmed the Grand Signior in a reſolution for his death. For which Morteſa Baſſa had ſe-C cret inſtructions, that whereſoeuer he was found, he ſhould be ſtrangled, and his head ſent with all priuacy to the Grand Signior. This command did not long want execution, but that within few daies after at a place called Tocat, in the Prouince of Amaſia on the Aſian ſide, Huſreph Baſſa yeelded to that fate, againſt which (though his policy and prouidence were great) he had not the power of preuention.

This act could not be ſo cloſely carried, but that the next day after his head was preſented to the Grand Signior, the Spahies and Ianizaries arriuing from ſuſpition to knowledge of it, ſuddenly made vp their many headed monſter, full of reſolues to take reuenge vpon euery one that had beene directly or indirectly a mouer in this buſineſſe of the death of their beloued Huſreph. Their fury firſt guided them to the houſe of the preſent Viſier Regeb Baſſa, D where rudely entring, they demanded cauſe, why Huſreph was put to death, and who were the Grand Signiors counſellors to ſuch an worthy fact, towards a man that had ſo well deſerued of the Grand Signior, and his State; that he had beene the protector of their liberties, and ſcourge of their enemies, as it were flattering his memory with many attributes of praiſe. To which the Viſier Regeb Baſſa made anſwer with proteſtation, that he was wholly ignorant therof, it being contriued and reſolued vpon at ſuch time as he was out of place. Whereupon the ſouldiers compelled him to go with them to the Seraglio where the Grand Signior was that by him they might receiue ſome ſatisfying anſwer, & a grant of leaue to execute iuſtice vpon the homicides. When they were entred into the firſt yard of the Seraglio, out of a reſpect to their King they ſtaied there, ſending in Regeb Baſſa to expoſtulate the buſineſſe with E him: who enforced through feare to be their vnwilling agent, did accordingly, and returning to them ſomwhat late in the euening, after declarations of the Grand Signiors promiſes to ſatisfie them in all that they demanded, his perſuaſiue Oratory preuailed for that time, and won them to withdraw themſelues; till the next morning taking head againe, they compelled Regeb Baſſa as before to be their ſpeaker: who yeelding to neceſſity (which Valerius calls, humana imbecilitatis efficaſiſſimum duramentum) ſeemed to the iealouſie of the State, a ring-leader of this ſeditious faction.

By this time the multitude had fallen vpon new pretences, and from a grounded ſuſpition of the Aga of the Ianizaries, (who at their firſt riſing by conueying himſelfe away had betraied ſome guiltineſſe) as alſo of the late Mufti and Teſterdar, together with an inward ſer-F uant of the Grand Signiors, whoſe accuſation was grounded only vpon the great grace and fauour he had with the Grand Signior (a miſery that no court minion could euer ſhun) they gaue inſtructions to Regeb, that their perſons ſhould be demanded of the Grand Signior, who fearing his own danger (that had now no preuention but the ſatisfying & appeaſing of the tumultuant ſoldiers) anſwered the demand with proteſtation, that they were not in his cuſtody.

Where-

1629. Whereupon a new and ſudden rumor paſt amongſt them, that the Grand Signior had murdered his three younger brothers: thus kindled a new flame of rage that could not bee quencht but by preſenting the three brethren before them; which for that night quieted their diſorders.

The next morning they had an early conuention, before the houſe of the great Vizier Regeb Baſſa; where after he had a long time endeauoured to pacifie them by his eloquence (a gift he had) but whether he moſt vſed it ad hominum ſalutem & conuerſationem, or ad bonorum peſtem & perniciem (both which according to Cicero may be the vſe or abuſe of eloquence) is much to be doubted, their fury began to attempt farther; to preuent which he preſently deliuered into their hands the fauorite ſeruant, ſent to him the night before: Vpon him they acted a ſecond Scene of their Tragedie, leauing him in pieces as they had formerly the Great Vizier Halis Achmat Baſſa. But the day being as yet not halfe ſpent, this was no abſolute pacification; neither had the Vizier or the Grand Signior a power ſufficient for their ſuppreſſion; but that in this height of rage, enforcing againe Regeb Baſſa to be their Oratour, they entred the Seraglio: where after ſome expectation they receiued by Regeb an anſwer like the former, and no more ſatisfying; notwithſtanding diuers the chiefe Officers endeauoured to appeaſe them, by taking their oathes vpon the Alchoran, That they ſaw the Grand Signior lay his hand vpon the Booke, ſwearing there ſhould be contentment giuen them in whatſoeuer they demanded. They were prompted now to a new ſuſpition, That the Grand Signior the night before had cauſed his three brethren to be made away, after they had been preſented to the ſoldiers. This emboldened them to an inſolence that had ſcarce an example: for no reſiſtance had power to repell them from entring the Grand Signiors chamber: vpon which his feares expreſt themſelues, and as Virgill ſaid of Turnus when the fury appeared to him, Illi membra nouus ſolvit formidine torpor.

Arrectaque horrore come & vox faucibus haſit.

Which include this ſenſe:

A new amazement made his limbes to ſhake;
His haire ſtood vp, and words his mouth forſake.

So this ſudden feare proceeding from the apprehenſion of an apparant danger, and preſenting to him anew the manner of his brother Oſmans death, oppreſſed it ſelfe in a trembling and long ſilence. But as there is in Majeſtie a certaine ſecret vertue that commands ſubiects and awes their actions and attempts by a hidden working, ſo here it begot a rare effect. For no ſooner had the ſouldiers beheld their King; but his preſence woon them to the practiſe of their wonted reuerence, and ſuffered them only to lament the death of Huſſeruph Baſſa their loued Generall, finiſhing it with a complaint, That the King would ſo weakly yeeld to the counſels of them that contriued and perpetrated ſuch an euill as his death: deſiring withall, that they might again ſee the three brothers of the grand Signior: for that rumor, (on which the Vulgar feed eagerly, and had poſſeſt them with a ſuſpition they were made away. The grand Signior finding himſelf diſtreſſed, and in ſuch a ſtreit, ſuffered himſelfe to be humbled ſo farre by his fears, that hee gaue way to all their motions, and ſending for his three brethren preſented them to the ſouldiers. Who ſeeing them, bleſſed them with great acclamations, recommending them to the grand Signiors fauour: but with a peremptorie charge to the chiefe Officers and Miniſters about them (euen before the Kings face) to be carefull of the yong Princes ſafety; for if they miſcarried, the ſoldiers threatned to require their liues from thoſe officers.

——— è minimo ſua per veſtigia creſcit)

The ruggedneſſe of this ſtorm began now to be taken off, eſpecially by the grand Signiors command for finding out the Aga of the Ianizaries, and the Teſterdar; with rewards propoſed to the diligent executers of thoſe Commands. So that the next morning following, the

A Aga being diſcouered, was by order from the grand Signior deliuered into the hands of the Souldiers; who preſently tore him in pieces, and hanged vp diuers parts of his limbs in ſeue-rall places of the city. His death was the cataſtrophe of this tragedie, which had few ſpectators more than the actors themſelues; for all men, eſpecially ſtrangers, were inforced to ſecure themſelues as wel as they could within their own houſes, till the violence of the ſtorm being quite ouer, and a ſerene skie of peace and order appearing, they might without danger attend their ſeuerall occaſions.

This mutinie left behind it the dregs of many euills, that poiſoned the State, and made it breake out into many dangerous impoſtumes: which ſeueritie of reuenge on the grand Signiors part, for the loſſe of his officers and fauorit, durſt not venture on to cure by violent in-B ciſion, nor the policie of Counſellors practiſe vpon, by the digeſtion or purging of peccant humours. For if the grand Signior had anew prouoked the ſouldiers by puniſhment, hee had brought vpon himſelf and the Empire an ineuitable danger: for the ſoldiers were now grown perfect in the Tenent, Populus conſentiens regnum dat & aufert; and if the counſell had preuailed, That Morteſa Baſſa (becauſe the death of Huſſeruph Baſſa being the ground of the mutiny, there could be no perfecter quieting of the mutiniers, than the full reuenge of his death vpon the inſtruments of his death, the chiefe wherof was Morteſa Baſſa) ſhould be deliuered vp to the ſouldiers; he being a gallant braue fellow, and in charge of General vpon the borders of Perſia, would rather haue turned rebell to the grand Signior, and been a ſcourge to the ſouldiers, than yeelded vp himſelfe a ſacrifice to their fury; either of which would haue brought C the State into a new diſorder, and conſequently into a new danger of ſubuerſion: For,

Ordine ſeruato, mundus ſeruatur, at illo Neglecto peſum, totus & orbis abit.

Order being kept, the world is kept, but when
That is neglected, all the world's gone then.

The time now of the Turks Bayram was come, which helpt much to the ſetling of theſe diſorders, which hauing found ſucceſſe according to their vnruly wils of the ſouldiers, begot ſuch inſolence amongſt the generalitie of common people, That all bad actions, thefts, 1632. and murders were coloured vnder the name of the ſouldiers, and executed many times euen in D the preſence of the Magiſtrate. And of this danger the Dutch Embaſſadour very narrowly miſt his ſhare; for the ſouldiers hauing pretended their intereſt in certaine ſhips lading with corn (a trading there of the moſt dangerous conſequence) taken in the Archipelago by Flem-mings, and by them made prize of, aſſaulted the Embaſſadours houſe; who had no other re-ſcue than to refer it to a tryall of iuſtice. Vpon which iudgement was giuen by the Captaine Baſſa, that a preſent reſtitution ſhould be made: but the Embaſſadour appealing to the great Vizier, it was ordred he ſhould ſtand to a tryal before the Cadiliskars. The euent wherof was that ſome formall reſtitution to the ſouldiers and many bribes to the officers (men ſeldome without that vice of which Diphilus ſaith; Niſi lucrum faceret, nemo quidem improbus foret: he purchaſed a coſtly peace, and remained for a time in ſome ſafety.

E The French Embaſſador likewiſe had trouble of the ſame nature, about a ſhip of Tripolis in Barbary bound for the Port. Which falling into the hands of ſome Maltæſi ſuppoſed to be French, a French ſhip that was bound out was detained for reſtitution; and after the like trouble and expenſe of mony, releaſed to the Embaſſador.

Elcas Baſſa about this time, hauing for ſome time concealed his diſcontents (the grounds whereof were likewiſe vnknowne, vnleſſe his Ambition, that whetted him to the deſire of of honours, which either the grand Signiors iealouſie, or the States, refuſed to beſtow vpon him) declared himſelfe in open rebellion, and hauing fortified in a towne called Magneſia, but two daies iourney from Smyrna, hee much infeſted the Countrey round about with his outrages and depredations; inſomuch that the Conſull and merchants at Smyrna were infor-F ced for their ſafety to tranſport themſelues and goods to Scio.

The news of this rebellion no ſooner arriued at the Port, but the grand Signior gaue order for the ſuppreſſing of it; and forthwith a ſufficient ſtrength was ſent againſt the Rebel, vnder the conduct of ſeuerall Captaines: who falling vpon Elcas (being abroad in purſuit of prey) a fierce battel was fought, in which, victory fel to the grand Signiors party, moſt of the rebels being ſlain or taken, only Eleas Baſſa himſelf flying to Magneſia eſcaped, and hath euer ſince G kept himſelfe vndiſcouered.

This Victory was the induction to a new tragedy at the Port. For the Grand Signior amongſt other reuolutions, conſidering mens ſeuerall natures, and that ſome hauing ſcapt puniſhment, became the more confirmed in their euils, when contrariwiſe, quem pœnitet peccaſſe, penè eſt innocens; and that there were ſo many examples in his State, and amongſt his ſubjects, the memory of the ſouldiers late outrages reuiued, and preſented him Regeb Baſſa the great Viſier: who though in himſelfe innocent, yet was ſuſpected to be the firſt moner in thoſe tumults, whithout whom, the other wheeles muſt of neceſſity haue ſtood ſtill. One argument to conuince him, was his not ſubmitting himſelfe, which had he done it, had beene a voluntary accuſation of himſelfe. But from theſe circumſtances he was condemned, the H Grand Signior vſing Dantes diuiner ſentence, to this bad purpoſe, Abſoluer non ſi puo, chi non ſi pente.

Vpon this ſentence giuen before his arraignement, he was called to his execution into the Seraglio, vnder pretence of ſome ſerious affaires; where he was inſtantly ſtrangled vpon the ſeuenth day of May, and the ſame day another great Viſier made, named, Molamet Baſſa. This act of the Grand Signiors cauſed ſome feares, That the ſouldiers would againe mutiny, to reuenge his death that ſufferedit for their actions. But Morteſa Baſſa being abroad in Perſia with ſome part of them, and the rendeuous of the reſt, that went out againſt the Rebell Eleas Baſſa, I not yet fully diſſolued, the want of number to perfect ſuch riotous attempts, might be the occaſion of their quietneſſe; which ſcarce appeared diſturbed in any the leaſt murmuring.

1633. The Captaine Baſſa being a man inſinuated into the very boſome of the Grand Signior, became the chiefe mouer in many actions of this yeare: the firſt had relation to the Engliſh chiefely, and one the moſt lamented for the ill ſucceſſe, which cauſed a loſſe not to be repaired, the order of which followeth. The Captaine Baſſa beeing abroad with the ſquadron of gallies in the Bay of Caſſandra, there lay then at anchor in the ſame Bay two Engliſh ſhips, called the Hector, and the William and Raph, which ſhips were laden with corne. Vpon Whitſunday in the morning, by the breake of day, the ſhips diſcouered thirty ſayle of gal- K lies to come ſuddenly vpon them: whereupon they weighed anchor, got vp their yardes, and fitted their ſhips, and towed out; ſo that they wore two miles from ſhore when the gallies came thwart them, and it being a flat calme went fairely by them; the ſhips ſaluting them peaceably, but receiuing no anſwer, till the Baſſa put forth his bloudy colours, and comming betwixt them and the ſhore, by thoſe ſignals declared his intention of fight, hauing put his gallies in forme of a halfe Moone. The William and Raph (of which one Maſter Harris was Maſter) being the neeremoſt, and diſtant but musket ſhot, the Baſſa diſcharged his prowes twice, the reſt doing ſo likewiſe: when preſently the Bey of Rhodes layd hard aboord with foure gallies that diſcharged their prowes at the boording: with which they did ſo much ſpoil, that the Beyes men accounted the ſhip won, and poſſeſt themſelues of the cuddy round L houſe, and great cabin, carrying away ſome of the mea from the Captaines quarter into their owne gally. By this time the Captaine Baſſa, and the Chiahar, with three other prime gal-lies, did the like by the other ſhip the Hector; who at firſt encounter beat them off, euen from their owne ordnance; and enforced the Captaine Baſſa to leaue his owne gally, and betake him to the maine maſt; that, had there beene men enough in the ſhip, they might haue taken the Admirall gally eaſily. The ordnance of the other ſhip beginning to play againe, there was ſome hope of victory; but the maine ſtrength of the gallies comming vp and encompaſſing them, they were enforced to vſe all their guns at once, which for want of cooling fired their ſhips, the Admirall gally aduantaging it by being faſtned in one of their ports: ſo that ſeeing themſelues in flames (the quenching whereof was but a vaine endeauour) hol- M ding out to offend the gallies as long as they could, and plying their fireworkes, at length being no longerable to endure it, firing ſome barrels abaſt the maſt, to make ſure that nothing ſhould be ſaued to aduantage the enemy, after foure times boording and cleering, all the men that remained aliue, forſooke the flaming veſſels, and yeelded to the mercy of the water or ners. Some of them were killed as they endeauoured to get to ſhore; The two Captaines, Maſter Harris and Maſter Wilde, with others to the number of threeſcore, were taken vp and put to the oare: ſo the ſhips (after their decks were burnt) ſinking, the fight ended, which had continued foure houres. There were ſlaine of Turks in this ſea fight, one thouſand and ſeuen hundred: amongſt whom were diuers Beghs of great note; the Captain Baſſa himſelfe eſcaping very narrowly, not without ſome hurts, and the Admirall gally with many others made vnſeruiceable.

The Captaine Baſſa returning to the Port, hauing inſinuated himſelfe into the fauour of the Grand Signior, preferred his complaint, which included a reſtitution from Engliſh Mer-B chants: howbeit the actors in this were largely puniſhed, for thus raſhly ſhewing their Engliſh valour, by the loſſe of their ſhips, and their miſerable captiuities: ſo that they might be conceiued capable of no more, but death: the execution whereof had beene next to liberty, a mercy. Thers was ſome pretence of plea againſt the Capitulations of Peace on the Engliſh part in this point broken, for that the voyage of the two ſhips was vnlawfull: but the Embaſſadours endeauors preuailed, to haue the ſeuerity of that opinion mitigated, and conſtrued otherwiſe, by declining it to the perſons; who notwithſtanding, had his compaſſion ſo farre, that he laboured earneſtly for their redemption, and procured Letters from his Majeſty of Great Britaine to the grand Signior in their behalfe. The forme whereof fol-loweth.

CHARLES, by the grace of the moſt high God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, the moſt puiſſant Defendor of the true Chriſtian Faith.

D TO the moſt high and mighty Emperor, Sultan Morat Han, chiefe Lord and Commander of the Muſſulman Kingdome, ſole and ſu- preme Monarch of the Eaſterne Empire, ſendeth Greeting.

WE haue receiued aduertiſement from our Embaſſadour reſident at your glorious Port, That this Summer your Captaine Baſſa being at Sea, aſſaulted with his whole fleet, two of our Merchants ſhips, and forcing them to their defence, did with the ſpoile of many of his gallies, and with the deſtruction of many hundreds of his men, gaine nothing in the end, but the burning of both the ſhips, and the recouering from the Sea, E of a few reſolute men, whom he hath vnworthily made his ſlaues. If they had committed Piracy, or done any violence or wrong to your Subjects, we would not protect or defend them in any ſuch offence, but would our ſelues haue executed ſeuere juſtice vpon them, as heretofore vpon ſuch like complaints we haue done: But being now aſſured that theſe ſhips proceeded in a faire and peaceable manner, not for ſpoile or ſtealth, but for trade, as Merchants vſe in thoſe parts; and that ſo ſoone as the Baſſa came in ſight, the Sea-men did him honor and ſaluted him with the vſuall reſpect ſhewed to friends; & the Merchants in homage to your Imperiall power, offered him a preſent: We can no otherwiſe eſteeme of the Baſſaes ho-F ſtile incurſions, without ſummons, & in fury, but as a moſt vnjuſt act, and moſt diſhonourable in a Commander, vnder ſo great a Monarch, whoſe power he diſparaged by ſo vnworthy and vnequall an engagement. That then we expect from your Majeſties Imperiall juſtice, and whereof we aſſure our ſelues in regard of the antient amity betweene our Crownes, is, That 1629: you will make in this caſe a braue example, both of your clemencie and moderation, in ſetting G free all our ſubiects; and of your Princely indignation againſt him, who to ſo great diſparagement of your Magnificence and his owne Honour, committed ſo vnworthie and ſo foule an Act.

This will aſſure and fortifie that correſpondence which hath ſo long been profitable to the intereſts of both our States, and will encourage and encreaſe more and more the free commerce of our Subjects, to the great inriching of your Cuſtomes: And finally, will magnifie in your vertue the luſtre of the Othoman greatneſſe in the eyes of all the world. This Wee commend to your Imperiall wiſdome, and expect the good ſucceſſe. H

Giuen at our Royall Palace of White-Hall, in the yeare of our Lord 1633: being the ninth yeare of our reign of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland.

Theſe Letters being deliuered by the Embaſſadour, preuailed but little to the end intended, which was redemption of the Captiues: but rather reuiued the memory of the loſſe ſuffred I on the grand Signiors part by the action of the two ſhips, which on the ſudden wrought him to a determination of putting them all to death. But the execution was preuented by the diligence of the Embaſſador, and ſome of them deliuered to him vpon ſecuritie. In the meane time a Decree was made in his Majeſtie of great Britaines Court of Starre-Chamber, that prohibited all Engliſh from Corn trade in the Levant; thereby to giue the Grand Signior a fuller ſatisfaction, and to preſerue the other Trade from an vtter diſſolution. By this the Embaſſador conceiued new hopes to perfect his worke of Charitie toward the Captiues. But the two Captaines, before any thing could be brought to effect, were made vncapable of any benefit but buriall and memory; the one dying in the Engliſh Embaſſadours houſe, the other in the Baneo. K

In this year a ſudden fire breaking forth (the original whereof though diuerſly ſuſpected, could haue no clear diſcouerie) made ſuch a gap in that part of the City of Conſtantinople, that it is left as it were of purpoſe vnbuilt, to confirme the report which the Turkes giue of it, that it conſumed in a very ſhort ſpace ſeuenty thouſand houſes. A monument which may aptly authoriſe that nice Etymon of fire, quod nihil gignit:

Nataque de Flammâ corpora nulla vides.

The Perſian Wat was this yeare renewed with much preparation and noiſe, but little ſucceſſe: the Perſians being ſo accuſtomed to victorie, that they ſeemed to command it, & euen L in the beginning of an attempt concluded the euent of a conqueſt. In this confidence of their fortune (the attendant on Vertue) they beſieged Van, a place of great conſequence vpon the confines neer Diarbecker. The newes whereof arriuing ſuddenly at the Port, prouiſion was made for the ſuccor thereof, as alſo for a farther progreſſe to action in Perſia: Orders beeing ſent to all the Beghs in Aſia, that they ſhould repaire to the ſuccour; who ſhould meet at a place appointed for the rendeuous, with eight thouſand Ianizaries and Spahies to bee joined with them.

This reſolution of ſending the ſouldiers forth from the Port (by reaſon of a declaration of the grand Signiors intent to go himſelfe in perſon the next Spring) was not affected; and the keeping of ſome ſouldiers at home had another ſecret ground, of preuenting a danger, in reſpect M that ſtrangers were ſo much diſcontented, that their paſſions betrayed them to ſome ſuſpition. The grand Signior notwithſtanding, ſome few daies after ſent the great Vizier forth with a part of the Militia: who after he had proceeded fourteene dayes march, meeting with the report of Vans being taken by the Perſians (who were now increaſed likewiſe in ſtrength

A ſtrength and number) his iudgement commanding his valour, hee withdrew himſelfe by the way of Aleppo; where hee remained ſome time, vnder colour of ſtaying the further proceeding of the Perſians. And that hee might not returne without the doing of ſome thing that might render him honourable to opinion, he wrought ſo, that a notable fearefull iudgement was executed vpon the Cadee there, a man that was learned, and ſo had practiſed himſelfe to ſell juſtice honourably, to the beſt aduantage of the buyer, and ſomewhat cheaper than other Miniſters had formerly done. This had ſo great a ſhew of an offence, that it cauſed him to be arreſted by the grand Signior, and as he was found, ſo caried in fetters to be a ſlaue at Cyprus; his haire being firſt cut, and the great eſtate of which he was poſſeſſed, ſeiſed vpon and confiſcate to the vſe of the ſtate: who rather complied with the ſeuere proceedings againſt B this great Iudge for that end; and though his crime were not perſonall, it was a politique act of ſtate, for the vſe which the grand Signior had of his mony, to ſatisfie the ſoldiers and preuent a mutiny. 1629.

The ſuſpition had of ſtrangers, began now to moue the wheeles of ſome practiſes vpon them. The firſt whereof was, the ſearching of all Chriſtians houſes in generall, as well ſubiects as ſtrangers, that the intention of the State might not ſo eaſily be diſcouered; & the longer they were kept in ſuſpenſe, the greater their fears would be, and work the more vpon them to the aduanrage of what was intended:

——— Multos in ſumma pericula miſit C Venturi timor ipſe mali.

So the fears of all men, joined with their ignorance of what would be the euent, made counſell vſeleſſe to the preuention of what they moſt feared would follow. The officers imploied in this ſearch of houſes, ſealed vp many, and after three or four dayes continuance of it, a new terror was added to the former, to increaſe the apprehenſion by an example. For they hauing taken one that being borne in that countrey, had for many yeares together paſſed for a Venetian merchant, and had married one of his daughters to a Druggerman of the Venetian Embaſſadors, (by which he had better conueniencie for his practiſe in the trade of merchandiſe) D they caried him to priſon, and on the day following, after ſome formal triall and a ſentence of death were paſſed vpon him, they returned him home to his owne houſe, and there vpon a turret which he had made on his houſe, hanged him; putting forth a red flag for a ſignall, but of what, the amaſed beholders were ſtil ignorant: vntil at length it was vnderſtood, that the flag was a ſigne only, whereby the grand Signior might diſcern, that the merchant was executed, and his houſe and goods confiſcate, which the next day were ſeiſed vpon by the officers, and all things portable caried away.

This entrance being made, the ſame day they proceeded further, in apprehending all ſtranger merchants, in whoſe houſes they had found a ſword, a gunne, or piſtoll, or any the leaſt weapon whatſoeuer; making it ſo criminall, that judgement was preſently giuen for their E deaths, who would not yeeld to purchaſe their liues with mony; and but a very ſhort time allowed for conſideration. But this was condeſcended to, and the ranſome of euery Merchant of the foure Nations, Engliſh, Venetian, French, and Dutch, ſet at 2000 dollars apiece. The fears ſtill of what end theſe proceedings would haue, increaſed by new actions that ſeconded the former, and had ſhew of greater conſequence; as if they had ordered the miſchiefe intended, to haue its gradation, and ſo conclude. For now the Captaine Baſſa ſent to the foure Embaſſadours to conuent them into the Arſenall: Whither they being come, the Baſſa appearing, deſired their expectance of what he ſhould ſay when hee returned from the Graund Signior to them. Their doubts queſtionleſſe were great, and they had no time for any other reſolution, than for they were where they were ſure ſeueritie of juſtice would be vſed if they were delinquent; and libertie in outrages would find but little ſuppreſſion by the honorable difference of their perſons,

1633. perſons, or the not there much regarded Law of Nations. After they had ſome time expected the Captaine Baſſa, returned, and declared, That the Grand Signior hauing had information of a new houſe with churches joyning thereto, built by one of the Embaſſadors, required a certaine acknowledgement, which of them was the offender in ſo high a nature, as to do ſuch an act without a ſpeciall leaue from the Grand Signior. To this the French Embaſſador after much pauſing (thereby ſhewing his vnwillingneſſe to confeſſe it) gaue anſwer that the building was his, and the other Embaſſadors ſo far as they might, ſpake in fauour of it. But the Captaine Baſſa with much aggrauation of the fact, vrged into what wrath the Grand Signior was fallen, and that he could not be altered from his opinion conceiued of it, that it was a preſumptuous contempt in the Embaſſador of the Grand Signiors authority: the Captaine Baſſa declaring likewiſe that he had vſed many faire endeauors, almoſt to his owne danger, to pacifie his Maſter, and ſettle him in a better conceit, both of the fact, and the Embaſſador: after which, he diſmiſſed them, and departed. But before the French Embaſſador could arriue at his houſe, the people that were appointed by the Grand Signior to pull downe the Chappell, had ouer-done their command, and began to pull downe the whole houſe: Vpon which the Embaſſador haſtily returned with his complaint, that preuailed with the Captain Baſſa, to ſend an officer for their reſtraint; but declaring withall, that the Grand Signior would not be ſatisfied any way, but by pulling downe the Chappell; which the Embaſſador did the next day by his owne ſeruants, and hired labourers, to preuent further trouble, and preſerue (in what might be) the materials vſefull. G H

The minds of all men began now to be a little ſettled in a quiet; preſuming, That this particular act of the French Embaſſador was the only ground of all theſe troubles: and this ſubmiſſion of his to the Grand Signiors order, would be an abſolute pacification of his fury: ſince, pro peccato magno paululum ſupplicij ſatis eſt pati, a ſmall puniſhment may ſatisfie a great offence: but the puniſhment here had the ſame proportion with the offence, and yet, not thought ſufficient. For three daies after, the foure Embaſſadors were againe conuented by the Captaine Baſſa at the Arſenall: whether being come, He ſhewed an order to them from the Grand Signior; whereby was required vpon paine of death, That the Embaſſadors ſhould deliuer vp what armes they had in their houſes, to an officer appointed for that purpoſe, which ſhould be ſent to them, without reſeruing any. The order being peremptory, and the Captaine Baſſa intreating them to comply for all good reſpects ſake, it was performed accordingly; the officer receiuing what armes were deliuered to him, without any further ſearch or queſtioning; only the French Embaſſadors houſe throughly examined: which he endeauoured to conceale for his honour. All this while the Merchants lay in priſon, ſome only hauing liberty to prouide mony for their ranſomes: which in two daies after was paied in, the proportion belonging to the Engliſh amounting to twenty thouſand Dollars, by which, the generall may be gueſſed at. After the Merchants of each Nation were reſtored to their houſes and encouraged againe to go on in their trade, the officers fell vpon all other ſorts of people, exacting from them to the vtmoſt of their ability: ſo that the end of one miſery was the beginning of another: the purchaſing of their ſafeties an impoueriſhing of their eſtates. In which confuſion many became voluntary ſacrifices to preuent (as they conceiued) worſe compulſions: neither needed they here to ſearch for inſtruments; I K L

Mori volenti deeſſe, nunquam mors poteſt.

They that were willing, found it readily preſented in any forme; and the Grand Signiors inclination was long before diſcouered to be bloudy. The Miniſters beſides that ſerued in this execution, the Captaine Baſſa generall of the Sea, the Boſtangi Baſſa chiefe officer of the Kings gardens, and an executioner of his immediate commands, the Capigi Baſſa one of the chiefe Porters of his Seraglio, the Cadi of Gallata, the chiefe juſtice of that place, with others, were of like diſpoſition; and flattered the Grand Signior in theſe tyrannicall practiſes. Kill and rob others themſelues to enrich.

This being the preſent ſtate of things in the Imperiall Port, the Engliſh Embaſſador in the behalfe of his King and Nation, did ſome offices to make knowne the reſentment which his Majeſty of Great Britain might haue; and that if two ſmall ſhips had done ſo much miſchiefe, more might be done with two hundred: declaring withall to the chiefe officers of the Port the ridgedneſſe of the fact ſo fully, that not one would ſtand to the defence or juſtification of the ſame, but rather from their owne mouthes condemning it, in ſo much, that the B courſe of the proceeding was knowne to be repented, and the death of them threatned that were the projectors of ſuch a diſturbance. This gaue ſome encouragement to the Embaſſadors to demand a ſatisfaction by reſtitution, as alſo ſecurity for future times. To the firſt, anſwer was made by the Captaine Baſſa in the name of the Grand Signior, That whereas their weapons were brought before the face of the Grand Signior, they could not be with his honor returned againe; but they might haue others freely: and for reſtoring of the mony extorted from Merchants, the Grand Signior had ſuch vrgent occaſions for it, that at the preſent it could not be well done; but a large recompence ſhould be made in due time. Thus did theſe Turkiſh policies when they had no other colour, plainly declare themſelues violences; and the Embaſſadors were now ſued to and intreated by the Captaine Baſſa in the name C of the Grand Signior, that they would ſpeake no farther of the buſineſſe, but that all might be forgotten, and no farther reſentment had: and it ſhould be confirmed for the future, that all due reſpect ſhould be giuen to them, and eſpeciall care had of the Merchants. In token whereof he preſented them ſeuerally with veſts in the name of the Grand Signior, according to the cuſtome when he honoureth and admitteth any one. The French Embaſſador only ſhared not in theſe teſtimonies; for the ſmall ſatisfaction he gaue, was pretended the chiefe cauſe that a ſuſpition was begotten of others; and their weapons being taken away, was a preuention by diſabling them from joyning in any attempts. For the Grand Signiors tyranny had cauſed all men to feare him; neceſſe eſt vt multos timeat, quem multi timent.
But ſuch were the diſtaſtes conceiued againſt the French Embaſſador by the Grand Signior, D that his death was determined; the execution whereof was with much danger to the diſſwaders deferred, and afterwards vpon aduice changed to another puniſhment. Yet there was no other knowne reaſon for this hate of the new Embaſſador, but what hath formerly beene related; ſo that it ſeemed rather an antipathy in the Grand Signior, that would reliſh nothing of the Embaſſador Count de Marcheuilles well, though he could or would anſwer nothing for his diſlike, but like Catullus,

Non amo te Voluſi, &c.

I do not loue thee Voluſius, but for what,
E Know not: I only know I loue thee not.

Some ſmall time at length made a perfect diſcouery of the true foundation, on which theſe practiſes were built. Which was this; The former Embaſſador Monſieur de Ceſy had declared himſelfe ready to comply with occaſions, and ſerue neceſſity to beſt aduantage; in which he ſeemed to haue more regard of his Nations, than his owne particular eſtate: for during the time of his emploiment, more through the many offences committed by the French, (for which the Grand Signior would haue ſatisfaction) than through any perſonall profuſeneſſe, he borrowed ſo much, that his debts were ſummed to three hundred thouſand Dollars, of which a ſhare belonging to the Engliſh was ſixty thouſand Dollars. This being ſignified, F the French King ſent his command in an expreſſe to the towne of Marſeilles, that they ſhould comply with this debt, and gaue the towne a priuiledge to leuy three per centum, vpon the trade for ſix yeares: which was accepted of, and to principall men (as Deputies of the towne) arriued ſoone after at the Port to take order in the buſineſſe; bringing with them thirty ſix thouſand Dollars to repart amongſt the Creditors. Which mony the new Embaſſador, baſſador Count de Marcheuilles ſeized vpon, and conuerted to his owne vſe, without any regard G to cleer the old Embaſſador away: ſome of which perhaps was emploied in his new buildings. Vpon this there began a difference betwixt the two Embaſſadors; and the Creditors finding no other reliefe, had recourſe to Turkiſh juſtice. Where hauing entred and proued their debts, the old Embaſſador to diſcharge himſelfe, made the two Deputies liable thereto; who were ſtreight committed to priſon, and the Embaſſador hard put to it, for the reſtitution of the mony. This was the certaine foundation of all the former miſchiefes, which for the preſent ceaſed, three French ſhips being ſtaied in the Port for ſatisfaction, and their goods imbarqued for the payment of theſe debts.

1634. The Captaine Baſſa had now more and more inſinuated himſelfe into fauour with the H Grand Signior, and the great Viſier being yet abroad with the army, the Captaine Baſſa was the only man to impart the ſecret counſels of the grand Signior. Among which, a fear of new inſurrection of the Ianizaries and Spahies, when the army ſhould returne mixing it ſelfe; all waies of preuention were ſcanned, and at length the following practiſed. It was remembred, that in their late rebellion they demanded the liues of the Aga, the fauourite, and the Mufti: the two former wherof they had, but the later being conueied away, was ſanctuaried, and preſerued himſelfe ſecretly, vnder the Grand Signiors protection. Which ſafety became his ruine: for in his confidence of the Kings fauour he was now eaſily taken, and by the command of the Grand Signior put to death. The report whereof arriuing in the campe, gaue ſuch ſatisfaction, that the ſouldiers declared themſelues appeaſed before they had begun any diſturbance. I

By the prouocation of the Coſſackes and Polackes (who had committed ſome outrages vpon the confines, and in the Blacke Sea) the Grand Signior reſolued vpon a war with Poland; and ſent his Expreſſe to all the Baſſaes on the Europe ſide, to meet him with their forces at Adrianople, where he appointed the rendeuouz. After which, on the nine and twentieth of Aprill, the Grand Signior withdrew himſelfe to his tents, which were pitched two miles out of the towne; where he remained ten daies, and then ſet forward in his march towards Adrianople, where hee remained till all the forces of the Baſſaes were joyned to his army. The Captaine Baſſa in the meane time went forth with the gallies to repreſſe the farther attempts of the Coſſackes, and from thence he had inſtruction to come by land to the generall rendeuouz. K The Baſſa of Boſna ſet forward with his troups, conſiſting of almoſt ſeuen thouſand, horſe and foot, and marched to Valliovah, and thence to Belgrade, where the Baſſa of Temeſwar, joyning his forces with thoſe of Belgrade and Boſna, they held themſelues encamped on the South ſide of the towne, giuing notwithſtanding, leaue to the Ianizaries, Spahies, and Venturiers, at their owne diſcretion to go before towards the generall rendeuous. Here they expected Murath Baſſa, who fiue daies after came in with a few foot, but foure thouſand horſe of the Spahi Timariots; the moſt braue horſes and dexterous men in the vſe of their armes that the Grand Signior hath. From thence they marched all together to Adrianople, where the Grand Signior hauing remained forty daies, whilſt a meſſenger was ſent into Poland with certaine articles and capitulations, he receiued an anſwer to his ſatiſfaction. L For conceiuing an honourable peace to be much better than a reuenge by an vncertaine war, the conditions which were ſent by the Grand Signior included ſo much for his owne honour, and ſo little for the King of Polands diſhonor, that they were ſoone agreed vpon on both ſides, with a mutuall liking. Vpon which agreement the army was diſmiſſed, and the Grand Signior returned to Conſtantinople. So the great preparation to a proceeding of a high nature burſt it ſelfe with ſome noyſe, ſcarce leauing behinde it the leaſt impreſſion of an action.

So ſoone as the Grand Signior was returned to Conſtantinople, vpon ſome new diſtaſtes conceiued againſt the French Embaſſador Count de Marcheuilles, the Captaine Baſſa gaue in an information; which ſo exaſperated the Grand Signior, that he commanded preſently M the Embaſſador ſhould be ſent away into France. Whereupon the Captaine Baſſa conuenting him to the Arſenall vnder colour of buſineſſe, an expreſſe order was preſently giuen (without permitting him to ſpeake with the Baſſa) to conduct him into a boat and to carry him aboord one of the aforeſaid French ſhips that were arreſted, which ſhip was commanded

A within three houres after to ſet ſaile and depart, in a moſt confuſed and diſorderly manner; not allowing the Embaſſador ſo much time as to diſpoſe of any thing in his houſe: Neither were any ſuffered to be imbarqued with him more than two ſeruants. Yet his Secretary and the reſt of his family were ſuffered to remaine free in the houſe, till they had accommodated all things to follow him with the ſtuffes, and to ouertake him at the Caſtles.

This diſhonourable action ſtirred vp new feares in the other Embaſſadours, that the like would be practiſed vpon them. But thoſe feares vaniſhed quickely, by a declaration of the grand Signiors Order, That the Captaine Baſſa ſhould ſatisfie them all ſeuerally, of the good friendſhip and correſpondence which he would preſerue with their Maſters, and the eſteeme he had of their perſons: Requeſting them but to vnderſtand it truly, that the French B Embaſſadour onely offending, hee alone ſhould bee puniſhed; and that of the offence the French King ſhould be thorowly informed. It was ordered likewiſe, that the old Embaſſador Monſieur de Ceſye ſhould execute the Charge; which hee condeſcended vnto, and all the former diſturbances were ſetled in a ſecond quiet. It was expected that this diſhonour would cauſe a great reſentment to be had abroad amongſt the French, and produce ſome hoſtile effects: but it happened otherwiſe. For the French knowing of what great conſequence their Trade in the Levant is, and that it cannot bee maintained but by a peaceable correſpondence with the grand Signior, diſſembled it ſo farre, that it ſcarſe became queſtionable; and in ſtead of vindicating the Embaſſadours honour ſo much as with a complaint, prouided to accommodate the debts of the old Embaſſador Monſieur de Ceſye, and then to ſend another.

The Captaine Baſſa, who had long preſerued himſelfe in grace and fauour with his maſter, 1635. and mannaged the great employments of the State without ſuſpition, ended his office vnuſually, by being preferred and ſent Baſſa to Buda. For amongſt Turkes the policie is frequent, to ſqueeſe the wealth gotten by any one in office, into the grand Signiors treaſurie; & where pretences faile ſufficiently to gloſſe the act, plaine tyrannie ſhall ſhew it ſelfe, rather than their wils want execution. With this Baſſa it fell out otherwiſe; for though he had more inriched himſelfe than any other, by his ſeuere juſtice, exactions, and interpoſing himſelfe whereſoeuer the buſineſſe might aſſure his profit, yet did hee eſcape without beeing queſtioned. And though the grand Signior might know his faults, and conniue at them, yet his D diſmiſſion, that ſhould haue beene a puniſhment, was nothing but a tranſlation vnto another Honour, and a reward for his vertue that found an Opinion; by this fortune as it were confirming, ——— Sors & virtus miſcentur in vnum.

A reſolution began now to ſettle it ſelfe in the grand Signiour, to make Perſia the onely obiect of his attempts: for his Honour had ſuffered more by that Enemy than any other, and their ſucceſſe had leſſened him both in Fame and Empire. Now as great deſignes require their counſels, (without which the beginning cannot promiſe a faire euent) he began to lay E a foundation for his proceedings, & to order them ſo, that euery particular ſhould haue ſome relation to a policie. The ground of the Warre was the ſame inueterate one which could not yet be remooued, and had for many ages vpheld a quarrell. The Order was, that himſelfe would go in perſon, preſuming as Cæſar did, that Fortune was bound to attend him. Then his Ianizaries were all deſigned for the expedition, that in ſo dangerous an enterpriſe hee might deſtroy them politiquely, as men that he had great reaſon to be jealous of, for that they were almoſt grown to a militarie Anarchy, like the Prætorian bands of the Romans. Beſides, their late vprores were yet vnpuniſhed; for their diſobedience would not ſubmit to any juſtice, and when a ſentence had paſt, their own ſtrength would reſiſt the execution: ſo that no practiſe but this, could expreſſe the grand Signior in his power ouer them. All things being now in F readineſſe, he cauſed his Tents to be pitched in Scutari on the Aſian ſide; whither after ten dayes he paſſed ouer himſelfe, and thence marched forward to Arzirum, where he appointed the generall Rendevous to be kept. From thence he proceeded with his numerous army, and beſieged Reivan, a place of great conſequence; where for a time he found a ſtrong reſiſtance, but at length took it, and fluſhing his ſouldiers with ſome ſpoile, went forwards vp as farre as Tauris; where finding no reſiſtance (for the Perſians made no head againſt him, preſeruing G their ſtrength for ſome after-action, of more conſequence than preuenting the loſſe of a waſt and barren country) he conſumed all, preſſing it with the vtmoſt calamities of War. So after he had made a circular progreſſe, finding the approch of Winter to bring on many inconueniences, and ſome infirmities growing amongſt his ſouldiers, beſides the ſtore of prouiſion for beaſts of cariage failing, and not poſſibly to be there ſupplied, he withdrew himſelf by the ſame way of Arzirum, returning with more triumph than conqueſt.

The Captaine Baſſa all this while was abroad in the Mediterranian with a very great fleet of Gallies; pretending that he had information of many Engliſh ſhips that came into the Arches to lade Corn, and carry it to the Enemies of the grand Signior. He imployed diuers in euery Port, with inſtructions to intrap ſuch ſhips: and vnder colour of this juſtice many H outrages were committed, many ſhips made priſe of, & great occaſion giuen for complaints. But the Captaine Baſſa's Cauſe was alwaies right, and howſoeuer he was to himſelfe in conſcience, to others he appeared a iuſt man in opinion, and ſhunned puniſhment, his accuſers likewiſe being leſſe powerfull, than his judges were partiall.

1636. The grand Signior was no ſooner returned, and made his entrance into the Port, but the ſtrength of the Perſians (which during the time of his incurſion into their country ſeemed as it were vtterly diſſolued) began now to be ſinuated and knit together, making vp the firm bodie of a moſt powerfull army. When all their forces were conuented and ordered, their hearts payd ſacrifices of vowes to Nemeſis; and confirmed in a reſolution of reuenge, they marched I toward Reivan (which the grand Signior the year before had taken) againſt which they layd a ſtrong ſiege. The Garriſons of the Turks which were left within by the grand Signior, to preuent their intrenching neer the towne made many excurſions vpon them, where the loſſe was more on the Turkes part than the Perſians: ſo that they were inforced to truſt to their walls and victualling, till they had ſent a meſſenger to the grand Signior, with a declaration of their diſtreſſe. Which the grand Signior vnderſtanding, he diſpatched Baſſa's both into Aſia and Grecia, to haſten and ſend away the ſouldiers to their reliefe. He appointed alſo the Ianizarie Aga to follow with the Ianizaries. But it was now the time of their Bayram, by reaſon of which their deuotions delayed them, to the Perſians great aduantage. It was alſo reſolued, that the grand Signior ſhould himſelfe go in perſon toward the later end of the year; K and if the ſucceſſe were not anſwerable to their deſignes, he ſhould Winter at Aleppo, and the Spring following fall againe into Perſia. But the Perſians taking hold of opportunitie, ſtayed not to expect famine for their inſtrument, or any trecherie to betray the town to them, but fiercely aſſaulted it, and with that violence of battery that they preſently took it, putting all the Turks they found therin either to the ſword or ranſom.

The report of this loſſe ariuing before the ſoldiers could be gathered together at the rendeuous, the proceeding ſtopt, and the grand Signior full of diſcontent remained at home to conſult his own ſafety, which was now threatned with a ſtorm, that to ſhun was not thought a poſſibilitie in humane prouidence. For the ſouldiers that were abroad began to expreſſe much diſcontentment, refuſing to receiue their pay, or to be commanded by the grand Vi- L zier: for the Turkes war with the Perſians very vnwillingly, there beeing no other cauſe for a war, but the emulation of greatneſſe which hath ſucceſſively poſſeſt the Lords of thoſe two mighty Empires. Beſides, they ſeldome meet in Perſia with any plentifull ſpoiles: ſo that they are neither incited by their own freeneſſe, nor allured by the hopes of any large reward; the later of which is the onely whetſtone of Endeauor and enterpriſes. But on the contrary, to the Wars of Hungary and Poland they runne as to ſome delightfull ſpectacle; prickt forward therto by zeal, as making Religion a ground for their attempts, and an aſſurance of large booty, where the countries glory in the fulneſſe of many bleſſings.

This danger of the Souldiers mutinies abroad reached not yet the Grand Signior, nor put him into any perſonall feare, till the Ianizaries at home, made him apprehend the immi- M nence of what they intended againſt him. For they had, either by the information of ſome treacherous Stateſman, or their owne conſideration of circumſtances, diſcouered the Grand Signiors intention of compelling them to the war of Perſia: which deſigne of his failing, firſt in the Perſians not reſiſtance, afterwards in diſſoluing of the army before they could come

A come to the reliefe of Reivan, they were not yet much weakened, and their knowledge of the 1636.
Grand Signiors diſaffection towards them, inſtructed their diſloyall inclinations to all ſorts of agreeable practiſes. Beſides, they had now learned amongſt other diuelliſh ſecrets ſince the fleſhing of themſelues in their Soueraignes bloud, Sultan Oſman, and in the depoſing, reſtoring, and depoſing againe of Muſtapha, how to make and vnmake a King at their pleaſure.
So that the Grand Signior ſeemeth a Steward only intruſted with a gouernment, which his ſlaues exact account of, and transferre as their humours and affections ſway them. Euery one amongſt theſe rebellious tumultuants ſeemed very full of counſels; and none would allow a proceeding to action, till they had ordered the progreſſe by a rule: which was ſo diuerſly propoſed, that it could haue no poſitiue confirmation. For ſome aduiſed to the depo-B ſition of their Emperor, which others that were not ſo well affected to innouation oppoſed, with reaſons of ſatisfaction: and that if the Grand Signior would make amends by ſome acknowledgement of his il intents towards them, and confirme their order and priuiledges, his gouernment (being one that by experience had made himſelfe ſenſible of their power) might be more profitable to them than euer, whoſe diſpoſition as yet vndiſcouered, might make their courſes and liues ſubiect to incertainties. For the Grand Signior in the beginning of his reigne, by reaſon of his few yeares (which exceeded not fifteene) expreſt a naturall inclination to action, which he hath ſince continually practiſed: and this had ſettled ſome good opinion of him in the inconſtant ſouldiers, who liue by it; though many of late, (contrary to their firſt inſtitution, and the long continued courſe which the former emperors C had ſeuerely tied them to) applyed themſelues to merchandiſe, and other enriching means, neglecting as it were the profeſſion they were ordained to, but at the very inſtant of imploi-ment. A third ſort whom the thought of reuenge had poſſeſt, (to which the worſt ſpirits are moſt ſubiect;

propoſed their Soueraignes death, who had practiſed their ſubuerſion. But this reliſht not D ſo well generally; for their former outrage had made them the ſubiects of cenſure ſo farre, that all States condemned it, and themſelues lamented. Many daies were waſted with theſe conuentions, that diſſolued ſtill with new doubts; ſo that the Grand Signior had time enough for preuention, which was ordered by the great Viſiers, remaining at Arzirum with the army, where he wintered, that ſo the want of number might make their ſuppreſſion the eaſier: For if the Spahies that were diſcontented abroad, had beene ioyned to the Ianizaries mutining at home, their addition would haue beene oyle to a flame, and increaſed an incendium, till there had beene left no matter for their fury to feed on. The Grand Signior like-wiſe diſtributed large ſums amongſt them, and purchaſed ſome part of his ſafety that way.
The great Viſier likewiſe being wanting, they had no obiect for their outrage: for he was E onely ſuſpected to practiſe with the Grand Signior (as Delauir Baſſa did formerly with Oſman) to erect a new Militia, for the ſupplanting of the Ianizaries, that ſhould be maintained with leſſe charge and danger. In concluſion, there remained not the leaſt veſtigium of this confuſed building, but the feare that another might be raiſed, if the Ianizaries ſhould haue any new prouocations to fall againe to worke. And though their idleneſſe at home, might haue giuen occaſion of diſturbance from the vnſetledneſſe of their thoughts, (for ——— Variam ſemper dant otia mentem) which would be ſtaied if action diuerted them from other obiects, there hath beene no de-F ſigne thought of ſince, but the regulating of theſe Ianizaries, and preſeruing them from attempt, by a more free diſtribution of donatiues amongſt them. Only the great Viſier made ſome incurſions into Perſia, the ſucceſſe whereof anſwered not the expectation of ſo great an vndertaking.

This being the preſent ſtate of the Ottoman Emperors, conferred with ſome other late diſtant accidents, (which haue a relation to that State) and the precedent, giue occaſion to theſe following conſiderations.

Firſt, the greatneſſe of the Turkiſh Empire, raiſed thereto by continuall action, and preſerued by fortune, more than by reaſon; yet crueltie (which hath beene alwayes obſerued to be an inſtrument, and is as it were hereditarie in their natures) hath a politique allowance. For they haue found it by experience, That mercy toward the Vanquiſhed prooueth many times a motiue to diſcontent; and reuiueth the memory of diſgrace, which often chalks out a way to reuenge. When contrariwiſe crueltie exerciſeth them ſo much in a ſubiection, that the remembrance of all former equalitie in greatneſſe loſeth it ſelfe by degrees, in an humble patience. Beſides, where there is bred a diſcontent from reflection to a high ſtate buried in neceſſities, that diſcontent becommeth the Parent of Curioſitie; as Plautus in Sticho ſaith, Curioſus nemo eſt qui non ſit malevolus.

This curioſitie now buſieth it ſelfe wholly in the diſquiſition of all ſorts of reuenge, and many times will not be ſatisfied but with practiſe. To preuent which, the Turkiſh cruelty ties the hands of all they conquer, that they are left without meanes for the execution of any deſigne that is hatcht by diſcontent. And this cruelty though tyrannical, is allowed of among them politicè, though all the world beſides muſt condemn it Ethicè: for it includeth an inſulting ouer miſerie, than which, nothing more cleerely expreſſeth a vulgar and an vnprincely nature.

Corpora magnanimo ſatis eſt proſtraſſe Leoni; Pugna ſuum finem, cum jacet hoſtis, habet.
At Lupus & turpes inſtant morientibus vrſi, Et quacunque minor nobilitate fera eſt.

Which haue this ſence:

The valiant Lion, when the Vanquiſhed Lies at his feet, hath mercie in his eie.
But Wolues and Bears inſult ouer the Dead;
And beaſts that are of leſſe Nobilitie.

How much this crueltie practiſed by the Turkes hath wrought vpon diuers Nations, the precedent is full of examples; and how far it may bee iuſtified by the effects, as conducing mightily to the preſeruation of that State, may be prooued by the contrary. For the mercie ſhewed by Achmat to his brother Muſtapha, ſo much differing from the Ottoman cuſtome, begot ſuch a diſorder, that it became pernicious, almoſt to the vtter diſſolution of that State.

But as in all actions the ſame thing may produce differing effects, by the diuers application; ſo this crueltie, as it is a meanes of ſecuritie when practiſed by the grand Signior vpon thoſe whom Fortune hath made his ſubjects, ſo is it an occaſion for ſeuere cenſure when ſtrangers ſuffer vnder it, ſuch as for trade reſide in his dominions, and ought to haue all immunities and priuiledges, eſpecially of ſafety, according to the ſeuerall capitulations that preſerue their ſeueral correſpondence. Of this the later times produce diuers examples; and though the Turkes colour it with the name of ſeuere iuſtice, yet is it in ſubſtance plain crueltie, and the moſt diſhonourable that may warrant a cauſe of reuenge, If Chriſtians would be ſo farre ſencible as to ſtrengthen it by an vnanimous vndertaking.

And here a ſecond conſideration offers it ſelfe, which is the ſhew of the Empires declining from it's priſtine greatneſſe; which may bee two wayes coniectured: By the Ottoman Line almoſt extinguiſhed, there remaining beſides the preſent Emperour, but three, and thoſe ſubiect to his tyrannie, and cuſtome of the State; vpon the leaſt jealouſie to be made vncapable either of rule or diſturbance.

Secondly, by the ſucceſſe of the Perſian, who hath leſſened the grand Signior much, by contracting the bounds of his Empire in Aſia, and by enlarging his owne, with addition to

A it of that which hee hath ſubſtracted from the grand Seigniors. Neither can a ceſſation of ſtriſe be euer hoped, where there is nothing but emulation, and two ſuch competitors in greatneſſe equally.

There are yet other conſiderations which may inferre a doubt of the empires diſſolution, or at leaſtwiſe alteration, and to ſuch a form as will ſcarce preſerue any footſtep of the other.
One of which is the Ianizaries diſloyall diſpoſition, that hath ſo dangerouſly declared it ſelfe of late. Inſomuch that if the diſcontented ſtrangers and Chriſtian ſubjects were but B as able to doe miſchiefe, as the ſouldiers are to deſire it, queſtionleſſe ſome great euent would ſoone ſhew it ſelfe, and the deſire of libertie eſtabliſh perhaps ſome Ariſtocraſia or Democraſia, or what the giddineſſe of their humours ſhould fancie. For the Ottoman Line failing, the Empire deſcendeth to the Tartar, whom the Turkes ſo innately hate, that they would admit of any innouation, rather than his gouernment. There would be many by-aduancements of this progreſſe, if it were ſet on foot: for euery Baſſa ſubſtituted for his ſeuerall prouince, would with his owne power endeauor to make himſelfe abſolute. The Perſian would compaſſe his ends eaſily; The Egyptians caſt off their bondage, and all the Tributaries ſaue their expences.

Some aid it would receiue by the diuerſities of the many Nations, whoſe Kingdomes are C ſubject to this Empire: for being many, doubtleſſe they cannot be all ſo regulated by one forme of gouernment, or made ſo abſolute Turkiſh, but that the Natiues of euery Countrey preſerue ſomething of their owne primitiue inſtitutions, which they likewiſe are better affected to, than what they haue learned by a new compulſion. And though it commeth not within an eaſie apprehenſion, how ſo many Kingdomes ſhould be gotten, and preſerued ſo long (which Auguſtus diſſuaded his Romanes from, as an apparant indangering of all) yet the preſent Emperor is obſerued to be more valiant than politique; which is dangerous according to Euripides,

Ἀσφαλὴς γὰρ ἐστ' ἀμείνων, ἢ θρασὺς στρατηλάτης

Sir Thomas More hath theſe following, almoſt to the ſame purpoſe:

Regibus ex multis regnum cui ſufficit vnum, Vix Rex vnus erit, ſi tamen vnus erit.
Regibus è multis regnum benè qui regat vnum, Vix tamen vnus erit, ſi tamen vnus erit.

'Tis kingly to deſire many Kingdoms; but better to gouerne one well, than by addition of number make the rule dangerous.

This might giue aduantage to the Baſſa's, if the grand Seignior ſhould exaſperate them, and by his cruelties (whether they be the effects of his tyrannie or his reaſon) to prouoke them to attempts. For there haue been many late examples of their aptneſſe to know their owne ſtrength, and application of it to any vſe in deſignes of reuenge or ambition. Abaſſa Baſſa after the murther of Oſman, and Haſſeruph Baſſa after his diſgrace, with others, haue ſufficiently teſtified it; the later of whoſe deaths could neuer haue been effected but by a ſecret policie. Yet there is a kinde of preuention, by making the gouernment ſo eaſie to Turkes themſelues, that they ſeeme all in ſeuerall degrees to bee but ſubſtituted Gouernors of the other Nations, which are chiefly the ſubjects of the grand Signiors tyranie; and to that end F the Turks are mingled with all others that are ſubjected.

A conſideration may be had from another argument, of the declenſion of this great Empire, by its age, and the preſent inſtruments that are practiſed about the weakening of it. For a State is aptly compared to the little world of man, the infancie whereof is weak and ſimple,
the

the Youth increaſing, the manhood for a time eſtabliſhed and firme, but the old age diſeaſed G and not able to hold out long, but muſt of neceſſitie yeeld to death, where it findes its termination.
Now as this aged Empire hath many in-bred diſeaſes, ſo is it threatned abroad by the Perſian on one ſide, by feare of the Egyptians and Arabs getting head on another; by the Chriſtians on a third, of which the Polander is of moſt danger, as beeing neereſt in place, and ofteneſt prouoked. Beſides, his ſucceſſe hath been ſome weakning to the grand Signior, inſomuch that the free propoſition of peace on his part, in the yeare 1634, argued a feare, and doubtleſſe there is a ſecret reaſon that makes the Turke diſtruſt his own ſtate more now than euer.

The Pyrats and Renegadoes of Algier, Tunes, and Sally (whoſe actions the grand Signior protecteth, though not their perſons, leauing them in that point of ſafety to themſelues) H haue diſtaſted the Chriſtians of late very much, eſpecially our Engliſh, by committing diuers outrages on the Weſterne coaſts of England, as alſo on the South South Weſt and Weſt of Ireland, where they aduentured to make ſome inrodes, and haue carried away much cattel and people for ſlaues, burning diuers Villages.

Vpon the knowledge whereof, his Majeſtie of great Brittaine appointed a fleet to goe to the ſtreights for their ſuppreſſion, and the redemption of his ſubiects that were in thoſe parts Captiues. Which Fleet returned towards the later end of the laſt yeare 1637, victorious, bringing along an honourable Embaſſadour from the Emperour of Moroco, with gratulations for the happy ſucceſſe which he had againſt rebels there by this aid of the Engliſh. The particulars whereof are of more conſequence, than to be made (as they are) the ſubiects of I ridiculous pamphlets, and otherwiſe ſhould haue made a place in this Hiſtory. For the Moroco being a Mahometan in Religion, is likewiſe a kinde of Tributarie to the grand Seignior, though perhaps he payeth it voluntarily, and vnder the colour and name of a Preſent, the which doth make it but a degree more honourable. This Prince, (who hath all the attributes of a good man, and is not ſo much affected to Turkiſh libertie) whether particularly obliged for this good ſeruice of the Engliſh, or generally deſirous to publiſh his good inclination, hath from circumſtance giuen hope to Chriſtians of aid in any laudable deſigne, as this of ſuppreſſing Theeues and Rebels, and redeeming Captiues was. For the Trade of the Leuant hath not ſo much danger from the vices of Turkiſh Miniſters, as from thoſe former places, the receptacles of Pyrats, moſt of which are Renegadoes. K Now if the grand Signior ſhould haue any reſentment of this, and that a Warre ſhould follow betweene him and the Moroco (who is a powerfull Prince and actiue) he muſt of neceſſitie, by tranſlating the ſeat of it ſo farre Weſtward, leaue Aſia vndefenced againſt the Perſian; and the Emperour of Germanie with the ayd of the Pole, might be able to do ſomething proſperouſly in Hungary. Beſides, the Maltæſes and Sicilians, if but for neighbourhoods ſake, muſt of neceſſitie ſtirre ſomewhat, and doe for the honour of the Order, which hath of late vpheld it ſelfe more by the meere ceremonies of it in Courts of peace, than by woonted action.

But theſe euents muſt be doubtfull, in that they are grounded vpon ſecret and vnreuealed intentions. Certaine it is, that the grand Signior is weakened in his power, by the corrupted L manners of his ſouldiers; and hauing ſo many enemies ſo diuerſly planted on euery hand of him, he cannot at once deale with all throughly, neither can he offend any one much, but that he muſt leaue himſelfe vnarmed, or but weakely defended againſt the other. For his Souldierie conſiſts now of a far ſmaller number than it formerly did, and thoſe likewiſe fallen from their firſt inſtitution, marrying, and applying themſelues to merchandiſe, more than the practiſe of their proper diſcipline; inſomuch that his Army (which heretofore hath ſtupified the amaſed hearers with a number beyond conceit or almoſt probabilitie, ſuch as that which was repulſed before Vienna) ſeldome exceeds eighty or a hundred thouſand, though the report ſounds it more, to the greater terror of the Enemy.

Some haue formerly thought, That a poſſible entrance might be made to the diſſoluing M of this ſo mighty Enemy of the Chriſtians, by making the Ianizaries ſencible of their originall, and being the children of Chriſtians. But now it is certaine, that the moſt of them are naturall Turkes borne, and purchaſed at eaſie rates by Chriſtians, to ſupply the number of tributary children, by which their own are preſerued to pay the grand Signior tribute and cuſtomes; which if they had bin Ianizaries, ſhould haue bin diſtributed to their owne maintenance. The happineſſe in this great difference is, by making the leſſe part ſubiect to neceſſities, they preſerue the immortall one capable of glory. But thoſe that haue learned a Religion full of libertie, and the end (though vainely) promiſing eternitie, with full fruition of greater pleaſures, would hardly be withdrawn to embrace a ſtrict one, whoſe progreſſe is conſcience and auſteritie.

One thing is moſt remarkeable, and may include ſome apparancie of a change at leaſt in that gouernment; which is, That the Turks begin more and more to leaue their barbariſme, and fall to the ſtudy of Arts: inſomuch that diuers Baſſa's write the Annals of their ſeuerall Prouinces, in the Arabick, of which they labour alſo to attaine the elegance. Euery one beſides is inſtructed in the Italian, which is now grown the Court language. It is reported likewiſe by a Gentleman that hath publiſhed his journal, how he had obſerued ſome of them affected to Poetry, and that he had ſeen ſome Sonets of their compoſing: which without doubt wil cauſe ſome alteration in their maners; according to Ovid, Adde, quod inſidiæ ſacris à vatibus abſunt, Et facit ad mores ars quoque noſtra bonos.

From ſacred Poets fraud is abſent far,
And manners by our Art much better'd ar'.

Yet perhaps the effects of eaſe and ſoftneſſe will ſhew themſelues, as they grow more Schollers, and leſſe martiall; which many times hapneth where men are beſt inſtructed: And heretofore the liues of the Turks hath bin more practiue than ſpeculatiue, and their actions ordered more from neceſſitie than conſideration.

But as a certain and conſtant fortune is an euill (according to Sophocles in Ajace;) ſo the long flouriſhing ſtate of this empire hath made it the obiect of greater danger, and the change and diſſolution is imminent; but to what aduantage of others, is in the prouidence onely of him that ordereth all, and hath long ſuffered this to continue a ſcourge for Chriſtians, whoſe irreligious negligence of their principal duties, haue deſeruedly drawn down that puniſhment.
